At the end of June prices resumed their rise, while the export surplus was declining from the record annual rate of $13,000,000,000 in the second quarter to an estimated $10,300,000,000 in the third quarter. The effects of increased pay rolls, cashing of terminal-leave bonds, increased construction activity, and a generally optimistic business attitude more than offset the decline in exports. Forces not related primarily to foreign trade induced important price increases for coal and steel, which in turn gave impetus to price rises elsewhere. Moreover, when the price declines which were anticipated earlier in the year did not materialize, the effect was to bring into markets buyers who had been postponing purchases.

While the general impact of foreign demand has been diminishing in recent months, sharp increases in grain prices have been in large part the result of international factors. This increase stemmed from the very short domestic corn crop and the poor European grain crop, and spread to livestock and other food products. The large foreign requirements have undoubtedly been a factor in the price rise of these products. But even for food the sharpness of the rise would not have been possible without an intense domestic demand based upon the very high income level.

The setting of foreign buying in its proper perspective leads to the conclusion that, looking at the economy generally, price inflation in this country has arisen mainly from other sources. But it also leads to the conclusion that specific supply shortages present dangers of further inflationary pressure.

Foreign trade is a normal and necessary part of American business. It is essential to a healthy American economy. It is needed not only to bring us the normal necessities of our dinner table like coffee, tea, and cocoa, but also raw materials upon which our whole business economy depends.

UNITED STATES DEPENDENCE ON IMPORTS

In the May 17, 1947, issue of the Saturday Evening Post, W. Averell Harriman, then Secretary of Commerce, published an article entitled "We've Got to Import to Live." This article summarized the growing dependence of the United States on imports. He pointed out that we are dependent almost entirely on imports for the commodities which are the key to our atomic energy developments. The development not only of the jet engine, but of other modern industrial equipment as well, is dependent on the use of ferro-alloys, many of which are obtainable only from abroad in the requisite quantities, for our production of new alloy steels capable of resisting great internal heats. In fact, ours is a hard-steel economy; and hard steels require ferro-alloy imports. We are badly short of many of the most significant ferro-alloying and specialized minerals—chromite, antimony, manganese, nickel, tungsten, and vanadium. Before the war we were exporters of copper and lead. During the war we drew heavily on our resources and we now find ourselves greatly short of both of these commodities which are basic to our industrial economy. We have also become increasingly dependent on zinc, petroleum, and iron-ore imports.

CHROMIUM

The United States, by far the largest world user of chromium, possesses no significant commercial reserves of this metal and is therefore almost wholly dependent on foreign supplies of metallurgical-grade ores.

MANGANESE

In 1947, over 90 percent of our requirements were imported.

NICKEL

The United States is almost wholly dependent on foreign sources for its nickel requirements.

TUNGSTEN

Domestic production of tungsten concentrates is inadequate to meet United States requirements which for the 6 years 1947–52 are expected to average 8,000 to 10,000 tons annually, possibly half of which might be supplied by domestic mines if relatively high prices are maintained.

ANTIMONY

Domestic reserves of antimony are exceedingly small.

COPPER

United States production of copper is insufficient to meet present demand. * * * Consequently large imports are required.

LEAD

Domestic mine pproduction plus secondary recovery from 1947 to 1952 cannot be expected at best to exceed an average of 800,000 to 850,000 short tons annually. Against this supply, domestic demand in an unrestricted full-employment economy will average at least 1,200,000 tons.

TIN

The United States supply of virgin tin is derived from metal imports.

ZINC

The termination of a net export position in the middle 1930's followed by an increasing dependence of United States zinc consumers on imports is a measure of the progressive depletion of domestic ore reserves.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote here what Mr. Leon H. Keyserling, Vice Chairman, Council of Economic Advisers, had to say on inflation and foreign aid in his testimony before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee:

The very first point to be made involves firm, unalterable recognition that we must conquer inflation while meeting our essential obligations as a Nation, and not by avoiding these obligations. Sufficient examples of this are the foreign-aid and preparedness programs. Even if these programs were complicating the inflation problem far more than they in fact are, we would have to carry these programs forward nonetheless. To be sure, if we abandoned foreign aid, and preparedness, and agricultural price supports, and the good living standards that come with good wages, and the goal of maintaining maximum employment and production, and many other things that make our Nation what it is, we would then have no problem of inflation. But we would lose infinitely more than we would gain.

It is true that if we decide to divert more of our resources to a particular purpose, such as foreign aid or preparedness, we will for the time being not have those same resources available for other purposes. But there is no good reason why a decision on grounds of national policy to divert manpower and other productive resources to one purpose rather than to another should prevent us from dealing more equitably with our people at home or from checking the economic maladjustments which are now under way. During the war, we diverted about half of our output to noncivilian use, and yet through affirmative economic policies we actually raised civilian standards of living and ended the war on a fairly promising footing for lasting economic prosperity. Growing maladjustments have developed since then, not because we have undertaken certain essential programs such as foreign aid and preparedness, but because we have done so little to deal with the disruptive forces which have been released by the actions of men and can likewise be contained by the actions of men.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican argument that foreign aid and trade are responsible for high prices is not being used and will not be used among our businessmen. This argument has been cooked up for those low-income groups who are suffering today because of the Republicans' refusal to control domestic inflation.

I say Republican inflation advisedly. The Republicans fought to remove price controls because they wanted no ceilings on profits. The Republicans refuse to reinstate the controls that are necessary to protect the average family in America from depression because the Republican campaign is dependent on contributions from high-price profiteers.

The Republican National Committee in asking for contributions baldly states that the increase in take-home pay provided by their tax-cut program was not peanuts and goes on to remind Republicans that the elephant cannot win campaigns on peanuts and that those who have benefited by the Republican tax program ought to make a large contribution in the coming campaign.

This is not fabrication, Mr. Speaker. From the Republican News, a publication sponsored by the Republican National Committee, under the title, and I quote "Do Not Throw Peanuts to the Elephant," we find this language:

Many of our friends feel that, entirely apart from other important considerations, the least they can do to express their appreciation is to contribute a substantial part of their tax savings for this year to insure the reelection of the Congress which made this possible.

Don't delay, contribute today.

Don't throw peanuts to the elephant.

Don't count on winning by throwing peanuts to the elephant. The Republican Congress did more than provide a few peanuts for the harassed taxpayer.

The stakes are too high to take any chances on not winning.

I will let the voters interpret what the stakes are for the Republican Party, Mr. Speaker.

The stakes for the American people, whether they be Republican or Democrat, are a sound and stable economy and peace. In order to attain these goals, we must be good neighbors at home and good neighbors in the world. That means shouldering our responsibilities jointly and living up to our obligations as a Nation, fully aware of the great contribution our Nation must make to insure the future of our children and our children's children.

Price Control Background

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the attached editorial from the Daily Times, published in Mamaroneck, N. Y., Tuesday, July 27, 1948, entitled "Price Control Background":

PRICE CONTROL BACKGROUND

With shrewd political foresight, President Truman has chosen to challenge a Republican-dominated Congress upon an issue which is certain to play an important role in the forthcoming campaign—the high cost of living. Proposed cure is a resumption of price controls.

Before reaching any decision as to the worthiness of that recommendation it might be well to review the background. For if we fail to learn by experience, then we shall deserve any failures which may accrue.

We had in this country control over prices for more than 5½ years, begining 8 months before Pearl Harbor and continuing on major items until November of 1946. Many may have forgotten that it was President Truman himself who on the latter date lifted ceilings from prices, wages, and salaries.

In April 1941, when President Roosevelt by Executive order vested control over prices in Leon Henderson, the consumers' price index of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics stood at 102.2. It had been at 98.6 when the European war began in 1939. On November 15, 1946, when ceilings had been lifted from everything excepting rents, sugar, and rice, this index was at 152.2. In the 5 months preceding that cessation of controls the average increase had been 3.8 points per month. Which would indicate that not even price controls are sufficient to halt higher cost of living.

The first price control law—Mr. Henderson carried on without legislative authorization for 9 months—came in January of 1942. It provided for farm prices at an estimated average of 116 percent of parity. Three months later President Roosevelt demanded a revision upwards on behalf of the farmer and in October 1942, Congress passed the Stabilization Act which in effect raised the ceilings on farm produce. By that time the price index had risen to 119.

Throughout the war price controls continued, along with frozen wages and salaries. However, in the case of wages and salaries exceptions were allowed to correct "hardships and inequalities" and it was significant that many such cases of "hardship" developed in which members of large labor unions were involved.

In June of 1946 Congress extended price controls but with sharp restrictions. Because of the restrictions, President Truman vetoed the bill and for a short period we were without controls. A month later President Truman signed a second price-control measure, less restrictive. But during the entire year of 1946 there developed a marked scarcity or entire absence from the market of many commodities which made their way instead into the black markets. And of such commodities as appeared in legitimate markets, the quality was notoriously poor. Naturally people who had accepted wartime privations began to grumble and their cries reached the White House.

On October 14, 1946, with fine cuts of meat practically unobtainable in legitimate markets, President Truman lifted ceilings from meat and livestock. This, it may be remembered, was just before elections of that year. The gesture, considered political by many, did not save Mr. Truman's party from defeat.

Aware of the public attitude as so vigorously voiced in the election, President Truman on November 9 lifted ceilings on wages and salaries and also on prices excepting the three items, rents, sugar, and rice. At that time the Consumers' Price Index had risen to 152.2, as mentioned above. Thus, during the life of price controls we saw the index rise from 102.2 to 152.2, roughly a 50 percent increase in living costs. But even this is a conservative figure, for because of scarcity or absence of low-cost commodities, deterioration in quality and black-market prices actually paid, the President's Committee on the Cost of Living estimated that the official index was too low by from three to four points in the 1941–44 period. It isn't the ceiling price that determines cost of living; rather, it is what a family actually pays. And if the family must go into the black market for supplies, then ceiling prices do not reflect accurately the family's real living costs.

Since the lifting in November of 1946 of price ceilings the consumers' price index has risen to 171.7 (the June 15, 1948, figure). This is an increase over the period of 18.5 points or less than one point a month. By way of comparison, note that for the last 5 months of price controls the average monthly increase of the index was 3.8 points. Obviously, a plausible argument could be advanced that the increase in the cost of living has not been so rapid since the lifting of ceilings as it was during the last few months of price controls.

The real point at issue, then, is not whether the cost of living should be stabilized or lowered. Almost everyone wants that. Rather, the question is one of method: Will price controls, which did not prove effective in 1946, be any more successful in 1948?

History of Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINT SMITH OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the History of Price Control from 2130 B. C. to 1946 A. D. continues:

The price-fixing decree of Diocletian was a failure and was abandoned within 5 years. It cast economy into too rigid a mold, and the result was, in the west at least, disintegation. The western Roman Empire never recovered from the crisis of the third century. By the fourth century money had fallen to the degraded position of ponderata, when it was customary to assay and weigh each piece. And by the seventh century, the weights themselves had been so frequently degraded that it was no longer possible to make a specific bargain for money. There was no law to define the weight of a pound or an ounce, and no power to enforce the law if one existed. Under these circumstances money became extinct. Nor was it the only institution that perished—for all institutions had perished.

There was no government except the sword, there was no law; there were no certain weights and measures. Exchanges were made in kind, or for slaves, or bags of corn, or lumps of metal, which men weighed or counted to one another, holding the thing to be sold in one hand, the thing to be bought in the other.

There is no more fitting close for this chapter on the failure of the Romans to cope with money and price ceilings than by quoting the words of one Antoninus Augustus, "'Money had more to do with the distemper of the Roman Empire than the Huns or the Vandals."

GREAT BRITAIN, 1199–1815

Simon Litmar, who made a detailed study of the history of price control in Great Britain, states:

"An attempt to control both the wholesale and the retail price of wine by fixing a maximum was made by the British Government in 1199. The measure failed and in 1330, after a long period of ineffectiveness a new law was passed which required the merchants to sell at a 'reasonable' price, the latter to be based on import price, plus expenses. This new measure of control proved as futile as the old one.

"The first attempt to regulate the price of wheat and bread was made in 1202. The most important ordinance on the matter was 51 Henry III. This ordinance fixed changing weights for the farthing load to correspond to 6-penny varieties in the price of a quarter of wheat from 12 pence to 12 shillings. The law was enforced locally on sundry occasions, but fell gradually into disuse."

Not until 1815, however, were the last laws fixing the price of bread repealed, after a continuous existence of five and a half centuries. The official document recommending their repeal enumerates the ways in which these laws have worked out to show that their repeal is in the interest of the public welfare.

"The English corn laws from 1804 to 1846 furnish probably the best known instance of Government attempts to stabilize prices in more modern times. The corn statutes of these years are simply a record of the impotence of legislation to maintain the price of a commodity at a high point when all the natural economic causes in operation are opposed to it." (Encyclopedia Britannica 11th ed., vol. 7, p. 177.)

John Fiske, in one of his essays, ascribes the downfall of the city of Antwerp in 1585 to the bungling price-fixing legislation of the government. He says:

"The turning point of the great Dutch revolution, so far as it concerned the provinces which now constitute Belgium, was the famous siege and capture of Antwerp. The siege was long and the resistance obstinate and the city would probably not have been captured if famine had not come to the assistance of the besiegers. It is interesting to inquire what steps the civic authorities had taken to prevent such a calamity. Finding that speculators were accumulating and hoarding up provisions in anticipation of a season of high prices, they affixed a very low maximum price to everything which could be eaten, and prescribed severe penalties for all who should attempt to take more than the sum by law decreed. The consequences of this policy was twofold. It was a long time before the Duke of Parma, who was besieging the city, succeeded in so blockading the Scheldt as to prevent ships laden with eatables from coming in below. Corn and preserved meats might have been hurried into the beleaguered city by thousands of tons. But no merchant would run the risk of having his ships sunk by the Duke's batteries merely for the sake of finding a market no better than many others which could be reached with no risk at all. The business of Government is to legislate for men as they are, not as it is supposed they ought to be. If provisions had brought a high price in Antwerp they would have been carried thither. As it was the city by its own stupidity blockaded itself far more effectually than the Duke of Parma could have done.

"In the second place the enforced lowness of prices prevented any general retrenchment on the part of the citizens. Nobody felt it necessary to economize. So the city lived in high spirit until all at once provisions gave out and the Government had to step in again to palliate the distress which it had wrought."

The famines of India are prominent features in her history. William Hunter in his book entitled "Annals of Rural Bengal," writes:

"Lower Bengal gathers in three harvests each year; in the spring, in the early autumn, and in December, the last being the great rice crop, the harvest on which the sustenance of the people depends. The December crop failed utterly in 1770 and fully a third of the population died. This disaster stands out in the contemporary records in appalling proportions. It forms indeed the key to the history of Bengal during the succeeding 40 years.

"In 1770 the government, by interdicting what it was pleased to term the monopoly of grain, prevented prices from rising at once to their natural rates. The province had a certain amount of food in it and this food had to last 9 months. Private enterprise, if left to itself, would have stored up the general supply at the harvest with a view to realizing a larger profit at a later period in the scarcity.

"Prices would in consequence have immediately risen, compelling the population to reduce their consumption from the very beginning of the dearth. The general stock would thus have been husbanded and the pressure equally spread over the whole 9 months instead of being concentrated upon the last 6."

The bloody phase of the French Revolution is associated with attempts at establishing and maintaining price control. After a period of deficiteering and tampering with the currency, the French found themselves in a period of rising prices. Their smugness and ill-based faith in their ability to flaunt age-old economic laws can be found in a statement before the French Assembly in 1791:

"The laws of political economy, however applicable in other times, are not applicable to this particular period, and, however operative in other nations, are not now so in France; the ordinary rules of political economy are perhaps suited to the minions of despotism but not to the free and enlightened inhabitants of France at the close of the eighteenth century."

Such a statement has a familiar ring. Today we are told that while price ceilings have failed in other instances and in other times, such will not be the case in this country. There is no valid basis for such a contention. Just because this is the United States and because this is 1946 does not mean that "it can't happen here." In his book Fiat Money Inflation in France, Andrew Dickson White relates:

"The third outgrowth of the vast issue of flat money was the maximum. As far back as November 1792 the Terrorist associate of Robespierre, St. Just, in view of the steady rise of prices of the necessaries of life, had proposed a scheme by which these prices should be established by law, at a rate proportionate to the wages of the working classes. This plan lingered in men's minds, taking shape in various resolutions and decrees, until the whole culminated on September 29, 1793, in the law of the maximum.

"While all this legislation was high-handed, it was not careless. Even statesmen of the greatest strength, having once been drawn into this flood, were borne on into excesses which, a little earlier, would have appalled them. Committees of experts were appointed to study the whole subject of prices, and at last there were adopted the great 'four rules' which seemed to statesmen of that time a masterly solution of the whole difficulty.

"First, the price of each article of necessity was to be fixed at one and one-third its price in 1790. Secondly, all transportation was to be added at a fixed rate per league. Thirdly, 5 percent was to be added for the profit of the wholesaler. Fourthly, 10 percent was to be added for the profit of the retailer. Nothing could look more reasonable. Great was the jubilation."

Being experts in revolutionary technique, the Jacobins chose to place iron control upon 39 necessities of life under the agency called Committee of Public Safety. They planned to coerce farmers, traders, merchants, and the public into a state-controlled economy for the benefit of the revolutionary party. However, as has been repeatedly the case down through the ages, the fiercest and most sustained opposition came from the farmers, who refused to become the pawns of a party machine.

The picture of what happened to the French revolutionary price control system runs true to pattern. Production came to a halt, hoarding multiplied, and bribery of officials became commonplace in every French village. In the meantime the people with special pull or with money were able to secure products in a vast black market. In spite of rough enforcement by tough administrators, the revolutionary price control office could not prevent the paralysis of the organs of supply and transport.

Bourne, in his book, Food Control and Price Fixing in Revolutionary France, writes:

"The arguments in the convention relative to the matter ran the whole gamut from the principle of economic liberty advocated by the economists of the day to the radical abstractions of Robespierre and his followers, who swept commerce aside by maintaining that 'the food necessary to man is sacred as life itself,' and 'the fruits of the earth, like the atmosphere, belong to all men.'

"One of the most interesting of the many suggestions made in the convention was that of Barbaroux who advocated 'a plan to form local associations to collect and circulate information about the crops. In other words, for coercion he would substitute cooperation, believing that the French citizens, farmers and merchants included, would not turn a deaf ear to an appeal for common action against the oncoming peril' (famine). Price fixing finally became one of the characteristic features of the reign of terror, and when Robespierre and his councilors passed through the streets of Paris in the carts of the executioners, the mob jeered, saying 'there goes the dirty maximum.'"

The history of France's efforts to maintain price ceilings differs from other countries because of the proposal to enlist the aid of both producer and consumer in the effort of the government to control the food supply in the interest of the people's welfare. Nevertheless, the system failed in France as elsewhere, primarily because supplies were withheld from the market places.

UNITED STATES, 1633 TO 1946

On March 29, 1946, OPA Administrator Paul Porter testified before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. Representative SMITH, of Ohio, asked if he knew of a single instance in history where price control had been effective in controlling inflation. Mr. Porter replied he did not know about previous price control experiments. "OPA is only 4 years old in this country," he said. "Because it hasn't worked in the past in other countries, doesn't mean we can't make it work here."

In making such a statement, is Mr. Porter guilty of mental juvenile delinquency? He may be excused for a lack of knowledge of the history of other nations and civilizations, but can he be excused for ignorance of the history of his own country? He is the one responsible for the administration of a law which determines the flow of our lifeblood. In this capacity, he should at least know the history of the mistakes of his own countrymen.

In view of the volumes that have been written on attempted price control in the United States since colonial times, Mr. Porter should know that price control was tried in all of the following States (or Territories which later became States) at various times. This is only a partial list of important price-control attempts. There are others too numerous to mention.

1. New England, 1620.
2. Virginia, 1631.
3. Michigan, 1627.
4. Maryland, 1636–1773.
5. Massachusetts, 1659–1777.
6. South Carolina, 1687.
7. New Hampshire, 1707.
8. Louisiana, 1717.
9. Georgia, 1754–68.
10. Illinois, 1764.
11. Connecticut, 1776.

12. Massachusetts, 1776–79.
13. Maine, 1777.
14. New Jersey, 1777.
15. Pennsylvania, 1777.
16. Rhode Island, 1777.
17. New York, 1778.
18. Mississippi, 1861.
19. Florida, 1861.
20. North Carolina, 1862.
21. Confederate States, 1862.
22. Alabama, 1864.
23. Utah, 1868.
24. Connecticut, 1887.

In his book, the History of New England, John Winthrop states that, in 1633:

"The scarcity of workmen have caused them to raise their wages to an excessive rate, so as a carpenter would have three shillings the day, a laborer two shillings and six pence, etc.; and accordingly those who had commodities to sell, advanced their prices sometimes double to what they cost in England, so as it grew to a general complaint, which the court, taking knowledge of, as also of some further evils, which were sprung out of the excessive rates of wages, they made an order that carpenters, masons, etc., should take but 2 shillings the day, and laborers but 18 pence, and that no commodity should be sold at above 4 pence in the shilling more than it cost for ready money in England; oil, wine, etc., and cheese, in regard to the hazard of bringing, etc. (excepted)."

William Weeden, in his book, Economic and Social History of New England, 1620–1789, writes:

"The colonial history of the United States affords many instances of the failure of fixed prices to remedy the evils they were designed to cure. The Governor and the council of New England fixed the price of beaver at 6 shillings in fair exchange for English goods at 30 percent profit, with the freight added. The scarcity of corn which was selling at 10 shillings 'the strike' led to the prohibition of its sale to the Indians. Under the pressure of this prohibition the price of beaver advanced to 10 shillings and 20 shillings per pound, the natives having refused to part with beaver unless given corn. The court was obliged to remove the fixed rate and the price which ruled was 20 shillings. An equally fruitless attempt was made to regulate the price of labor. These regulations were enforced for about 6 months and then were repealed."

Led by Connecticut and Massachusetts, the New England States went in for regulating prices early in the Revolutionary War. This emergency measure was motivated quite as much by the fact that the continental currency lost its monetary value as by the self-evident fact that British blockade created a severe shortage of consumers' goods. The inevitable result was that the 1774 price level soon broke down, and as early as the spring of 1777 Connecticut, Rhode Island and New Hampshire were forced to raise the level for maximum prices. In Rhode Island, however, the town of Providence objected strenuously. It directed its representatives in the legislature to fight such measures, as they created scarcity and produced animosity.

In Connecticut, Governor Trumbull warned in a public statement:

"If we affix a low price to provisions and articles of importation, we shall find that the farmer will cease to till the ground for more than is necessary for his own subsistence, and the merchant will not risk his fortune on a small and precarious prospect of gain."

The governor apparently was really advocating what later generations prefer to call "controlled inflation". The modern devices of economic deception—called farm subsidies—were then unknown in this country.

Soon the States, including New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, began to labor under keen misgivings, however, that price control—as such—was a deceptive technique. This discovery led to an interstate convention being called in New Haven in January, 1778. The war was still raging and the longed-for victory for independence still seemed far away. In a stampede of economic panic, the delegates voted, therefore, to adopt a price advance of 75 percent above the 1774 price level.

What was meant to be a radical cure threatened to become a disaster, since a runaway inflation soon began to encompass the national economic life. The Continental Congress very quickly realized that it had to reverse its policy in order to avert sure economic doom. In its meeting of April 8, 1778, it declared, therefore, to the sorely tried war-torn nation:

"It hath been found by experience that limitations on the prices of commodities is not only ineffective for the purpose proposed, but likewise productive of very evil consequence to the great detriment of the public service and grievous oppression of individuals."

The courageous and wise pronouncement by the Continental Congress had a reassuring effect upon the States. In fact, so much so that price fixing was permitted to lapse for about a year. During this period, the American people discovered that price fixing could not serve as a safeguard against the heavy inflation which their just war of independence gave them to carry as an additional price for freedom. They recognized this as an economic fact which proved that, measured in money values, they all were becoming poorer as together they were winning their freedom.

In 1779, the last brief attempt was made at price fixing as a remedy to control a deeply wounded war economy. On May 25, 1779, the town of Boston adopted a price schedule for 15 articles on a month-to-month basis. And in July of the same year, a State convention at Concord adopted a general price level, stipulating that "violators were to have their names published in the newspapers as enemies of the country." The background for this threat against violators was, of course, the fact that the very outcome of the whole war hung in the balance.

And as soon as the fortunes of war turned, the States rid themselves of the fruitless and scarcity-producing price-control system, which they had grasped in a moment of panic. It is to the undying glory of the men and women of the Revolutionary period that a whole year before Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown, all the States had already repealed their price-control laws.

That the American passion for economic freedom has deep roots in our history becomes clear when one reads the words of the president of Princeton—John Witherspoon—in a letter to George Washington:

"Fixing the prices of commodities has been attempted by law in several States among us, and it has increased the evil it was meant to remedy, as the same practice has done since the beginning of the world."

The United States Department of Agriculture—summing up a study of price control which that agency completed in 1922—stated:

"The history of government limitation of price seems to teach one clear lesson: That, in attempting to ease the burdens of the people in a time of high prices, by artificially setting a limit to them, the people are not relieved—but only exchange one set of ills for another which is greater.

"Among these ills are:

"1. The withholding of goods from the market, because, consumers being in the majority, price-fixing is usually in their interest;

"2. The dividing of the community into two hostile camps, one only of which considers that the government acts in its interests;

"3. The practical difficulties of enforcing such limitation in prices which—in the very nature of the case requires the cooperation of both producer and consumer to make it effective."

This is the same Department of Agriculture which—24 years later—has been given and has accepted the responsibility, under the Price Control Resurrection law, for food price control in the United States.

Recent world history offers additional proof of the economic weaknesses of the controlled, or collectivist state.

Russia, under Lenin and Trotsky, in 1917 established a government-controlled collectivist state. Italy, under Mussolini in the early twenties, followed with some slight variations. Germany, in the early thirties, accepted Hitler's national socialism and its controlled economy. During the same period Japan adopted rigid controls and complete regimentation, while the United States continued to operate under the individual initiative, private enterprise system.

World War II established that 180,000,000 Russians, after nearly 25 years of controlled economy and regimentation, were no match for 4,000,000 independent Finns, but could, and did, meet and repel the onslaught of the German military machine after they had been equipped with food and war matériel by the private enterprise system of the United States.

That same American system of private enterprise, while feeding and arming the allied nations, produced the individual initiative, the industrial production, the food, the money, the unlimited war matériel that overwhelmed and subdued the combined strength of the German-, Italian-, and Japanese-controlled economy, regimented war machines.

OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the attached editorial from the Daily Times, published in Mamaroneck, N. Y., Monday, July 26, 1948, entitled "Political Left-Overs."

For the first time since 1856—nearly a century ago—Congress has been called back into session during a Presidential election year. With the call issued by President Truman in connection with his acceptance speech, before a partisan convention and at a time when politics was paramount, no evidence exists that the action is aught but a political move of desperation. What if anything can be accomplished under such circumstances is doubtful.

There were left-overs from the last session of the Eightieth Congress, admittedly. But many of them were of such controversial nature, some touching upon foreign relations, that it was held best at the time to postpone action until after the election. As it is, the reconvened session may very well leave to foreign interpreters the impression that we are a divided America, an impression which can well weaken our position abroad in crucial times.

We have in this category of left-overs such items as a revision of the bill for admission of displaced persons, action on the international wheat agreement, the "loan" for United Nations headquarters, the charter of the International Trade Organization, the Mundt-Nixon bill for control of Communists, and the matter of statehood for Alaska. Action at this time on any or all of these measures could conceivably have foreign reactions.

On the domestic front, still awaiting action when Congress adjourned on June 20 was the proposal to impose price controls to slow down inflation, the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, President Truman's 10-point civil rights program which created such a furor at the Democratic National Convention, the bill for Federal aid to education, extension of social security, a bill for the National Science Foundation, action on universal military training—differing from the selective service which was voted—the tidelands oil bill to give States title to land under navigable waters within their borders, and the repeal of the Federal tax on colored oleomargarine.

Here, on both foreign and domestic issues, are sufficient jobs to keep a new Congress busy for a full year. That the reconvened Eightieth Congress can hope to handle any substantial portion of the program is not to be expected by any realist.

It will be best, perhaps, to expect of this summer session that it will live up to the motives which inspired its call—namely, plain partisan politics. Little more is in view.

The Meaning of Statutes—What Congress Says or What the Court Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Robert A. Jackson, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, before the American Law Institute on May 20, 1948:

THE MEANING OF STATUTES—WHAT CONGRESS SAYS OR WHAT THE COURT SAYS

(By Robert H. Jackson, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States)

It is an honor to greet this body of lawyers and a pleasure to see old personal friends as you gather for a work session in the Nation's Capital. It is altogether appropriate, of course, that a member of the Supreme Court participate in the welcoming rites. You represent the legal profession in a great undertaking to restate the law; I am sure it has not escaped your attention that the institution of which I am a member is actively engaged in the same enterprise. [Laughter.] The consideration that you show me on this occasion I take to be an example of the fine sportsmanship which should prevail among competitors. [Laughter.]

I was told by your president that "too elaborate an address is unnecessary." Your president is a master of the art of dressing up his desire for brevity in the cloak of forbearance for the speaker. But I shall say a few of the things that are on my mind, in spite of the admonition.

Some of us who began attending these sessions close to a quarter of a century ago look back on those days with a certain nostalgia. Perhaps we were all a little naive; perhaps I was more naive than the others. But as I remember it now, what may be called the "climate of opinion" at those earlier gatherings was quite different than it is today. The labor on the restatement of the law was commenced on the assumption that the body of private law as embodied in court decisions was reasonably settled and fairly stable—at least, that most of it would hold good while the restatement was being formulated. Of course, we knew that from time to time particular decisions would be overruled and that some rules of law would and ought to be changed by legislation. But we did not anticipate any fundamental change in the attitude of courts to the law itself, or toward its development with traditional regard for its continuity which is a characteristic of the common law method.

A SYSTEM OF LAWS DICTATED BY IDEOLOGICAL THEORIES

A few days ago, however, Lord Macmillan, known pleasantly to many of us, in lecturing on law and custom at St. Andrews University, said something that may awaken a response in you. It was this:

"The lover of our ancient laws and institutions, which we have inherited from our fathers, cannot but look on with some dismay at the process which we see daily in operation around us whereby the customary common law of the land, which has served us so well in the past, is being more and more superseded by a system of laws which have no regard for the usages and customs of the people, but are dictated by ideological theories.

"There will soon be little of the common law left either in England or in Scotland, and the statute book and the vast volumes of statutory rules and orders will take its place. The work of our courts is more and more concerned with the interpretation of often unintelligible legislation, and less and less concerned with the discussion and development of legal principles. Advocacy has consequently lost much of its intellectual interest and scope."

IMPATIENCE WITH GRADUAL GROWTH UNDER THE JUDICIAL PROCESS

When I read that, I could not help but think of our own Mr. Justice Cardozo, whose reverence for the common law and common-law methods was so poignantly expressed in his address at our third annual meeting almost 25 years ago. On that occasion he compared the common law to a magical coat described by one of Swift's characters—a coat which, it was said, would grow in the same proportions as the body of the wearer. Mr. Justice Cardozo said with some feeling that the common law had done just that—and that it was "still a good coat—far too good to be thrown away."

It is not easy from where I sit to judge whether Lord Macmillan's present fears or Judge Cardozo's earlier hopes represent current conditions in this country as a whole. The Supreme Court, except incidentally and not too successfully, was never an expounder of the common law. By Erie Railroad v. Thompkins (304 U. S. 64), and related cases, and by its practice of declining to review State-law questions in diversity cases, the Supreme Court has closed its own door to independent speculation as to common-law principles. What, therefore, appears to me as a decline in the place of the common law in our scheme of things may be a Washington disturbance which does not reach State courts or other Federal courts. But I suspect it is a part of a more or less world-wide impatience with a gradual and deliberate pace of growth under the judicial process.

The titanic struggle for power now being waged between nations and between classes within the nations is as much one to change legal systems as to change political or economic systems. This involves far more than changing rules of property to achieve greater socialization, far more than imposing a continental system of judicial procedure, far more than setting up a secret political police force. It goes to the very nature of the court itself and would alter the foundation on which our western civilization has built its legal systems.

COMMUNIST CONCEPT OF THE ROLE OF COURTS

The concept which dominates all Communist teaching has been stated by Soviet authority in these simple words: "The court has been, and still remains, as it ought to be according to its nature, namely, one of the organs of governmental power, a weapon in the hands of the ruling class for the purpose of safeguarding its interests."

The most striking feature of this concept is its primitive mingling in the court of the two functions that western civilization years ago divided between the courts and the legislature. This is not surprising, for it comes to us from a country whose legal institutions are at least 300 years behind the western world in legal development and which has had little experience with representative legislatures. It comes from a people whom the Renaissance, the Reformation and the great democratic awakening that followed our own and the French Revolution, have never touched. Their history has no Magna Charta, no bill of rights. Their heroes include no Lord Chief Justice Coke to remind the Czar that he rules "under God and the law," no Jefferson, no Montesquieux. Lenin, Stalin, and their compatriots stepped into a system of customary law deeply influenced by centuries of absolutism, and their view of the function of a court, instead of being an advance over ours, is simply an adherence to an old authoritarian practice.

LEGAL SYSTEM BASED ON JUDICIAL ACCEPTANCE OF LEGISLATION

Of course, we democratic peoples recognize that the policy of the law is, and should be, made by what you may call a "ruling class." Under our own system, legislation is shaped by a majority of the representatives of majorities of electors in the various constituencies. Our concept of the court presupposes its acceptance of decisions on policy by the legislative majorities that from time to time prevail, except where an overriding policy is set forth in the Constitution.

But when a ruling majority has put its commands in statutory form, we have considered that the interpretation of their fair meaning and their application to individual cases should be made by judges as independent of politics as humanly possible and not serving the interests of the class for whom, or a majority by whom, legislation is enacted.

The danger of the competition between our western and the eastern concept of courts is that the latter is so much easier to apply. To carry out the Soviet conception requires a judge only to know which side he is on. But to observe the democratic separation of functions so as to leave policy making to the political bodies and make the function of interpretation a professional matter, requires training, constant intellectual effort, deliberation, and detachment. And it is guided and aided by the experience of generations of common law judges found in the precedents.

COURTS OWE OBLIGATION OF FIDELITY TO THE LEGISLATIVE BODIES

But as the courts are obligated by the principles of our representative government to independence in construing the language of statutes, so they owe a similar obligation of fidelity to the legislative bodies in applying their policies. If the separation of functions is to be observed, it is necessary that the utmost clarity prevail in the communication of the legislative will as to policy. I read from time to time of laws enacted by Congress of which it is said it will require several years to learn how the courts will apply them and what meaning courts will give to them. Then, too, I occasionally learn of a statute that means one thing one year and another the next. This seems to be accepted as necessary and usual, but it really indicates that there is something wrong in the process by which law is communicated in this country. It will not do to blame all of this confusion on bad draftsmanship, appropriate as that criticism may be at times. It will not do to blame it all on the English language for its inexactness and lack of precision.

The unfortunate fact is that neither Congress in the choice of language it will use, nor the courts in the meanings they will ascribe to Congress, have really effective guidance from consistently accepted principles of interpretation. Of course, a complete and automatic code of interpretation is not possible. But in its 150 years of interpreting Federal statutes, the Supreme Court has been less willing to commit itself to considered guides to interpretation than have many of the State courts. Neither has Congress undertaken to formulate any comprehensive rules on this subject. For the individual justice to be left so much at large presents opportunity and temptation to adopt interpretations that fit his predilections as to what he would like the statute to mean if he were a legislator. Indeed, sometimes there is not much else to guide him.

PROBLEMS ARISING IN THE JUDICIAL INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES

The subject is too large and complicated for comprehensive treatment on this occasion. It involves inconsistent practices on such vexing problems as these: When will reenactment of a statute carry adoption of previous administrative regulations or court decision? When will consideration of a statute without changing it mean congressional approval of prior judicial interpretation? Statutes that impose criminal and civil penalties or create liabilities, or all of these, are sometimes said to be construed strictly, sometimes liberally, and sometimes a middle course is taken. Should there be a prescribed, uniform approach to such statutes and, if so, what should it be?

What attitudes should be taken toward statutes that contravene common-law doctrine, in a Federal system where there is no general Federal common law? How far will we go to construe a law so as to avoid raising a constitutional question? How shall our construction differ in the case of what lately is called "humanitarian legislation" from other enactments, which by contrast must be regarded as "inhumanitarian"—the tax laws perhaps—and how shall we as judges distinguish the one from the other?

RESORT TO LEGISLATIVE HISTORY IS OF DUBIOUS HELP

I, like other opinion writers, have resorted not infrequently to legislative history as a guide to the meaning of statutes. I am coming to think it is a badly overdone practice, of dubious help to true interpretation and one which poses serious practical problems for a large part of the legal profession. The British courts, with their long accumulation of experience, consider parliamentary proceedings too treacherous a ground for interpretation of statutes and refuse to go back of an act itself to search for unenacted meanings. They thus follow Mr. Justice Holmes' statement, made, however, before he joined the Supreme Court, that "We do not inquire what the legislature meant, we ask only what the statute means."

And, after all, should a statute mean to a court what was in the minds but not put into the words of men behind it, or should it mean what its language reasonably conveys to those who are expected to obey it?

The Constitution evidently intended Congress itself to reduce the conflicting and tentative views of its members to an agreed formula. It was expected to speak its will with considerable formality, after deliberation assured by three readings in each House. Its exact language requires executive approval, or enough support to override a veto. How far, then, should this formal text and context be qualified or amplified by expressions of one or several Congressmen in reports or debates which did not find place in the enactment itself?

There is a tendency to decrease the measure of the ambiguity which originally justified resort to legislative history. But even if the ambiguity is genuine and substantial, do we find more solid ground by going back of it? It is a poor cause that cannot find some plausible support in legislative history, which often includes tentative rather than final views of legislators or leaves misinterpretation unanswered lest more definite statements imperil the chance of passage.

A FORMAL STATUTE NO LONGER A SAFE GUIDE FOR LAWYER'S ADVICE

The custom of remaking statutes to fit their histories has gone so far that a formal act, read three times and voted on by Congress and approved by the President, is no longer a safe basis on which a lawyer may advise his client, or a lower court decide a case. This has very practical consequences to the profession. The lawyer must consult all of the committee reports on the bill, and on all its antecedents, and all that its supporters and opponents said in debate, and then predict what part of the conflicting views will likely appeal to a majority of the court. Only the lawyers of the capital or the most prosperous offices in the large cities can have all the necessary legislative material available. The average law office cannot afford to collect, house, and index all this material. Its use by the court puts knowledge of the law practically out of reach of all except the Government and a few law offices.

POLICY CONTROVERSIES WHICH GENERATED THE ACT ARE BROUGHT INTO THE COURT

But perhaps the most unfortunate consequence of resort to legislative history is that it introduces the policy controversies that generated the act into the deliberations of the court itself.

There is no greater aid to law enforcement, and to the judicial process generally, than clear understanding of what the law requires. This, no doubt, is what led Mr. Justice Cardozo to describe your restatement project as a "high enterprise." Confusion or conflict in comprehending the meaning of the law, while sometimes inevitable, should be reduced by every possible device. When Congress has in mind one thing, and its enactments are given different meanings in the courts, it results in repealers and amendments, sometimes retroactive and in confusion, litigation and controversies that weaken and discredit not only the judicial process but the law in general, and government itself.

Yet, as matters stand today, I do not see how Congress can know, even roughly, the effect that will ultimately be given to any language it may use. And I do not see how the bar can, with any large measure of confidence, advise clients in complicated business transactions what their liabilities or duties are.

STATEMENT OF BASIC PRINCIPLES OF STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION NEEDED

Though it would not dispel all the doubts which are inherent in the situation, it would help give objectivity to the process of interpretation and assurance to drafting of statutes, if we could have general acceptance by the bench as well as the bar of a few basic principles of statutory construction. Perhaps the Institute could devise a disinterested restatement that would commend itself as an acceptable standard for enactment by Congress, or for application by the courts.

Perhaps the situation requires an approach such as was adopted in devising the Federal rules. Do not misunderstand me—I am not now naive enough to think that if any such course were agreed upon nothing would be left to what Mr. Justice Cardozo called those "tentative gropings, those cautious experiments, those provisional hypotheses, that are part of the judicial process." I know that such full agreement is beyond the power of even this distinguished group of lawyers. And I suspect that, even if that millennium did arrive, we judges would perhaps slowly, but ever so surely, demonstrate that either because of its legislative history or despite it, "millennium" in fact, or in judicial contemplation at least, means much less than a thousand years.

Nevertheless, the problem confronts judges, and particularly Federal judges, every day; and it is worthy of any effort you might deem proper to make its eventual solution more likely and more immediate.

But I must not further offend against your president's injunction against an elaborate speech.

It is a fine thing that we have these meetings of our profession. Here we can haul each other over the coals and focus attention on trends of ill omen for the profession. And not least important is the fact that we can liquidate our conflicts and worries in social sessions. There, in those more mellow moments, we may continue discussion of this, or of less baffling subjects.

Anti-Inflation Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a recent press release expressing my views upon the bare minimum means which should be taken by Congress at this time to curb inflation.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the conclusion of the current hearings of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on anti-inflation proposals of the President, I want to take this opportunity to express my individual views on the serious problem we face.

As I have repeatedly stated since the President called Congress into special session to consider the heart-rending spectacle of rapidly soaring prices which directly affect every American, I have tried to consider every proposal in a nonpartisan manner. I started with no preconceived ideas; I end with no hard and fast conclusions. Rather have I listened with great attention to the fine presentation of facts and figures which the best minds in the country have given us in the limited time available.

Although I am unalterably opposed to price controls and rationing in a peacetime competitive economy, I am reluctantly of the opinion that the Republican Party should enact titles III and IV of the administration bill in the absence of an alternative plan. I trust that the President is aware of the tremendous import of these provisions and would fairly and vigorously use them. I, too, well remember, however, that he is the same President who, by his contradictory tactics, was responsible for the too rapid release of vital controls at the end of the war.

Addressing myself to the price-wage controls provision, I must state that I am not in any way convinced that it is workable. Particularly an illusion is the so-called wage-control section; with wages a major factor in the determination of prices, effective wage controls should be imposed, with a workable procedure for adjustments, particularly for those workers who are not adequately represented by strong collective-bargaining units. As to the remainder of the provisions in title III, I emphatically state that price controls cannot be conceived as a panacea. However, the President should be given stand-by authority as he has requested, the use of that authority being contingent upon definite findings of fact and adequate standards. Then the President stands completely responsible before the people, since he insists that this is the positive answer. Although I am not convinced, I state again that no alternative plan has been offered and I cannot with good conscience cry "politics" and go home.

The priorities and allocations provisions in title IV are perhaps more reasonable and equitable for fair distribution to the people of the country of vital products in short supply. Meat and steel are two such products which come quickly to mind. Although I once again cannot accept this provision unqualifiedly, I feel that the power should be given to the President on an emergency basis.

As a long-range proposition for the economic stability of the country, I am in favor of the raising of bank-reserve requirements as outlined by the Federal Reserve Board. However, nonmember banks must be included, in my opinion. Consumer-credit controls are also desirable for the present, as I have repeatedly stated. I must reiterate that this proposed legislation in the credit field, if enacted alone, will not, in my judgment, bring down prices in the short run. The American consumer must not in any way be hoodwinked into believing that it will.

In summary then, I do not wish to be a stumbling block in the face of reasonable evidence presented by competent men. The homes of the country are tragically burdened by excessively high living costs. Something constructive should be done.

Gold Reserves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the statement of Mr. WOLCOTT, chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee, which appears on page 9888, of the RECORD of August 5, and which reads as follows:

I would not discuss this at length were it not for the statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN], which might indicate that the action taken by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House and the action which we hope will be taken by the House today, will have a disastrous effect upon Government bonds.

I, offer for the RECORD the statement before the House Banking and Currency Committee on Tuesday, August 3, 1948, pages 465 to 475 of the committee hearings of the Honorable Marriner Eccles, vice chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

GOLD RESERVES

Mr. TALLE. But the change was made from 40 percent and 35 percent to an even 25 percent for both, in June of 1945. Would it not be desirable to move back to the larger percentages, under present conditions?

Mr. ECCLES. I do not think that would be desirable. I think it would do no immediate good and may well give the public a feeling that it was an anti-inflation action that was not effective and it would not do any good for the present.

At the present time the reserve requirements, if they were increased—the gold reserve requirements—if they were increased to 25 and 40, respectively, on currency and bank deposits with the Federal Reserve banks, it would require $16,069,000,000. The excess of gold now held by all of the banks of the Federal Reserve System is $5,717,000,000. But, as a practical matter, the excess amount is $4,642,000,000, because in practice we have found that you cannot get closer to 3 percent of the limit, within the limit. There is an operating ratio. So that I would say that if we increased the reserve requirements to 35 percent and 40 percent, you would have $4,600,000,000 of excess reserves. Therefore, there would be no pressure whatsoever upon the ability of the Reserve banks to expand currency to meet the public demand for currency, or to purchase Government securities in the market, or to make loans to member banks in order to provide reserves.

If the excess amount that I have mentioned disappeared, as it was used up, through an expansion of currency, or if inflation continued, or through an expansion of the purchase of Governments (bonds) by the Federal Reserve System in the support of the (bond) market, then, you would be up against this problem: The Federal Reserve System would be entirely unable to help the Government in its refunding operations, would be entirely unable to support the Government market, and we would likewise be unable to meet the increased demand for currency from the member banks whose customers required currency, and we would have to come back to Congress, as we did before, and say to the Congress: "You must reduce the (gold) reserve requirement because if you do not reduce the (gold) reserve requirement, the responsibility for a collapse in the Government bond market that should eventuate, or our inability to supply the banks with currency, and, in turn, their inability to be able to furnish it to their customers would seriously impair the whole banking system," and I am sure that the Congress would merely reduce the requirement again. But it does not make very much sense, it seems to me, to try to control the expansion and the contraction through the medium of an indirect gold standard. That is really what we are trying to do, and when we say we want to impose that reserve requirement, there is a much more honest and a much more direct way of dealing with the problem. It would amount to this: as the excess reserve got close to the limits, the smart people, the people that understood the restrictions, would immediately say: "Well the Federal Reserve System Open Market Committee now is limited, in its purchase of Governments. They will not be able to buy more than another billion dollars or another $500,000,000. Their limit is there. Or perhaps $2,000,000,000." So the big boys, the insurance companies, and others, might say, "I think we had better sell our securities to the Federal Reserve System while we know that they are able to support the market," and you may well have enough sale of Government (bonds) that they would use the excess reserve they held rapidly, whereas others would not use it at all, but the very fact that it had a limitation, the very limitation itself, could induce a lot of selling of Government bonds, which certainly would be undesirable and unnecessary, and I see no value whatever in changing to that, except if the Congress indirectly wanted to say to the Reserve System, "You shall not support the bond market." Or if they wanted to say,

"We are going to put you in a position where you cannot support the public credit."

I say the much more honest way to do that is to say, "Do not support the 2½ percent rate," and the other way is to not vote for appropriations or for tax reductions that create budgetary deficits, but support budgetary surpluses, so that the question of the Government being able to take care of its refunding can be accomplished without any help from the Reserve System. That is really the direct way of getting at it.

This is a Mr. Spar idea. I think Mr. Burgess also makes a point of it. I disagree fully and completely with both of them, and although Allen Sproul and I disagree on some things, we agree completely and fully on this issue, and so do all of the economists of the Reserve Board and the economists of the banks and all the presidents. And the people who talk about this one are what I call a few gold-standard money cranks.

Mr. TALLE. I recall when the change was made in 1945, that it was agreed by some people that deflation was just around the corner and that lower reserves would permit a greater expansion than the higher one. Just as now some people are arguing that what we face now is an expanding inflation, and that it would be better to bring the figures back.

Mr. ECCLES. That is fine, but let us bring the public debt down. The idea is you want to go back with these figures but you do not want to go back with the public debt. The action of Congress just recently would indicate that there is no intention of reducing the public debt, and, therefore, it is no time now to change the item. When you reduce the public debt substantially, then, you can talk about changing the ratio that was reduced in order to help meet the expansion of the public debt.

There is just one other point I would like to make—and this is a practical operating point: Unfortunately, each of the Reserve banks is required to carry gold against their particular note issues—gold and Government (bonds) and against their particular issue of currency. That, in one sense, we have 12 central banks. Some day I hope that can be changed. I argued before the appropriate Committee of Congress in 1945, and this committee eliminated, as I recall, these requirements. Senator Glass, in the Senate took a good deal of pride in the bill and continued to insist upon the gold requirements. We argued that there should be the one currency, and that the currency of the various Reserve banks should be interchangeable. We showed that it would save hundreds of thousands of dollars a year in the shipment of currency. We got nowhere. But now the very fact that we have, in 12 separate compartments, currency issues, gold reserve requirements, and Government bond portfolios, means that some banks may have a deficiency in gold, where others have a large excess.

Now, as a matter of fact, if you should increase reserve requirements to the 35 percent—gold reserve requirement, that is—and the 40 percent, respectively, and we maintained a 3 percent operating margin, as of July 31, there would be four banks that would be deficient in gold reserves, even though the 12 banks had an excess of $4,600,000,000. That would make it an extremely inconvenient operating job for no useful purpose.

Mr. TALLE. Are the deficits large?

Mr. ECCLES. No; they are not large.

Mr. TALLE. I think for June they amounted to a little over $105,000,000.

Mr. ECCLES. Well, they are not large. In fact, they are comparatively small. New York, as an example, one bank, has almost half of the entire excess. I have a statement with the arguments on this issue that I would like to put in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. You may put it in the record.

Resolutions of Reserve Officers' Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in submitting for the information of the Congress, the resolutions adopted by the twenty-second national convention of the Reserve Officers' Association:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY ROA'S TWENTY-SECOND NATIONAL CONVENTION

COLORADO DEPARTMENT, DENVER CHAPTER

Be it resolved, That the ROA convention assembled at Denver June 16–19, 1948, sincerely and wholeheartedly thank the Colorado department and the Denver chapter for their all-out effort in entertaining the 1948 Reserve Officers Association national convention.

ELECTED OFFICERS—NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS

Resolved by the ROA, That the delegates in attendance extend their thanks to the several elective officers of the association who have served during the past year. Their devotion to duty, their willingness to give time and energy to the affairs of the association and to the cause of national security is appreciated;

Further resolved, That the association congratulates and commends the present leadership of national headquarters for their accomplishments in the advancement of the Reserve program and the affairs of the association.

Further resolved, That the association extends its thanks and good wishes to the staff of national headquarters for their loyalty, sustained interest, and cooperative spirit as manifested in their work and in their voluntary willingness to accept readjustments in salary so that the expenses of the association could be kept within the anticipated income.

ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEES

The ROA extends to the members of the Armed Services Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States our deepest appreciation for their intelligent and untiring efforts in furtherance of national defense during the current session of the Congress. A copy of this resolution shall be sent to each member of said committees by the national headquarters.

COMMENDATION, H. R. 2744

Whereas the bill designated in the House as H. R. 2744 has passed both the House of Representatives and the Senate including title III amended which provides for retirement pay for civilian components:

Be it resolved, That the ROA extend its appreciation and congratulations to the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force for cooperation and assistance in preparing and presenting this valuable legislation as an incentive for long-term and efficient service in the civilian components.

Also that copies of this resolution be furnished to the secretaries of each of the three departments.

RESERVE UNITS

Resolved, That the ROA call upon the Department of Defense for a directive requiring the immediate organization of reserve units in every community in the country to which there would be assigned all of the available reserve officers and men who live in the communities so organized.

THE NEBLETT PLAN

Resolved, That this convention commend Col. William H. Neblett for his leadership during the past year. His initiative in proposing new plans for the National Security has excited the enthusiasm of our membership, and it is believed that the plans should be given detailed and careful study. It is therefore further resolved, that the plan so presented in the address of Colonel Neblett to the convention be referred to the National Executive Committee, and National Council for study, and any action which they deem advisable, including submission to the armed forces committees of the Congress and the Department of Defense.

NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

Whereas the draft of a new National Defense Act has been proposed by the Department of Connecticut: Be it

Resolved, That the ROA submit this draft to the executive committee of the Reserve Officers Association of the United States for careful study in conjunction with the plan of the National President ROA for a single unified citizen military force.

RESERVE PROGRAM

Be it resolved, That the complete implementation of the Reserve program be predicated on present conditions without reference to and unaffected by pending legislation for UMT, or the status of the National Guard program.

PAY READJUSTMENT ACT

Be it resolved by the ROA, That a pay readjustment act for officers of the services be adopted by the Congress of the United States at the earliest possible date.

NAVAL RESERVE ACT

Resolved by the ROA, That this organization indorses the Naval Reserve Act of 1948, popularly known as the Roper Report, and recommends its enactment by the Congress as the basic law governing the Naval and Marine Corps Reserve.

ENLISTED RESERVE ASSOCIATION

Resolved, That the ROA sponsor, assist, encourage, and in every practicable way promote the growth and expansion of the Enlisted Reserve Association and that close liaison between the two organizations be maintained through the three national junior vice presidents of the Reserve Officers Asscciation.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

Whereas the national defense is primarily dependent upon the civilian components of the armed services, including the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, the Air, Navy, and Marine Reserves; and

Whereas voluntary recruiting cannot provide the manpower for the civilian components; and

Whereas temporary selective service is an emergency measure only and does not provide a long-term flow of soldiers, sailors, and airmen for the civilian components, and

Whereas universal military training is the best means by which these components can obtain the necessary manpower to be prepared for any national emergency: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the ROA, That the Congress should immediately enact a universal military training bill.

ROA RESOLUTIONS

Resolved, That the executive director compile in booklet form, for appropriate distribution the important resolutions of the twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second conventions, which constitute the announced policy and program of this association, to the end that the members, and the friends of the association may have this material for study and use.

IDENTIFICATION CARDS

Be it resolved, That the ROA national headquarters arrange with the Department of the Army and Department of the Air Force for immediate issuance of proper identification cards for the use of Reserve officers.

COMPOSITE GROUPS

Be it resolved by the ROA, Having learned from the address of the Chief of Staff, June 18, 1948, that composite groups are to be eliminated, desires to express its approval of this action.

Whereas the Department of the Army and Department of Air have not completed an adequate peacetime Reserve program; and

Whereas during this period of reorganization many officers of superior military knowledge and ability are becoming overage in grade; and

Whereas in the interest of national defense it is vitally necessary to keep these officers in a branch of the service in which they have wartime experience to stimulate and maintain the interest of all Reserve officers: Now, be it

Resolved, That the ROA go on record as urging the Department of the Army and the Department of the Air to institute without delay regulations necessary whereby a board of officers be appointed in each locality, this board to have authority to review the records of such officers and recommend justified promotions.

RESERVE TRAINING

Be it resolved by the ROA, That existing armories, airfields, and other facilities of the armed forces should be made available for Reserve training by all branches of the armed services, regardless of the component or service to which such facility is allocated.

APPRECIATION OF MISSION

Be it resolved, That the ROA support inclusion in the training curriculum of all Reserve forces of discussion and lectures presenting an appreciation of the mission of each of the three services and opportunities for joint training wherever possible.

UNIFORM ALLOWANCE

Be it resolved, That the ROA support legislation authorizing continued payment of initial uniform allowance for newly commissioned officers and a periodic uniform maintenance allowance for Army and Air Force Reserve officers similar to that now paid by the Navy.

RESERVE PROMOTION POLICY

Whereas the interim promotion policy for Reserve Officers is vague, ineffective and applies only to those officers fortunate enough to be assigned to a TO/E organization; and

Whereas this results in a discrimination against those officers of superior military knowledge and ability who, because of the limited number of TO/E units in each locality, are assigned to composite groups; and

Whereas these officers are expected to attend periods of instructions, complete a minimum number of service correspondence school courses, display great interest in Reserve affairs, serve on active duty and give of their time in an amount greatly in excess of the moneys that will be received under the recently enacted inactive duty training pay law; and

Whereas such lack of uniformity is detrimental to the national defense; and

Whereas promotion in grade is the greatest reward that can be bestowed upon those officers who so willingly give of their services and time in the interest of national defense: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the ROA go on record as urging the Department of the Army and the Department of the Air Force to institute without further delay such regulations as are necessary to formulate a definite Reserve promotion policy. This policy to include the minimum requirements of military efficiency, ability, amount of active duty time, number of correspondence school courses successfully completed, time in grade or age at which promotion will be automatic, provided efficiency and other requirements are met. This regulation is designed to place the civilian components of the Department of the Army and the Department of Air Force in parity with the Regular Establishments.

MILITARY LEAVE

Whereas it is essential for national security that all members of the civilian components in the employ of States, and other political subdivisions as well as private business being encouraged to remain active in the services; and

Whereas to assist in their training it is desirable that members of the civilian components be given appropriate military leave in addition to some vacation time with pay; and

Whereas there are enlisted men of the armed forces who are also Reserve officers, who do not receive military leave for active duty training as officers: Be it resolved, That the appropriate action be taken and heartily endorsed by the ROA to institute an educational campaign to further this program.

EQUALIZATION OF BENEFITS

Be it resolved by the ROA, That the Congress of the United States be requested to grant the same protection and benefits to military personnel who suffer disability for those ordered to active duty for less than 30 days as is now granted to those ordered to duty for more than 30 days.

(NOTE.—Legislation such as proposed H. R. 1058 and S. 335 (80th Cong.) which would amend the act of June 15, 1936, that supplement par. 10 of AR 35-3420 dated February 1946, would correct this inequality.)

DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS

Be it resolved by the ROA, That the Secretary of Defense be urged to undertake prompt action within the armed forces to bring about an allocation and distribution of accumulated funds which comprise the undistributed profits from the operation of now inactive officers' clubs and from the operation of post exchanges during World War II; be it further

Resolved, That these funds be used to provide housing facilities and equipment to be used for recreational and instructional purposes and for training functions on a subsequent self-sustaining basis for Reserve officers.

SPACE—FACILITIES

Whereas many organized Reserve units, especially of the Army and Air Force, lack armories, administrative headquarters, and other facilities: Be it

Resolved by ROA, That it is recommended that immediate action be taken by the Department of Defense to prevent sale or other disposal of armed services installations until the needs of Reserve units have been fully met; and be it further

Resolved, That district engineers and other authorities responsible for leasing of space for Reserve units give higher priority to this activity to eliminate delays that have prevailed to give Reserve units the facilities they need for adequate training.

SUPPLIES—EQUIPMENT

Be it resolved by ROA, That higher priorities for supplies and equipment for Reserve units be redefined and a more equitable distribution of equipment to these units be effected without delay.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Be it resolved by ROA, To recommend to the Congress that assistant secretaries for civilian components be appointed in the Departments of Army, Navy, and Air Force; and be it further

Resolved, That the officer of the executive for Reserve and Reserve Officers Training Corps affairs in the Department of the Army and in the Department of the Air Force be directly subordinate to the Chief of Staff; and be it further

Resolved, That an Organized Reserve Bureau be established in the Department of the Army and in the Department of the Air Force.

OVERSEAS TRAINING

Whereas there has been called to the attention of the ROA the apparent need for the establishment of a training program and an office in Europe for Reserve officers affairs,

Be it resolved by the ROA, That we refer the implementation of a training program and the establishment of such an office for Reserve officer affairs to the executive committee of the ROA and the executive of Reserve affairs of the Armed Services, for their careful thought, study, and consideration.

ALIEN VETERANS

Resolved by the ROA, That we approve the passage by Congress of H. R. 5780, permitting honorably discharged alien veterans to enter and remain in the United States on the principle that a man who fights for the United States is good enough to live in the United States.

MILITARY JUSTICE

Resolved by the ROA, That we approve the principles of the bill, H. R. 2575, pertaining to military justice recently passed by the House of Representatives, and now pending in the Senate, our approval including but not limited to that portion of the bill providing for an independent Judge Advocates Corps, as defined and considered in the House Report No. 1034 accompanying H. R. 2575, and we urge the Senate to pass this bill. (Note: This bill was approved by Congress during the convention.)

COMMUNISM

Whereas the creeping paralysis of communism has caused the subjugation of more than 100,000,000 peoples in Europe and some 200,000,000 peoples in Asia alone since VE-day; and

Whereas the current fifth column in America is estimated to be composed of 6,000,000 members of Communist and Communist-front organizations seeking by subversive and other treasonable means to soften up this Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the ROA encourages its departments and chapters to engage upon those educational and other constructive measures which will both expose and reduce this vicious threat to national security and world peace.

TRAINING PAY

Whereas the inactive duty training pay law for the Army and Air Reserves has been passed by Congress; and

Whereas there has been no appropriation of funds by the Congress for the implementation of this law; and

Whereas, the National Guard and Navy Reserves are now receiving inactive duty training pay; be it

Resolved by ROA, That the Congress be requested to appropriate without delay the necessary funds to put the inactive duty training pay law for the Army and Air Reserves into effect.

AIR FORCE TRAINING

Whereas many Air Reserve pilots in outlying areas are being dropped because of noncompliance with reserve training requirements; and

Whereas there is furnished only sufficient training personnel and training equipment to adequately serve the large areas: Be it

Resolved, That the ROA go on record as urging the Air Force to decentralize and make available without delay sufficient air instruction personnel and sufficient equipment so that officers in outlying areas may retain their flying status more readily and more conveniently.

Britain Spends Your Money

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bristol (Pa.) Courier of August 4, 1948:

BRITAIN SPENDS YOUR MONEY

On June 19 Congress got together on the Marshall plan and agreed to turn over to President Truman $6,030,710,228 of your money for him to give away in Europe—our first installment of the European recovery program expected to total twenty billions in 4 years.

A few days later, the Socialist government in Great Britain made an announcement which, on the face of it, seemed to have no connection with the action of Congress. The labor government put its "cradle-to-grave" social-security system into operation, effective July 5.

This new social-security program for Great Britain commits the government to do the following:

Pay all doctors' bills for all the British people; give them free hospital, surgical, and specialist treatment; provide all medicines free; supply free eyeglasses, hearing aids, artificial limbs and other such appliances; give free dental care, along with free false teeth; give sick benefits to all, at the rate of $5.20 a week for single men, $9.90 to married couples with one child, and so forth; maternity allowances of $109.60 to working mothers and $32 for unemployed mothers for each baby; a $1-a-week allowance for all children, regardless of father's status; industrial injury benefits starting at $11 a week for 26 weeks for single persons, more for married; old-age pensions of $5.20; death grants of $80 for funeral expenses; and special payments for widows and orphans.

Obviously, this is going to cost the British Government a great deal of money. How much, no one can say. The program is so garbled with insurance terms that the estimates don't make sense.

Besides, the actual dollars-and-cents cost of the program will be but a drop in the bucket to the devastating damage which such a collectivist program will do to the spirit of self-reliance, integrity and enterprise which led the British people, in an earlier generation, to dominate the world.

The really interesting question about the cost, however, is this: "Where does the British Government expect to get the money?"

The government itself is, by any economic yardstick, "busted." No one will lend it any more money—it hasn't been trying to pay its debts since the First World War. Its own finances are too tangled to be workable. Even with its ventures in nationalizing industries, in which it swaps printing-press bonds for valuable properties such as banks, mines, railroads, and so forth, it still has no surplus with which to pay for these new gifts to its people.

Government budgets have been operating at a deficit since the war, so far as domestic taxes versus expenses are concerned.

So, where is the money coming from?

The answer is easy—painfully easy.

The British Government expects the American people to foot the bill. They expect you to dig down in your jeans, or into the sugar bowl in the kitchen, for extra hidden taxes on everything you buy. You are helping foot the bill for the liberality of the British Socialists every time your tax deduction is made out of your wages by your boss. You will foot some more of the bill when you settle up your income taxes next January.

That's the reason why the British Socialists didn't dare announce an effective date for their program until they were certain that the Marshall plan would get by Congress in a sufficient size to pay for their social-security scheme.

Original estimates were that the British Government would get about one-third of the 4-year Marshall plan. Thus far, in the first-year $6,000,000,000 appropriation, the allotments to various countries have been piecemeal, so that the exact share for Britain isn't clear. But she's right up at the top. Last figures were that she and France were running neck and neck for first place.

The facts speak for themselves. All the denials in the world won't change them.

You, as an American citizen and taxpayer, are being forced to pay over part of your money to help the tottering Socialist regime in England try to buy its way back into the confidence and support of the British electorate.

Do you feel that you owe Great Britain anything after canceling $20,000,000,000 of loans to her after the First World War, after giving her much more than that in lend-lease, after helping rescue her from defeat by the Germans and the Japs, and after giving her $4,000,000,000 only 2 years ago?

Nobody has got around to asking how you feel about having your money grabbed by your Government and given over to the British, to finance their schemes in socialism. As a matter of fact, there seems to be a sort of conspiracy of silence in this country to try to keep the American people from realizing that this is the biggest single purpose of the Marshall plan. But that's a fact. England, who ought by now to be getting back on her own feet, is receiving far more of the ERP allocations than is Germany, which is prostrate; or than Italy, which is struggling desperately; or than any of the war-devastated nations shown so often in the newsreels.

Probably the reason why it was decided long ago to soft-pedal the fact that the lion's share of the Marshall plan goes to England has to do with the unhappy results of the British loan we made back in 1946. That scheme didn't work so well; it left a bad taste.

We gave England $4,000,000,000 as a 50-year loan. It was supposed to last her 5 years, and she spent it in 18 months. No one seriously thinks today she will ever repay it. Another proposed "loan" of that nature would be laughed out of Congress.

What did the British Socialists do with that money? They used it first to help nationalize industry—not directly, but by freeing other funds for that purpose. They used it second to cut their own taxes. Their first budget under our $4,000,000,000 loan, as a result, was $3,000,000,000 in the red. On the floor of Parliament it was said that the American purchases under the loan were largely for movies and tobacco.

This first loan was a terrible mistake—not so much from our point of view, for after all we could afford to lose the money if we had to—but from the point of view of the British people. Why? Because it made them think that socialism was working out—that there was actually something in the screw-ball ideas invented long ago by Karl Marx and others.

As noted above, the British Socialist Government squandered the money—your money—in 18 months. Then it woke up in a jam. Once more it was broke. Meanwhile, it had made a mess of everything it touched in Great Britain. Its grip on the British people was slipping. Something new and dramatic was needed to reestablish public support. Hence the need to put the Beveridge "cradle-to-grave" scheme into operation.

Their friends in the Truman administration didn't dare ask Congress for a new British loan, after what had happened to the first one. Therefore the new loan was wrapped up and hidden in the Marshall plan, which was sold to the American people as a program of keeping babies from starving in the bombed areas of Germany, Italy, and other war-devastated nations.

But you are paying the bills. You are paying for extravagant social benefits, some of them completely silly, for people whom you never met in England—and people who haven't done much for you, recently, except take your money with a good deal of grumbling about it.

You are helping to subsidize a form of government in Great Britain which you wouldn't tolerate in your own country—a form which would have collapsed before this, if you hadn't been paying its bills; a form, incidentally, which is far closer to that now used in Russia than anything else on earth.

And your money is being used for the political purpose of trying to fool the British voters into thinking that their form of socialism is workable, practical, and already becoming so wealthy that it can pay their personal expenses for them.

How do you like it?

Hierarchy of "Musts"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following very fine editorial, printed in the Los Angeles Daily News on Thursday, July 29, 1948:

HIERARCHY OF MUSTS

Americans have learned to be tolerant of a certain amount of nonsense and hokum in political campaigns. They even wink at a measure of plain lying if it is wrapped in attractive propaganda. This attitude will be continued to some extent in the coming campaign.

There are certain things the voters should know, however, so that whatever tolerance they care to manifest for buncombe may be moderated more closely in accord with the facts of life.

America is confronted with a series of threats that stand as challenges to our sound judgment. They are challenges that may be met only partially on a partisan or even on a political basis. They can't be ignored and they can't be dodged without considerable danger to our economy.

This is no new crossroads or new crisis. It is simply a case of a stepped-up tempo in some old ones that we have sought to exorcise by words, by wishful thinking, or by pretending they weren't really there.

The first challenge to our sense and our well-being is the threat of war. Without in any way proposing that we appease or mollify the men in the Kremlin, who neither give nor ask quarter, it can be said in all candor that a war waged for anythig short of survival would be disastrous.

That would not be because we have any reason to fear defeat. If those with low I. Q.'s need reassurance on that score let it be said here and now that America can lick Russia thoroughly. But, suppose we licked Russia? What have we won? Who wins an earthquake? Would a defeat of the Soviet Union, no matter how thorough and lasting, solve the problems confronting the United States? Would we be any happier? Would our honor be more secure?

Would a million dead men and two million crippled men, most of them extremely young, bring us anything approaching Utopia? Would ruined and leveled cities do it? Would Nation-wide impoverishment do it?

This is not and is not intended to be an argument against defense or any kind of intelligent preparedness. It is an argument against the madness called war which is opposed more ardently by the rank and file who have been through it than by anyone else. It is intended to suggest that the No. 1 question facing us is whether we can devise by legislative or other means some way to keep the small cliques in power in front of and behind the iron curtain from plunging us into something that would devastate most of the civilized world.

Next on the priority list for America to ponder and act on without delay is inflation. If we permit the cost of living to run away from normal controls—and Congress seems to have done something like that—it will spell poverty for millions. It will spell unemployment. It will spell an unrest that will drive vast masses of the population toward any "ism" or blatant leader that can promise relief. It will wind up in a depression that will be deeper, wider, and more terrible than any we have known.

That's not scare talk. That's the kind of things they are saying to each other in Wall Street. Organs of financial interests are saying it in print. Financial editors are predicting that the Republicans will be elected and that the next President will have prosperity blow up right in his face. We are not anti-Republican enough to want that to happen just to prove we should not have a Republican President.

We must find a way to control inflation, to prevent more of it, and to turn the spiral of prices, whether for commodities, services, or labor, back to a level nearer the norm on the basis of past experience and in the light of the general well-being.

The third item on the list of "musts" is housing. Because they do not see the need for more homes too many persons who are well housed do not realize its existence. They go so far as to deny it. The real situation is not pretty. Briefly it is this: In every large city in the East and Middle West shacktowns and trailer camps have sprung up. They are visible from trains and busses and local authorities do not know what to do about them.

These shacktowns and camps are not just something that a few million dollars could correct in a few weeks. They call for large scale outlay. They call for planning. They call for many social adjustments. Leaving rents virtually uncontrolled and leaving housing entirely to private industry have not brought the results the leaders of free enterprise promised. We wish they had. We still believe in free enterprise. But free enterprise must be pushed a little—not pushed around but straight ahead. It must be helped.

An America of shacktowns means disease. It means crime. It means deteriorating morals. It means lower real-estate values.

The President has called the Congress into special session to wrestle with these challenges and others. Congress calls it a political trick. If Congress really wishes for a political triumph let it act on them, and do something about them and the people will make a decision about who deserves the credit. They will put it about where it belongs.

The time has come for us to act democracy as well as talk it.

Changes in the Republican Platform Forecast the Inability of Governor Dewey To Lead the Republican Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the titular head of the Republican Party by reason of his defeat for the Presidency in 1944 and his nomination for another try in 1948 has been conspicuous by his silence at this special session of Congress. Although he has sent emissaries to Washington to remind the Republican Members of Congress to mind their manners and to listen respectfully to President Truman's program to combat high prices and the housing shortage, Governor Dewey has remained silent on these critical problems. He has promised to cover inflation in his campaign speeches, but by his silence he has admitted his inability to persuade the Republican leaders of the Eightieth Congress to take any effective action to help the people.

Perhaps Governor Dewey is justified in maintaining his silence. The open rebuff at the hands of the Republican leaders of his efforts to amend the discriminatory Displaced Persons Act may be proof that Dewey could never be more than a figurehead in the Republican Party. There is other evidence that this is so.

At Philadelphia a subcommittee was put in charge of preparing a tentative draft of the 1948 Republican platform. This tentative draft contained many fine promises—most of them utterly inconsistent with the reactionary record of the Republican Eightieth Congress. When this draft was finally adopted by the Republican Convention, however, many of its most significant provisions had been mangled beyond recognition. The hand of old high-tariff Joe Grundy was omnipresent. Indeed, it was accurately observed that the old obstructionist 1940 firm of Martin, Barton and Fish had been reorganized with Grundy as the senior member. The 1948 stationery now reads Grundy, Martin, Dewey and Pew. Mr. Speaker, I made a comparison of the tentative draft of the Republican platform with the final draft, and the changes indicate pretty well that the special interests continue to control the Republican Party today just as they have always done in the past. These changes in the Republican platform forecast the inability of Governor Dewey or anyone else to lead the Republican Party or the Republican Congress to higher ground.

Mr. Speaker, some of the principal changes to which I refer include the following:

First. Atomic energy: The Republican Party had the first opportunity to prepare a platform of governmental principles since the arrival of the atomic age.

In accord with the practice of the Eightieth Congress in making a football out of atomic energy—first in respect of the nomination of David Lilienthal, and, second, in the juggling of the terms of the members of the Atomic Energy Commission—the Resolutions Committee struck out of the subcommittee draft the single, solitary reference to atomic energy. There is no promise of continued civilian control and development to the public benefit. The Republican Party clearly demonstrates that it is still living in the prehistoric day of the dinosaurs.

Second. Public power: The Resolutions Committee struck out the pledge of the subcommittee to make adequate appropriations for the progressive development of the Nation's water power resources. The sell-out to the private utilities is completely consistent with the record of the Eightieth Congress in cutting appropriations for the development and distribution of public power for the benefit of all the people.

Third. Taberism: The subcommittee draft made the following statement about the attempted scuttling of the Marshall plan by the House Committee on Appropriations: "We will implement with appropriations any commitment made by legislative enactment." The isolationists of the Republican Party had their day in the Resolutions Committee, which struck out this commitment. This constitutes an admission that, once the campaign is over, Mr. TABER again will be the real power in formulating Republican foreign policy.

Fourth. Reciprocal-trade agreements: The subcommittee draft contained two specific statements in support of reciprocal-trade agreements. In the Resolutions Committee, however, the Smoot-Hawley high-tariff influence of Pennsylvania's boss, Joe Grundy, prevailed, and the final draft of the GOP platform supports only a system of reciprocal trade without commitment to the Hull program of reciprocal-trade agreements. This is the traditional Republican addiction to protectionism at the expense of stagnation of our trade and commerce, incorporated in the Gearhart bill on reciprocal trade as passed by the House, which Secretary Marshall found so objectionable that he advised Congress,

"Under the circumstances I think our national interests would be better served to permit the Trade Agreements Act to expire than for H. R. 6556 to be enacted." Fortunately, some of the worst provisions were taken out in the Senate, but the bill finally sent by Congress was signed by the President with a statement of regret over the failure to renew the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for the customary 3-year period and the new, complicated, time-consuming and unnecessary procedure for the negotiation of reciprocal-trade agreements. So, we can only hope, with justifiable apprehension, that the Dewey deal with Grundy and Martin for the timely switch of the Pennsylvania delegation to the Dewey bandwagon does not ring the death knell for reciprocal-trade agreements.

Fifth. Taxes: The subcommittee draft suggested that in reducing taxes one of the considerations should be to relieve persons of limited income who suffer from inflation. The Resolutions Committee and the convention rejected any such suggestion of concern for low-come taxpayers. In view of the Knutson rich-relief income tax reduction bill, it would have been mockery to do anything else. The full committee, moreover, added a suggestion of repeal of the Federal estate and gift taxes, which have already been reduced by 30 percent by a technical section tucked away in the so-called income-tax bill.

Sixth. Social security: In 1944 the Republican Party pledged to abandon its opposition to social security and advocated "extension of existing old-age insurance and unemployment insurance systems to all employees not already covered." The 1948 drafting subcommittee, apparently aware of the record of the Eightieth Congress in depriving nearly 1,000,000 workers and their families of social-security protection, over the veto of President Truman, limited the 1948 pledge to extension of old-age insurance "to cover all employed persons." Even this was more than the resolutions committee could accept, and the commitment to extend coverage to all employed persons was deleted.

Seventh. Federal aid to education: Federal aid to the States on a "just basis to increase educational opportunities without Federal control" came to the same end in the resolutions committee and in the Republican convention as did Senator TAFT'S bill for Federal aid to education in the Eightieth Congress. The tentative plank was abandoned.

Eighth. Tidelands: Although not in the subcommittee draft, the resolutions committee made an express concession to the most powerful lobby to appear on the Washington scene in recent years. The abandonment of the interest of all the people in the mineral resources beyond our coast line to special interests in general—and the oil companies in particular—which admittedly failed in the Eightieth Congress because of the threat of veto by President Truman, has now been solemnly promised by the Republican national convention.

While GOP disregard for the everyday problems of the average American family is reaffirmed in the failure to outline a practicable program against the high cost of living, or to do anything about housing, these little-noticed changes in the tentative platform prepared by the drafting subcommittee stress that the Old Guard of the Republican Congress still are in control on anything that really counts. There are a couple of new faces on the billboards, but the men who put them up are the same disciples of reaction.

The candidates, regardless of their personal view, are wed by the shackles of the Republican platform, which is, and must be, the record of the Eightieth Congress. Governor Dewey has described it as a "magnificent statement of principles. You unanimously adopted it. I proudly support it." In his acceptance speech Governor Warren finally broke down and said something nice about the Republican Congress—something that he had conspicuously omitted throughout his campaign for first place on the ticket.

The issues are clear. The American people will not reject the progressive leadership of President Truman for a couple of candidates who apparently can do nothing more than mimic the reactionary record of the Eightieth Congress.

The Canadian Experience Is the Best Proof of the Effectiveness of the President's Proposal To Impose Selective Price Controls on Scarce Commodities

OF

HON. FRANK M. KARSTEN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KARSTEN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, President Truman's program for selective price controls has been challenged by the Republicans. In my opinion the Canadian experience is the best answer to this opposition.

The Republicans charge the President's proposal to impose selective price controls on scarce commodities is ineffective. Price controls must be imposed either on all commodities or on none at all.

The very opposite is true. The present situation is totally different from the situation which we had during the war. During the war, we had a terrific discrepancy between purchasing power and civilian supplies and consequently we needed all our controls. Today, production has caught up with demand in many areas and those areas do not require controls. However, in other fields scarcities are still acute, and in those fields we need controls.

That selective price controls can be highly effective is demonstrated by the experience of our neighbor, Canada. Canada has continued the system of selective price controls, and, as a result, Canada's cost of living increased by only 52 percent over that of 1935–39, while the American cost of living has increased 72 percent. Canadian food prices have increased 78 percent while American food prices have increased 114 percent. For every dollar an American spends today for food, clothing or rent, a Canadian has to spend only 75 cents.

On the same day in June 1948, Canadians paid 53 cents for sirloin steak and Americans had to pay 85 cents; Canadians paid 69 cents for butter, Americans paid 90 cents; Canadians paid 29 cents for hamburger, Americans paid 55 cents.

The Increase in Gold Reserve Requirements of the Federal Reserve Bank, as Passed by the House, Might Be Disastrous

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the limited bill passed by the House for the restriction of bank credit is both an ineffective and dangerous anti-inflation measure to the economy as a whole.

The President's proposal to increase reserve requirements of member banks of the Federal Reserve System by itself and alone would not be sufficient to curb inflation. However, it would be useful as one of the elements in the comprehensive inflation-control program as outlined in the eight points of the President's message.

The increase in the gold reserve requirements of the Federal Reserve Banks as now proposed by the House Banking and Currency Committee would make no contribution whatsoever to the fight against inflation, but if adopted, might be of disastrous consequences to the economy as a whole.

Although at the present time all Federal Reserve banks combined are holding gold certificate reserves in excess of the proposed new requirements, these reserves are unevenly distributed among the 12 Federal Reserve banks, and the reserve of several banks would be insufficient to cover the new requirements.

According to the testimony presented by Marriner Eccles before the House Banking and Currency Committee, the new proposal might precipitate the kind of money panic which the Federal Reserve System was created to prevent.

Furthermore, the new requirements might jeopardize the ability of some Reserve Banks to supply credit to their member banks and compel the Federal Reserve System to abandon support of the Government-bond market.

The Republican proposal, while completely ineffective in the fight against inflation, might precipitate a run on the currency and the collapse of the bond market.

Agricultural Conditions

OF

HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by me before the Kentucky Farm Bureau in Louisville, Ky., January 9, 1948.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Allen and members of the Kentucky Farm Bureau, it is a great honor to be your guests today and to speak to you for a short time.

Last year the 1,300,000 people in Kentucky who live on 240,000 farms produced agricultural products valued at $550,000,000.

In wealth and production and above all in the character of its farm population, agriculture is the dominant force in the economy and life of Kentucky.

During the recent war, American farmers, comprising only 15 percent of the country's labor force, increased their production by more than one-third. They were handicapped by inadequate manpower, equipment, and transportation, but by working long hours and without stoppage, they fed our industrial workers, armed forces, and in part, our allies. It was an unmatched and never-to-be-forgotten example of hard work, cooperation, and patriotism.

The war has passed, and with it has gone the common objective which evoked a great cooperative effort, but the necessities and requirements of the war years have not passed. The task of the American farmer has not ended, nor is it even diminished. I wish that every American citizen could comprehend fully the magnitude of the responsibilities of the American farmer in today's world.

Since the beginning of the war, and despite its casualties, the population of the world has increased by 200,000,000 people. But, with this great increase of human beings who must have food, there is less food than before the war.

The war dislocated the producers of food. It destroyed the capacity of devastated countries to build or repair farm machinery and to manufacture fertilizers. It struck at the morale and the health of millions of people. As a result, excepting the United States, Canada, Australia, Russia, and some South American countries, the capacity of the great food-producing countries of the world to provide even a minimum amount of food for their millions has been reduced. It is a tragic and disquieting fact that today, in 1948, there is not enough food in the world for the people of the world.

At the close of the war, 36 nations, including the United States, united to form an organization known as the International Emergency Food Council, which is now to become a part of the Food and Agriculture Section of the United Nations organization. Hon. Clinton Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, represents the United States on the IEFC, and another American, Mr. Dennis Fitzgerald, is its secretary. The chief function of the IEFC is to estimate yearly the minimum food requirements and the food production of each of the 36 member countries and to allocate export quotas of food from countries having a surplus of production to the deficit countries.

In the latest survey made by the IEFC it was estimated that the deficit countries, that is, those which cannot produce enough for their needs, will in 1948, require the import of 38,000,000 tons of food to eke out a minimum ration, and that 17,000,000 to 18,000,000 tons of the deficit can only be supplied by the United States. In the year ending June 30, 1947, 18,500,000 tons of food were exported from the United States to deficit countries.

During the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1948, the United States proposes to export 520,000,000 bushels of its total grain crop of 1,400,000,000 bushels, and the Commodity Credit Corporation has already purchased 400,000,000 bushels for that purpose.

These figures give some idea of the magnitude of the world responsibility of the American farmer, but the requirements for export do not tell the full story of his task.

In addition to the unprecedented demand for export, we must supply the increased food demand of our own people. Our population has increased in the last decade by 10,000,000 people. The current national income of the American people, swollen by production for foreign and domestic demand deferred by war, has reached the staggering sum of $200,000,000,000. Armed with this tremendous purchasing power, the people consumed in 1947, 17 percent more food than before the war. As an example, the average individual consumption of meat in the year 1947 was 155 pounds per person, compared with a prewar consumption of 126 pounds per person. The story is the same for poultry, milk, and butter. If the present high rate of employment and consequent high national income continues, domestic consumption of food will, of course, increase. There is also reason to believe that foreign demands will continue for several years. Estimates given by the 16 European nations cooperating under the Marshall plan state that through the years 1948–51, food imports and fertilizer from the American continent valued at $13,717,000,000 will be required.

I have emphasized these tremendous demands, domestic and foreign, that are being made upon the American farmer for definite and specific reasons.

The first reason is, strictly speaking, not within the scope of my subject, but because a few uninformed people blame the farmer for the cost of food, I want to point out the fundamental causes of the inflation which plagues us today. Those who make the criticism may not realize that the average per capita farm income of all persons living on farms for the year 1947 was $725 compared to the average nonfarm income of $1,480, and that in previous years an even greater disparity prevailed. They may not consider that the farmer must use his income, to pay higher labor costs and higher prices for the commodities he uses. They may forget that the price the consumer pays, is not the price the farmer receives, and that in the journey from farmer to consumer the costs and profit of transportation, labor, processing and distribution are added.

The real causes of the higher cost of food and other commodities are fundamental, and are not determined by the imposition or the absence of any governmental controls. Inflation arises because there is more money and more credit than there are goods to purchase.

Upon the monetary side, there is existent in the United States today a volume of money and credit of over 200 billion dollars, 3 to 4 times larger, than before the war. This volume was created by debts and deficits incurred during the war.

Upon the supply side some commodities are short because we are not yet producing enough for our own needs, as in the case of steel. Others are short because of tremendous exports, as in the case of grain. The present prices of grain, grain products, meat, poultry, eggs, milk, and butter cannot be charged to the American farmer for, with the possible exception of meat, he is producing more than enough for the needs of this Nation.

It is my opinion, and I believe that it is justified by the facts, that the price of these products can be traced directly to the fact that we are exporting tremendous quantities of grain. Can anyone doubt, that if the 520,000,000 bushels that we will export in this fiscal year, or any considerable part of it, could be used here for food and for feeding purposes that the prices of grain, bread, meat, poultry, eggs, butter, and milk would not be greatly reduced?

I want it clearly understood that I do not criticize the necessary export of grain to needy countries for relief or rehabilitation, but I want it as plainly understood that I do criticize with all of my strength the attempt that has been made in some quarters to make it appear that the export of grain has little or no connection with the price of food. I am happy to report that during the special session of Congress, I heard Secretary of Agriculture Anderson, Secretary of Commerce Harriman and Mr. Fitzgerald, Secretary of the IEFC, and others who testified before the Senate committee, state frankly that the export of grain was one of the causes of high prices of meat.

I believe strongly that it is a matter of justice to the American farmer, who is sometimes charged with the responsibility for prices, that these facts should be frankly admitted.

I believe further that the success of the Marshall plan will depend on the extent to which it is supported by public opinion, grounded on true facts. It is essential that the people know that the continued export of great quantities of food and other commodities will require substantial sacrifices on their part in prices and shortages.

My chief reason, however, for emphasizing the requirements that are being placed upon the American farmer, and the dependence of our own people and the people of the world upon his continued production, is to point out that the welfare of agriculture is not a matter of concern to the farmer and farm people alone, but a matter of national concern.

Some people view farm legislation as special preferential legislation, but, to the contrary, legislation which protects and conserves soil resources and tends to stabilize prices and production is in the national interest.

You have asked me to discuss with you farm legislation which the Congress will enact during the present session. Naturally I cannot state with definiteness the exact measures that may be enacted, or the exact form that they will take. Therefore, I shall attempt to describe what I believe to be the attitude of the Congress toward your problems, and to outline generally the important fields of legislation.

In my 1 year in the Congress, I have found a diversity of opinion upon practically every question of importance. This diversity of opinion is not limited along party lines, but is found within party lines. I believe that I can truthfully say that there is greater unanimity upon farm problems than in any other field.

This unanimity grows from the ever-increasing awareness that the welfare of agriculture is not a group interest but a matter of national interest. It comes from the realization that 15 percent of the Nation's workers are charged with the responsibility of feeding all of the people of the Nation, and many other millions throughout the world. It comes from the knowledge that when domestic and foreign demands are reduced, we must be prepared to protect agriculture and the Nation against a repetition of the experiences of the years following the First World War and the early thirties.

During the first session of the Eightieth Congress, the chief objective was to bring order to the fiscal affairs of the Nation, that its credit might be preserved, that surpluses instead of deficits would be available for the retirement of debt, for funds for foreign relief, funds for such social programs as might be approved, and for ultimate tax reduction. We succeeded in the objective of assuring fiscal stability. Expenditures were reduced for the first time in years, the first surplus in 17 years was achieved, and the first debt payment from tax revenues was made. But even in this first year of fiscal stabilization, I believe that fair provision was made for the American farmer. If you will make a careful study and analysis of the appropriations made for functions which concern the American farmer, I believe that you will agree that he received fair treatment from the Congress.

Throughout the session it was recognized that the action taken was of a transitional nature, and that a long-term program of greater permanency must be adopted. With that end in mind, Senator AIKEN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, joined with Senators THYE and YOUNG, also members of the committee, in introducing and securing the passage of a resolution which provided that a Senate committee be established to formulate a comprehensive farm program. Similar action was taken in the House, and for the last several months the two committees visited many sections of the country and heard hundreds of farmers and leaders of farm organizations. Their purpose was to learn from farmers themselves, rather than from governmental officials, the type of farm program that should be adopted. Your former President, the able and distinguished Hon. Edward O'Neil, was one of those who testified and his views presenting your program have been confirmed by a preponderance of the testimony heard. The House committee paid a short visit to Hopkinsville and Hon. CLIFFORD HOPE, chairman of the committee, told me that it was one of the most helpful and interesting visits of the trip.

These committees have not yet made their formal and full report, and I cannot tell you with certainty the form that it will take, but from conversations with individual members, from reading the preliminary report of the House committee, and sampling the opinion of a number of Members of Congress who are greatly interested in Agriculture, I am enabled to believe with conviction that farm legislation of a long-term nature will be passed by the Congress during this session.

First, I feel sure that the importance of soil conservation will be confirmed and greater provision made for its continuance. In this period of expanding production and increased demands for food and fiber, we are struck by the imperative necessity of soil conservation. In an effort to supply food and fiber the American farmer cultivated in 1947, 77,000,000 acres of wheat and 86,000,000 acres of corn. Competent agriculturists believe that this average is very close to the limit that can be safely tilled. Even with this tremendous acreage and the blessing of wonderful crop weather for 8 years, it has been necessary to literally mine the soil to meet unprecedented needs. Even with the continuance of favorable factors, we cannot supply these needs indefinitely. If this mining of the soil is continued, it will jeopardize the future health and wealth of this Nation. We are a young nation, but it has been estimated that we have already destroyed the topsoil of 282,000,000 acres, and that we are now in the process of destroying the topsoil of an additional 700,000,000 acres. These considerations lead directly to the conclusion that soil conservation is a matter of national interest, as well as farm interest, and that its cost must be borne in part by the Nation. In this Congress this premise will be emphasized and supported in several ways. I have been told by members of the Committee on Agriculture that increased attention will be given to the withdrawal of marginal lands from cultivation through reforesting. I know that reclamation projects which bring new lands into cultivation, and the Tennessee Valley Authority, which emphasizes soil conservation, will be supported. In view of the misleading statements that have been made, it is worth while to mention that last year the Eightieth Congress made the largest appropriation in history, $132,000,000, for reclamation projects. Perhaps of chief interest to you in the subject of soil conservation is the question as to whether or not Soil Conservation functions and appropriations will be continued. Good progress has been made in the Nation and in Kentucky. I am informed by the appropriate Government departments that as of July 1, 1947, 189 soil-conservation districts had been organized, covering nearly 18,000,000 acres on 178,000 of Kentucky's farms. Over 140,000 Kentucky farms have carried out one or more conservation practices, such as liming, terracing, contour farming, ditching, and other measures of improvement. I have no doubt that the program will be continued and strengthened, and that every effort will be made to secure an increased and adequate appropriation for the coming year. There is a strong movement to consolidate the various agencies administering this program, at least in its educational aspects, in the interest of economy and efficiency. This movement has the support of the Farm Bureau. These programs have been administered by farmers in a democratic way. I hope that in the same tradition and spirit of self-government and devotion to their best interests, that the farmers will decide this question and decide the form that such consolidation should take.

If the present great demand for agricultural products could continue we would not need to worry too much about emergency programs, quotas, or support prices. The great task would be to produce and to protect soil. The present situation points up the importance of a prosperous industrial economy which will demand increasing amounts of food and fiber and the importance of export markets. Farmers know this and there is an increasing understanding of the interdependence of agriculture, labor, and capital.

The best thing and the most important thing that could happen to American agriculture is that the present high level of domestic employment and income should continue and export outlets developed.

We cannot be assured that the present favorable conditions will continue, and it is likely that as food production increases in other countries, exports will decrease.

If this occurs the expanded productive capacity built up in the war and postwar years will aggravate the problems for which our prewar measures were not wholly adequate.

How can we protect ourselves? A great part of the machinery is available. It is necessary that it be not destroyed, but that it be made more effective.

First, research must be encouraged. Every effort should be made to strengthen the services of the land-grant colleges; our own University of Kenutcky in its extension work; our county agents; the machinery provided by the Bureau of Plant Industry, Soils and Agricultural Engineering; the Bureau of Animal Husbandry; and the facilities of the Research and Marketing Act, in the field of research. Research is needed to find new uses for farm products, so that demand may be stabilized and increased. Research is needed to point the way to lowered costs of production.

The war period was characterized by reduced costs of production, through the use of machinery, better farming practice, lime, fertilizer, better stock, more electrification, greatly resulting from increased research. The REA fits into this program.

Electrified farms are more productive, more profitable, and save labor. It should be noted that loans in the approximate sum of $40,000,000 have been made available to rural electrification cooperatives in Kentucky and that 43.8 percent of its farms, and 112,000 customers are now served.

When foreign demand slackens, and prices recede, reduced costs in production and marketing will pay off. I have found a great approval in Congress of research activities and of the Rural Electrification Administration.

Looking to the future, the second great field which requires action is that centering upon price support. As you know, the Steagall amendment to the Agricultural Act of 1938, which extended the provisions of the act to additional crops at increased levels of parity, will expire at the end of this year.

It has not been necessary to invoke the parity formula except in the cases of a few commodities, but I believe the Congress will extend the price-support program to provide a cushion in case of a downward trend that might reach the disaster proportions of a decade ago. Various proposals have been made for the revision of the parity formula, and I am not able to say which will be adopted. Among others, there is a suggestion that support prices might take into consideration the carry-over crops so that large and unmanageable surpluses would not build up. If such a factor should be considered, it seems to me that it would be necessary to give special consideration to tobacco because it is not a 1-year carry-over crop and because of its special problems. I will carefully watch this matter.

The support of farm credit, and farm cooperatives also enter into this building up of insurance measures for the future, but I cannot discuss them in the detail that they deserve.

I emphasize again that farmers, the Nation, and Congress will be blind and foolish indeed if we do not learn from the experiences of the past and provide these measures of insurance.

In the world field, the rehabilitation of Europe and the general agreement on tariffs and trade signed at Geneva on October 30, will offer a start toward better trade relations, which could lead the world into safer political and economic relations.

Tobacco is the great cash crop of Kentucky. The 1947-48 Burley crop is valued at $175,000,000, or more than the total farm income of 1939. I know that all of you appreciate the importance of developing export outlets for our surplus tobacco. During the war American soldiers in England, Europe, and other sections of the globe gave Kentucky tobacco millions of dollars of free advertising. The people of those countries developed a taste for our tobacco which can be capitalized by increased exports upon their rehabilitation. It is agreed that tobacco should be employed by our Government now as an incentive to the increased production of food and coal in Europe and occupied countries. The Congress has given official recognition to the principle of incentive goods by incorporating in the foreign-relief bill passed at the special session a provision that 5 percent of the appropriated funds could be used for the purchase of incentive goods. While the supplemental appropriation for the occupational cost of Germany did not specifically provide for the purchase of incentive goods, the report filed by the committee recommended that tobacco be supplied for use in occupied territory. These steps lead me to believe that any legislation enacted in furtherance of the Marshall plan will contain provisions for the inclusion of incentive goods, notably tobacco. I am very happy that at the last session of Congress that I had the honor of introducing an amendment to the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill, upon behalf of myself and Senator BARKLEY, which resulted in restoring $75,000 of the appropriation of the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations. This Office promotes the export of surplus farm commodities and has been very helpful in finding foreign markets for our surplus tobacco.

In such a discussion as this I know that I have only touched upon the many fields of legislation which affect the farmer.

I recognize the importance of social measures which will raise the standard of living and provide greater opportunities for our farm population, and which will encourage young people and our returned soldiers to make a profession of farming. It is essential to our national life that the small farmholders be strengthened and that their families be provided opportunities for better health, education, and security comparable to the opportunities available to other segments of our citizenship.

This Nation is faced with great obligations, and some priority must be assigned to its revenues and resources, but with respect to these measures of opportunity I hope that forward steps will be taken during this session of Congress.

A bill providing for Federal aid to education and to our teachers, in whose introduction I joined, has been reported favorably to the Senate and will be acted upon by that body at this session.

Several bills providing for greater health security are now being considered by congressional committees. I do not favor the measure advocated by the President which provides for compulsory insurance under strong Federal control, but I believe there is a possibility that a measure providing aid to the States may be enacted.

Every farmer is interested in farm-to-market roads. In 1944, Congress authorized that $1,500,000,000 be appropriated in yearly installments of $500,000,000 to aid the States in the building of primary, urban, and farm-to-market roads. Kentucky has made good use of its funds, and stands at the very top in plans programed, approved, and in contracts let. Its apportionment of $10,146,149 during 1947, has been programed to spend $9,644,328, aiding in the construction of 687 miles of road.

The present program will soon expire and it is essential that during this session of Congress, legislation be enacted to continue Federal aid for our roads. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Roads, which committee, with the House committee, is charged with this responsibility, I hope to have a part in this program.

I cannot close without calling your attention to some general problems which affect all of us, not merely as members of an occupational group, but as citizens of the Nation.

Every American citizen is troubled with the high cost of living and with the danger of increased inflation. Neither politics nor name calling will solve the problem. It arises from fundamental causes which cannot be permanently cured until production meets demand. In this period, when production is catching up, an effort is being made to arrest inflation by voluntary methods rather than by strict governmental controls which the people dislike and which could discourage the production which is so sorely needed.

Let me assume to urge you to cooperate faithfully with this program and in this great effort to halt an inflation which could destroy all the gains that we have made. I am sure that you do not want, nor do I favor Government controls upon the farmer.

Another great undertaking to which I hope you will give your support is the execution of the Marshall plan. Agriculture, labor, and industry in the United States cannot remain prosperous unless the world is healthy. Aside from material and humanitarian reasons a rehabilitated democratic Europe is the best insurance against war and for our own security. Several years ago, I might have concurred in the view of those who oppose aid, but today we must be willing to make sacrifices to promote the peace of the world, for that is the greatest objective of mankind.

In what I have said today, I hope you will not get the opinion that the Congress will not critically review the requests of all sectors of our economy, including agriculture. I do not believe that you would want the Congress or your Representatives to do that, for I think that you will agree with me that it is the duty of the Congress not to serve any special group, but to attempt to do that which is best for all the people.

I have been concerned by some of the demands that are made upon Congress, without seeming regard to their effect upon the Nation or its people.

I am concerned by the proposals that have been made, that, in this 1 year, we adopt the Marshall plan and spend $6,800,000,000, that we continue an abnormally high budget of $40,000,000,000, that we embark upon programs that would cost several billions more, and that at the same time we reduce taxes.

These proposals are inconsistent in their very nature. They cannot be carried out. They will cause inflation. We cannot have all of them at one time. We must be honest with ourselves and with the people.

In this year of decision we must determine our primary obligations and concentrate on those obligations. I believe that those primary obligations are the support of measures which will promote world peace and which will strengthen our domestic economy of agriculture, labor, and industry.

It has been a great pleasure to speak to you. I could not state my opinion of you and the regard in which you are held, better than in the words of your former president in his valedictory at Chicago. He said: "Your organization has won the respect and esteem of Congress to a degree that is most gratifying. The kindness and courtesy which congressional committees invariably extend to all Farm Bureau witnesses reflect the high regard in which our organization is held in Washington. Senators and Congressmen, as well as other officials of Government, have unquestionably been impressed with the fact that farm people are generally dependable witnesses. They are invariably fair in their approach, not only to legislation affecting agriculture, but also to issues affecting other groups."

I congratulate this organization for its long, determined fight for legislation which has redounded to the national wealth and interest. I congratulate you and salute you for your magnificent work during the war and today in providing food for the world. I congratulate you for your never-failing appreciation and support of the traditions and principles of our Government.

All of us can congratulate ourselves that in a generally unhappy world, we are privileged to be citizens of this country, whose system of government and of competitive enterprises, maligned as it may be by a few of our people, is still the last best hope on earth.

Government Support Has Little or Nothing To Do With the Present High Level of Food Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MORGAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, the Republican Members of Congress apparently are trying to blow hot and cold on the issue of high prices. They seek credit for continuation of the Democratic program of price support for the farmer, but at the same time they charge that these policies are responsible for the soaring cost of living. The Republicans should decide which of these inconsistent positions they want to take, although the actual truth is that the support program has little or nothing to do with the present high level of food prices.

The Republicans charge that nothing can be done about the high cost of living as long as the Government continues its present farm price support program.

Government support actually has little or nothing to do with the present high level of food prices.

Under existing legislation, price support for farm products becomes effective only when prices on the open market fall below 90 percent of parity. At the present time the market price of practically all farm products are higher than the support-price levels because the supply of farm products is still substantially smaller than the demand.

The only important exception is potatoes. Potato requirements during the war were about 50,000,000 bushels greater than the average production in prewar years. In order to stimulate production, potatoes were brought under the price-support program. However, except for 1944, potato crops have been exceptionally large since the price-support program began. Starting in 1947, acreage goals were established for commercial potato farms, and producers who exceeded these goals are not eligible for support. Although potato acreage has been reduced by 36 percent over the last 5 years, production has remained high because of increased yield per acre.

Since 1946 the Department of Agriculture has demanded that the present mandatory price-support provisions be replaced by a more flexible program. The Steagall amendment, the present legal basis for the mandatory price support at 90 percent of parity, will expire on December 31, 1948. However, under the Agriculture Act of 1948, passed by the Republican Eightieth Congress, the 90 percent price support level will be continued until the entire 1948 crop has been marketed and only thereafter will support prices be reduced to a level between 60 percent and 90 percent of parity.

Federal Aid to Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD O. McCOWEN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. McCOWEN. Mr. Speaker, although a number of different bills providing Federal assistance to the States for the purpose of financing a minimum foundation education program and of more nearly equalizing educational opportunities were introduced into the House and Senate not one succeeded in passing in the Eightieth Congress. It might be stated that more than 150 Federal-aid-to-education bills have been passed by the Congress since 1802, but not one of them was for general public school purposes.

The Federal-aid-to-education-without-Federal-control bill, H. R. 2953, which I sponsored during the Eightieth Congress was reported favorably from the subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, but it was impossible to get a meeting of the full committee to consider this particular bill. There seemed to be a general opinion that if the bill could have been voted on by the full committee and reported favorably to the House that it would very likely have been enacted into law.

The bill, H. R. 2953, particularly safeguarded the control of educational policy now exercised by the States. It did this in a number of ways which I shall not take the time to enumerate. I shall say, however, that no Federal department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States could exercise any direction, supervision, or control over or prescribe any requirements with respect to any school or any State educational institution or agency with respect to the administration, the personnel, the instruction, the methods of instruction, or the materials of instruction under the provisions of this bill. Federal control was specifically prohibited.

There was not the slightest tendency in the bill in any statement toward the union of church and state. Federal funds were to go directly from the United States Treasury to the treasuries of the respective States to be spent strictly under the States' own laws and exactly the way each State spent its own school funds. Since the main provisions of the bill are generally well understood, they will not be repeated at this time.

Every reasonable effort was made to get the bill enacted into law. When it is recalled that approximately $6,000,000,000 was provided for Europe and vast amounts of money for many other purposes, does it not seem that the much smaller amount of $300,000,000 per year could have been given to the public schools of the United States?

In conclusion, I would like to point out that Federal aid without Federal control for public schools came nearer to being enacted into law in the Eightieth Congress than at any time heretofore.

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania, Nominating Gov. Thomas E. Dewey at the Republican National Convention

HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD my address nominating Gov. Thomas E. Dewey as candidate for President at the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is the greatest honor of my life. I am about to nominate the next President of the United States.

It is appropriate that this nomination, in the most critical time of our history, should be made in this historic city of Philadelphia. Here the Articles of Confederation were adopted. Here was written the Declaration of Independence. Here was framed the Constitution. Nearby, at Valley Forge, American patriotism had its first real test in suffering and sacrifice. Here, 92 years ago, the Republican Party held its first national convention. In that time of crisis our party preserved the Union. Once more we meet to save America. Fortunately, our party is prepared.

From the east coast to the west it has developed new leaders—the kind that make a party and a nation great. It is our task to select from among them all that one man who is best qualified to be President and who can best lead us to victory.

By every test there is one man who towers above all others. Every man and woman who hears my voice knows whom I mean. He has the American people behind him. He has the fighting vigor to wage a winning campaign. He can carry the crushing burdens of the Presidency.

Our candidate must have experience and ability. He must understand and believe in party responsibility. He must continue building the Republican Party as a solid foundation for social progress, prosperity, and human freedom.

The Republican Party needs that kind of leadership today. That kind of leadership I offer you now.

For many years the biggest State of the Union was controlled by an alliance of Tammany Hall corruption and left-wing radicalism. It became the spawning place of the New Deal.

Then, in the darkest days of the 1930's, there arose in New York City a young man born and raised in Michigan, in our great Midwest. He gave stirring leadership to the fight against organized crime and political corruption. He gave Tammany Hall the worst licking it ever had in its whole history.

His name and fame were on the lips of all the Nation. Here was recognized a man with infinite capacity to grow. Along with that determination, that firm pursuit of justice, he had other qualities. He picked able assistants; welded them into a hard-hitting team; won them as his loyal friends and associates; kept them unswerving through the years. He has the warmth and human qualities so necessary to inspire the loyalty and devotion needed to rebuild a party, run a great State, and now to lead the greatest Nation in the world.

Through years of expanding friendship and confidence, he developed a party program. Then in 1942, the years of effort were rewarded. The people of New York elected him the State's first Republican Governor in 20 years.

Four years ago, our party turned to him to lead its national campaign in time of war. Two years ago, he was reelected Governor of New York by nearly 700,000 votes, the greatest majority ever given any Governor.

It is not enough for a nominee to be a great party leader. Above all, he must be a great President. He must be a man of understanding and broad vision in world affairs.

Over the years, the man of whom I speak has consistently led the way toward the building of a foreign policy that makes sense. He vigorously pointed the way in shaping a program of aid to Europe on a practical, businesslike, productive basis. No man in America today is better prepared as President to set up a top-notch State Department and give it the loyal, intelligent backing that will carry the world toward peace.

Our next President must be America's greatest administrator. He must be a master of the art of government. He must have ability to get things done, and get them done well. He must have experience and wisdom in choosing big men for big jobs, getting along with them and getting results. He must know how to listen and to learn, how to accept advice as well as to give orders. He must know the value of a dollar and he must know the value of a billion dollars. He must know how to produce the utmost benefit from such vast sums for the people. He must take over our $40,000,000,000-a-year Government and whip this monstrosity into sensible shape.

He must have human sympathy and enlightened vision. He must understand the people's aspirations for security, health, education, and social progress.

We in the Republican Party have the man who possesses all these qualities.

It was my good fortune as Governor of Pennsylvania to be closely associated with the Governor of New York for 4 years. We conferred frequently. During that time I learned to know his fine qualities of leadership. I learned of his great administrative talent, of his ability to get along with the legislative branch, and to work in harmony with the other leaders of his party.

Over these years, a warm friendship has grown up between us. It is a friendship that has been strengthened because we have the same ideals of government, the ideals of honest, competent, economical service to the people.

The record of his accomplishment is breath taking. Taxes were cut 40 percent; debt cut 25 percent, yet the State built up a half-billion-dollar surplus, State aid to education was increased by 80 percent. A $100,000,000 bonus was paid to veterans.

New York made an enviable record in veterans' emergency housing and other veterans' legislation.

Under his leadership, New York reorganized its welfare services; took new strides in public health. Through all the war and reconversion, a record of industrial peace was made—the best no-strike record of any industrial State. Abuses in workmen's compensation were wiped out. Vigorous programs were enacted for the control of livestock diseases. Legislation was enacted to wipe out inequalities in the opportunity for employment and to protect every man's right to earn a livelihood; and to assure equal pay to men and women for equal work.

These are but a few high lights of the amazing record of a great Republican governor. It was made possible by outstanding administrative talent working with and through a political party.

There are four qualities in which our candidate for President must excel:

1. Courageous vigor that can campaign and win for the entire Republican ticket.

2. Mature leadership that recognizes party responsibility.

3. Statesmanship that can give leadership for peace in a troubled world.

4. Administrative capacity—and this is essential—for it is only through this that other qualities can be made effective.

These requirements, as I list them, fit one man so sharply and so precisely, that his name has been in all your minds as I spoke of them.

This candidate has all these qualities so necessary for the next President of the United States. He has them in full measure.

We have known him a long time. Through all that time he has grown in the confidence of the party and the people. Today we have reason to be thankful that he started so young on the national scene, and that he has already led us in a great national campaign. He emerges today in a robust maturity ripened by years of high responsibility—still a young man in the prime of vitality—fit to lead a Nation that is still young, still expanding, still going places.

It is the greatest honor of my life to present to this convention a man who for years has belonged to all America, tried, tested, and true, America's next President—Thomas E. Dewey.

Public Housing No Way To Solve Slum Problem

OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GWINN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Melchior Palyi:

PUBLIC HOUSING NO WAY TO SOLVE SLUM PROBLEM

(By Melchior Palyi)

The United States Government has a $20,000,000,000 stake in housing through ownership and mortgage guaranties. Now it is proposed to overcome the shortage of housing for low-income families by more Government spending. The idea is that slums should be cleared and the slum dwellers housed in new Government-housing projects.

Who is a slum dweller? Suppose we define eligibility for Government housing in terms of incomes under $2,000. If so, every family receiving an income less than that is entitled to new housing with the rent reduced by way of Government subsidy. But the people with $2,100 income are not entitled to it. They will remain in older and less desirable housing than those in the lower-income bracket. Wherever the limit is drawn, it leads to this same uneconomical and unsocial result—a premium is placed on earning less, or convincing the housing officials that one earns less. The higher the limit is drawn, the more families would fall into the privileged class of subsidy receivers. Even at the modest income of $2,000 and below, some 12,000,000 families would become eligible for housing, at a total cost to the taxpayer of more than $150,000,000,000, using the per unit estimates of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill. Even prorated over a long period, this additional burden would just about bankrupt the United States. And construction resources would be siphoned out of the market for private housing.

Does this mean there is nothing we can do for the underprivileged family which is financially unable to provide itself with decent housing? There is a great deal we can do without further inflation of the national debt and without political control of housing which is implied in Government ownership.

The Bureau of Census reports that in the last 7 years we have made unparalleled progress in improving our housing situation. The 1947 housing survey showed 93.2 percent of all urban homes to be in satisfactory repair, as compared to 88.6 percent in 1940. Every year of prosperity will whittle the substandard housing count further. Both quantitatively and qualitatively American housing is at an all-time high and getting better every year, although this fact is somewhat obscured by population growth and migrations, as well as by artificial forces, such as income inflation and rent control.

Furthermore, the city of Baltimore is proving that enforcement of the existing city housing laws can go a long way in eliminating slum conditions. Block by block, the city is compelling property owners to meet minimum housing standards. The elimination of junk, broken fences, and odd buildings in the yards alone has brought surprising results. The advantage of rehabilitation is that it does not reduce the supply of housing at this time of excess demand.

Where whole neighborhoods are too deteriorated for rehabilitation, the local government can buy up slum tracts, clear them and sell the land for private redevelopment on a closely regulated reuse plan. Many cities already have such legislation; Indianapolis and Chicago, to mention two, have put the programs in motion. In short, public housing is unnecessary because its major objectives can be accomplished without it, and at lower cost as well as without the corruption, inefficiency, and waste which are bound to accompany bureaucratic encroachment into a basic economic function.

Congress Should Do All Possible To Prevent Further Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion Congress is making an error in failing to take action designed to do something more about the upward swing of prices. Everybody knows what chaos could come if we have run-away inflation.

Practically all of my relatives are low-income people. It is this type of individual with whose affairs and financial struggles I have been and am most familiar. Furthermore, as the father of three children, I feel I am aware of the difficulties which more and more are confronting parents who are trying to rear children. Necessary food and clothes that children must have are swiftly getting completely out of reach for the average American family with several children. No doubt the thing to be most alarmed about is not the present price structure—bad and serious as it is—but the trend which has been characterizing this country's prices for several years. What will the situation be a year from now? What will the situation be 2 years from now? What will the situation be 3 years from now if the present skyward trend of prices continues? Shortsighted national policy today coupled with inaction in connection with our rapidly growing and expanding inflationary spiral, could bring on the same kind of national difficulty we faced when the depression overtook us in 1929.

I am for free enterprise and individual initiative as much as any human being could be. If it were not for free enterprise and the reward of individual initiative, the kind of family from which I come—plain farm people, many of whom have rented land—on both sides of the house—my mother's family and my father's family—would never have had a chance in the world. On the other hand, when economic trends of a dangerous nature over which no one individual has control or is responsible for confront us, it becomes a national duty to see that such a trend is coped with, and, if possible, to see that solutions to the problems which arise thereby are found. Therefore, as one Member of Congress who represents small farmers and many wage earners as well as people who are in the higher income brackets, I feel it would be wise for the Congress to accept most seriously at this time the responsibility of trying to do something about the price situation which rapidly is becoming worse. In my opinion what we do today will determine what our situation will be tomorrow; inaction today could be very costly.

Should the FCC Grant Radio Time to Atheists Every Time a Religious Program Is Presented Over the Air?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, atheists have no more standing to ask for equal time with religious programs over the air than violators of the moral law would have the right to expound immoral ideas on an equal basis with time granted to those who defend the moral law.

The general rule of the Federal Communications Commission that equity should be observed by radio stations in granting equal opportunity to opponents on different sides of a controversial public question is a good one. However, there may be difficulty at times in determining what is a controversial public question.

Recently the FCC exhibited a strange attitude when it refused to grant Station WHAM at Rochester, N. Y., an application for a 3-year renewal and gave it only a temporary renewal until September 1, pending further study. The reason apparently was because WHAM refused to lend its facilities to an atheist program that sought radio time after a religious program in which an acknowledgment of the existence of God was shown to be fundamental to our form of government. FCC is wondering whether WHAM did not violate its regulation in failing to give the atheist program equal time with the religious program.

If FCC gives way to the proponents of the atheist side of this controversy it will be falling into a dangerous sophistry that seems to be increasing these days.

The difference between the case of the atheists and that of the radio station in this matter is much like the difference between the Soviet Constitution and the Constitution of the United States on the subject of freedom of religion. Article 124 of the Constitution of the U. S. S. R. reads, in part, as follows:

> Freedom of religious worship and freedom of antireligious propaganda is recognized for all citizens.

The first amendment of the Constitution of the United States reads, in part, as follows:

> Congress shall make no laws respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

The Soviet Constitution puts religion and atheism on an equal basis. The American Constitution makes no reference to atheism whatsoever. Atheism is foreign to our basic philosophy of government. There is no controversial public question in our philosophy of government as between religion and atheism. The framers of our form of government assumed the existence of God and frequently referred to Him. The question of the existence of God was beyond controversy in the minds of the founders of our government.

If it be argued that the phrase in our Constitution, "the free exercise thereof," includes the guaranty of the freedom to teach atheism, such a conclusion is not warranted. The Constitution guarantees the free exercise of religion. Religion is the relationship between man and God. Atheism denies the existence of God, and, therefore, any such relationship. Hence atheism is not a religion at all. It may well be that individuals have a legal right under the freedom of speech to advocate atheism all they wish. But this does not make atheism a "controversial" public question. The great body of men from the beginning of history down to the present time have put the question of the existence of God beyond controversy. Men have similarly put beyond controversy the question of the wrongness of deliberate murder. No one will contend that the radio stations would have to give to "Murder, Inc." the same radio time as they gave to the police department in its efforts to protect human lives.

I wish to include in my remarks a very excellent analysis of the case of Station WHAM by Mr. Edward J. Heffron in the July issue of Columbia magazine. The article follows:

ATHEISM BIDS FOR A PLACE ON THE AIR

(By Edward J. Heffron)

On May 1 the Federal Communications Commission declined to grant the usual 3-year license renewal to a radio station because it had refused time for an atheist broadcast. Instead, it authorized a temporary renewal, good for only 4 months, which said in effect that it wanted more time to study the case.

The average religionist may be disposed to say, "Of course atheism isn't entitled to the same rights as theism," and let it go at that. He may even condemn FCC for hesitating over the matter.

I submit that the problem is not so simple, and I should like to explain why.

First of all, we should understand why it is that FCC has anything to do with the matter at all. If Columbia published an article urging a return to God and deploring the evils of godlessness, and then declined to publish a rejoinder submitted by an atheist, no Government agency would so much as look at the matter. The reason is that everyone is free to publish in this country, no Government license being necessary to that end, so if the atheist finds his rights are not accommodated in the columns of this magazine, no one denies him the right to start one of his own. There are 140,000,000 people in this country; there is room for 140,000,000 publications, or 10 times that number if you will—and all with equal opportunities.

But the radio spectrum is limited. The number of available 1–A frequencies is very small indeed; and even the gross number of frequencies, of whatever class, falls far short of the present demand. It would fall shorter still if broadcasters, like publishers, were free to espouse one editorial position to the exclusion of all others (e. g., one station can now accommodate the legitimate demands of labor and management; if that station were to limit its broadcasts to the views of management, labor would undoubtedly seek an outlet of its own, thus increasing the demand).

RADIO MUST SERVE PUBLIC INTEREST

Because the number of all frequencies, and particularly of the most desirable frequencies (for the benefit of any who want to be technical about the matter, let me say that I really mean frequency plus power plus protection) because these numbers are limited, thus making truly free competition impossible, Congress provided that radio should be a licensed business, thus distinguishing it from the press. As a necessary corollary of this arrangement, it provided that broadcasters may not serve their private interests primarily, but must first serve the interests of the public. (If, in serving the public, they can also make a profit, that's all right; but they may not lawfully sacrifice public service to private profit.)

Congress created the Federal Communications Commission to see to this, and provided that the Commission should grant licenses for not more than 3 years—and after that renewals—but only upon a showing of service of the "public interest, convenience, or necessity."

As a consequence the Commission holds that each broadcaster must serve the interests of the public as a whole. And it further holds that any station which devotes its time to the presentation of only one side of a controversial public question, to the exclusion of other sides, is not serving the public as a whole.

Where this threatens to lead us, in the matter of atheist broadcasts, it is now easy to see; but before going into that application of the principle, I'd like to say a word about the principle itself. It is really a great safeguard of the rights of minorities. One may be sure that most broadcasters will not consistently present only such views as are at variance with the views of the majority, still less attack the majority without right of reply, for that would cost them money. But in given areas broadcasters would not necessarily hurt their revenues by ignoring or castigating Catholics, Jews,. Negroes, workers, et al. In fact they might even improve them. Since there are usually no more frequencies available whereon the minority might evenly defend itself, its only protection is the "public interest, convenience, or necessity" regulation of the Communications Commission.

Catholics and labor unions have reason to know this. Some years ago, the Commission's predecessor, the Federal Radio Commission, invoked the self-same principle to deny renewal of license to a notorious anti-Catholic broadcaster, the Rev. Bob Shuler. A few years ago FCC held that if a station was not giving labor a sufficient break via sustaining time, it would have to sell time to the unions. I know of no specific cases where Jews, Negroes, and other minority groups were similarly safeguarded; but of course they benefited by the necessary implications of these two cases.

So much for the background of the case which was the basis of FCC's action on May 1, the case of Robert Harold Scott.

In March 1945 Mr. Scott, a professed atheist of Palto Alto, Calif., filed a petition requesting that FCC revoke the licenses of three California stations—KPO and KFRC of San Francisco, and KQW of San Jose. He charged that these stations had broadcast indirect arguments against atheism, by way of church services, prayers, Bible readings, and other kinds of religious programs, as well as direct statements and arguments against atheism, but that they had refused either to give or sell him time to broadcast talks in favor of atheism.

In a decision rendered July 19, 1946, the Commission held: "* * * the issue here involved is one of broad scope and is not restricted to the three stations which are the subject of Mr. Scott's complaint. We therefore do not feel that we would be warranted on the basis of this single complaint in selecting these three stations as the subject of a hearing looking toward termination of their licenses." So it denied the Scott petition. But it said, "lest our dismissal of Mr. Scott's petition be misconstrued, we feel that we should make our position entirely clear." And it proceeded to hand down a five-page opinion which culminated in this declaration: "The criterion of the public interest in the field of broadcasting clearly precludes a policy of making radio wholly unavailable as a medium for the expression of any view which falls within the scope of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech," and it left no doubt that atheism was such a view.

In effect, FCC told the three California stations that it didn't want to penalize them for a policy that had been pursued by nearly all American radio stations, that it would let them off with a warning. And it made clear that this was a warning to all the stations of the country.

There were a few editorial criticisms in the Catholic press, including an editorial in Columbia; Dorothy Thompson had an excellent article in the Ladies' Home Journal; and George Sokolsky had a piece in his syndicated column. But there were no great reverberations.

A few months later the Very Reverend Ignatius Smith, O. P., of Catholic University, delivered a sermon at a meeting of the Holy Name Society in Rochester, N. Y. His remarks, broadcast by Station WHAM, included the following:

"While so many other nations have declared war on God we have from the beginning acknowledged Him as the Sovereign Lord of men and nations. * * * Our Nation is great because it began in partnership with God, and officially, has maintained that companionship through the years. We are great because we have continued to recognize, officially, God as the Author of human rights and of the freedoms these rights demand. On these sublime facts rests our national greatness in the past and today. On the continuation of this godliness in our Nation will depend the continuation of our greatness. * * * If the godlessness, the irreligion of so many dozens of millions of our people continues to grow, our greatness is doomed and our future is damned. We cannot separate God from government or godliness from national life and expect to survive, to say nothing of to preserve our greatness. We must learn to fear those who repudiate God's rights in America because human rights are ignored where divine rights are neglected. * * * We [Catholics] are battling for the sovereignty of God if for no other reason because we know that apostasy from God means apostasy from sound thinking; this means apostasy from brotherhood; this means apostasy from hope; this means the loss of liberty. * * * We pledge to the Nation those virtues which it needs and which are not likely to be lived without religious belief and worship. * * * We can be destroyed by godless and immoral living. * * * Let bigotry and ungodly and undemocratic racial and class discrimination continue to divide our people and we are doomed. * * * Let us continue to condone, in the manner of freedom, disregard for God, for worship, and for prayer, and we are doomed."

STATION'S LICENSE TEMPORARILY RENEWED

Thereupon, Arthur G. Cromwell, president of the Rochester Society of Freethinkers and father of Vashti McCollum, demanded that WHAM give him time to answer Father Smith. WHAM declined, so Mr. Cromwell complained to FCC. The Commission agreed to entertain his complaint but advised him that it would not be considered until WHAM's license came up for renewal. It came up for renewal on May 1, 1948, when the Commission voted 3 to 2 against granting the station's application for a 3-year renewal, and compromised on a temporary renewal to September 1, pending further study.

Reexamination of the Robert Harold Scott opinion is therefore very much in order. I'd like to consider it in three parts: (1) Three pieces of mischievous obiter dicta; (2) a possible interpretation of the opinion as a whole that would seem to me to be acceptable; and (3) reasons for annuling the opinion if this interpretation is not supported.

In one extraordinary passage, the Scott opinion argues that "the conception of the nature of the Divine Being is as varied as religious denominations and sects and even differs with the individuals belonging to the same denominations or sects." It adds: "So diverse are these conceptions that it may be fairly said, even as to professed believers, that the God of one man does not exist for another. And so strongly may one believe in his own particular conception of a God that he may easily be led to say 'Only my God exists, and therefore he who denies my God is an atheist, irrespective of his professed belief in a God.'"

Dorothy Thompson nailed this one beautifully when she simply passed over its absurd relativism and said, "The issue * * * is not whether some groups might call others of differing religious views 'atheist.' Mr. Scott calls himself an atheist." It was precisely on the basis of his professed atheism that he demanded radio time, and that, his demand having been rejected, he filed his complaint.

But the opinion gets even wilder. In a series of what seem to have been intended, incredibly enough, as balanced antitheses, it points out that "God is variously thought of as a 'Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable,' and as having a tangible form resembling [sic] man who, in turn, was created in His image; as consisting of a trinity and a single Godhead; as a divine law giver, laying down infallible natural and moral laws by which man is governed, and as a God who concerns Himself with the personal affairs of individuals however petty; as a God to whom each person is individually accountable and as a God to be approached only through ordained intermediaries; a God of the powerful who divinely appoints [sic] kings and other rulers of men, and as a God of the meek and lowly; as a God of stern justice and a God of mercy; as a God to be worshipped or appeased primarily through ritual and as a God to be served primarily through service to one's fellow man; as a God whose rewards and punishments are mainly reserved for a future life and as a God who also rewards or punishes through spiritual enrichment or impoverishment of man's present existence."

"These," we are told, "are only a few of the many differing (which here means mutually contradictory, of course) conceptions which might be cited by way of illustration." All of which is presumably supposed to prove that the Christian regards the Jew as an atheist, the Trinitarian the Unitarian, the Catholic the Protestant, the Evangelical the Liberal, the Presbyterian the Baptist, and so ad infinitum—and vice versa, too.

Actually, if one were to accept this jumbled theology and admit, with the Commission, that "the God of one man does not exist for another," that in the eyes of each one of us all other citizens are atheists, and if we were to say that all atheists are entitled to time on the air, then obviously every last man Jack of us has rights to radio time which the broadcaster, poor fellow, can deny only at his peril.

Fortunately these observations are mere dicta, as the lawyers say. There is another dictum which I think deserves notice before getting on to the main argument. The opinion declares that "Underlying the conception of freedom of speech is not only the recognition of the importance of the free flow of ideas and information to the effective functioning of democratic forms of government and ways of life but also belief that immunity from criticism is dangerous. * * * Immunity from criticism cannot be granted to religion without at the same time granting it to those who use the guise of religion to further their ends of personal profit or power, to promote their own particular political or economic philosophies, or to give vent to their personal frustrations and hatreds." This is to disadvantage the genuine because of the shortcomings of the imitations. It as much as says that it is impossible to distinguish between the legitimate preacher of religion and the rabblerouser who chooses to cloak himself in the habiliments of religion. But the worst aspect of it is that it seems to be something of an incitement to religious wrangling over the air, contrary to the rule of law laid down in the Shuler case. There the Court, in affirming the Commission's decision not to renew Bob Shuler's license, on the ground that he had been using his station largely for attacks on the Catholic Church, said: "If it be considered that one in possession of a permit to broadcast * * * may, without let or hindrance from any source, use these facilities, reaching out as they do, from one corner of the country to the other, to * * * offend the religious susceptibilities of thousands, inspire political distrust, and civic discord * * * and be answerable for slander only at the instance of the one offended, then this great science, instead of a boon, will become a scourge, and the Nation a theater for the display of individual passions and the collision of personal interests."

However, the main questions with respect to this opinion are these: Does it hold that atheist programs are as much entitled to time on the air as religious programs? Every time a broadcaster allows his facilities to be used for a direct criticism of godlessness or for an indirect argument of the same character (which Mr. Scott defined, according to the opinion, as "church services, prayers, Bible readings, and other kinds of religious programs"), must he provide comparable time for the local atheist to broadcast his answer?

I believe it is possible to support one reading of the opinion which will provide a negative answer to both these questions. At one point it declares: "We recognize that in passing upon requests for time, a station licensee is constantly confronted with most difficult problems. Since the demands for time may far exceed the amount available for broadcasting, a licensee must inevitably make a selection among those seeking it for the expression of their views. In making a selection with fairness, the licensee must, of course, consider the extent of the interest of the people in his service area in a particular subject to be discussed, as well as the qualifications of the person selected to discuss it. Every idea does not rise to the dignity of a "public controversy", and every organization, regardless of membership or the seriousness of its purpose, is not per se entitled to time on the air.

Everything hinges here on what FCC means by "the extent of the interest of the people in [the broadcaster's] service area in a particular subject to be discussed." If by "subject" they mean in this context, "religion", then if there are enough listeners interested in religion it would seem, from the rest of the opinion, that the broadcaster would have to give them religion, both pro and con, both theist and atheist. That, I submit, would be unacceptable. But if FCC is willing to allow the broadcaster enough leeway to interpret "subject" to mean "atheism," then in those communities where atheists are a negligible handful it would seem that the broadcaster would not be obliged to provide time for them—except as provided in the next two sentences of the opinion.

These two sentences read: "But an organization or idea may be projected into the realm of controversy by virtue of being attacked. The holders of a belief should not be denied the right to answer attacks upon them or their belief solely because they are few in number." I don't think anyone can object to this if by "attacks" is meant misrepresentations of the atheist's case in general or criticism of local atheists by name or by clear implication. But if "attacks" means what the opinion calls "indirect arguments" against atheism—that is, "church services, prayers, Bible readings, and other kinds of religious programs"—it would really mean that the atheist had a right to broadcast a religious disaffirmation every time someone broadcast a religious affirmation. This, again, seems to me to be unacceptable.

The opinion also says: "The fact that a licensee's duty to make time available for the presentation of opposing views on current controversial issues of public importance may not extend to all possible differences of opinion within the ambit of human contemplation cannot serve as the basis for any rigid policy that time shall be denied for the presentation of views which may have a high degree of unpopularity."

If this means merely that the broadcaster is not justified in laying down a hard and fast rule that he will never allow an atheist to approach his microphone, even though the atheist may have been wronged over the air, I think we might accept it.

It seems to me that such interpretation as I have here outlined is the only construction of the opinion that could be accepted by those who believe—as our founding fathers believed—that our democratic liberties are rooted in God and will vanish apart from Him. I'll admit that it's taken some doing to arrive at such a construction. Some might even call it tortured construction. Maybe it is. Certainly it's very "iffy." All I wanted to point out is that it is, in my opinion, just barely possible to make such an exegesis. If FCC would be willing to accept such an interpretation, I for one, would be willing to settle for it.

What I would prefer, however, is that the opinion be overruled. I think it should be, and here are my reasons:

Let us begin by agreeing with FCC's view that broadcasts of controversial public issues should not be limited to the expression of any one side. I have already suggested why I believe this to be essential to the protection of minority rights, and therefore to peace and order and "the pursuit of happiness" in our democracy. But let us recognize that all controversial points are not necessarily controversial public issues.

Here I am arguing that the phrase "controversial public issues" has a meaning different from the sum of the literal meanings of the three words of which it is composed. Just as "public affairs" does not mean any old affair that happens in public—street cleaning is a public affair, in that sense—I contend that "controversial public issues" does not comprehend all issues on which individuals may publicly disagree.

The followers of Wilbur Glenn Voliva, in Zion City, Ill., maintain that the earth is flat. They are American citizens and there is nothing in the Constitution which forbids them to hold such a view. Is the roundness versus the flatness of the earth therefore a controversial public issue? If the broadcaster presents a talk by one of the local geography teachers which implies that the earth is round, must he provide time for rebuttal to any disciple of Voliva who happens to live in his service area?

There is nothing in the Constitution which forbids an American citizen to embrace the economic and political views of communism—or of national socialism or fascism. Every time a citizen says a friendly word over the air about democracy, must the broadcaster be prepared to put his microphone at the disposal of Communists, Nazis, Fascists?

There are laws forbidding the practice of nudism, free love, polygamy, perversion, euthanasia; but I know of no ordinances which make it unlawful for one to believe in these practices. Is the citizen who so believes entitled to radio time to present his case every time some broadcaster says a kind word about modesty, the family, monogamy, the natural moral law, the fifth commandment?

The answers to these questions are, I take it, pretty obvious; but no more obvious than the answer to this one: Every time a schoolboy or a Congressman or a Fourth of July orator quotes from the Declaration of Independence "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights. * * * that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men * * * and for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine providence, we [the founding fathers] mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor"—every time someone refers to these stirring words over the air, must the broadcaster give time to the free thinkers to argue there is no Creator?

I say, "No." All these matters are controversial issues in the sense of controverted issues, and they are obviously not mere private matters; but I argue that they are still not controversial public issues. God is officially recognized in the Declaration of Independence as the source and fountainhead of our liberties, as the bedrock of American democracy. The Father of Our Country said, "Religion and morality are indispensable supports" of good government. We sing of God in The Star-Spangled Banner, in My Country 'Tis of Thee, in The Battle Hymn of the Republic, in America—the Beautiful, and in God Bless America. Our coins proclaim, "In God We Trust." As the Supreme Court said in the case of Holy Trinity Church v. United States, "This is a religious people. This is historically true." No, theism is not a controversial public issue; it is an officially accepted public proposition.

It is on this basis that I think the Robert Harold Scott opinion should be overruled. Which is not necessarily to say that the broadcaster may not give time to the atheists in his community if there are enough of them to warrant such consideration or even to deny that he ought to give them time if the case for atheism is misrepresented or if an individual atheist is condemned by name. It is simply to say that the broadcaster should not be compelled, by FCC fiat, to consider the atheist entitled to a disaffirmation every time radio broadcasts an affirmation. I do not say the atheist is a second-class citizen, but I think he's got to learn to put up with God on the air as he has learned to put up with God on our coins; and I deplore the fact that FCC has retarded this adjustment.

Some time between now and September 1, the men of FCC are going to have to give a lot of consideration to this question. They will need, and I am sure they will want, as much counsel and guidance as they can get. And I'm sure they'll get plenty from the professional atheists, the civil liberties champions, and the numerous advocates of license under the guise of free speech, academic freedom, and freedom of religion. I only hope the apostles of reason will not be, as they so frequently are, asleep at the switch.

FCC's decision in the WHAM case will be, in a very real sense, its first clear-cut and precedent-making decision on this question. The opinion in the Scott case favored Scott, but the decision and order did not. Hence many people felt the opinion was largely a trial balloon. Now FCC will really have to decide something, and decide it with some measure of finality. I hope that, in making this momentous determination, they will not be unmindful of the thought so eloquently expressed by Dorothy Thompson in the Ladies' Home Journal: "Woe unto the nation that destroys its altars! For new altars will surely be built, to idols with terrible faces and bloody hands, carrying whips and swords. Such is the judgment of history, ancient and modern. Men have a right to disbelieve without being punished by worldly principalities and powers for that fact. But the state should think twice before it goes out of its way to provide them opportunities to attack the faith of others."

Statement on Housing by Hon. Kenneth S. Wherry, of Nebraska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement on housing, which I intended to make but did not have an opportunity to make, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Housing Act of 1948 is designed to attack the existing housing emergency as well as to provide a broadened long-range program of low-cost housing in the home ownership and rental fields. It will encourage now, an accelerated production of low-cost homes. It will encourage now, an expanded production of rental housing units. It will immediately liberalize home financing for veterans. From a long range point of view, the bill modernizes and broadens FHA housing insurance programs. The bill seeks the economies in construction costs attendant upon improved and standardized building codes and standardized dimensions for building materials. The bill encourages cost reductions through mass production of prefabricated houses as well as homes of conventional construction.

LOW-COST HOUSING

The bill will facilitate the financing of homes in the $5,000 to $6,500 price range. The FHA title I mortgage insurance maximum is increased from $3,000 to $4,500. According to a survey of construction costs by the Bureau of Labor Statistics last year, 20 percent of the new housing construction in the country fell within a price range that would be covered by the new mortgage limitation in title I. A new provision is added to mortgage insurance under FHA title II under which 90 to 95 percent loans are permitted up to a mortgage maximum of $6,000. According to the survey above mentioned 43 percent of new housing construction fell within the authorized mortgage limitation of this provision. Mass production of prefabricated houses will be encouraged by the financial assistance afforded by certain provisions of FHA, title VI. Another provision of title VI is designed to encourage on-site mass production of homes of conventional construction.

RENTAL HOUSING

One of the acute problems in the housing emergency is the shortage of rental housing. To stimulate the immediate production of rental housing accommodations $800,000,000 of title VI FHA mortgage insurance is authorized for such housing construction. A longer term approach to this problem is provided under a $1,000,000,000 yield-insurance program. Rentals charged under the yield-insurance program would be FHA approved and so set that they will meet the needs for dwellings of families of moderate income. Each of these insurance programs are supported by premiums charged so that the amounts involved reflect only contingent liabilities of the Government. Provision is made for the production of rental housing units for families of lower income in localities or metropolitan areas where there is a field for new dwellings at such rental. Projects of nonprofit cooperative ownership housing corporations and nonprofit corporations can likewise be financed in this field under a mortgage which may be insured up to 90 percent, and in case the cooperative is a veterans' cooperative up to 95 percent. (Sec. 207 amendments.)

VETERANS HOUSING

The bill makes eligible for purchase by the Government secondary market in the Federal National Mortgage Association, insured mortgages covering Government war housing. By regulations of the Housing and Home Finance Agency, veterans are given first preference in the purchase of this housing. This housing constitutes probably the lowest-cost housing available for veteran ownership, and the provisions of this bill should stimulate the acquisition of this housing by veterans. The Government secondary market is also broadened with respect to GI-home loans in that 50 percent of the lenders portfolio of such loans insured after April 30, 1948, are made eligible for sale to the Federal National Mortgage Association. As noted in the preceding section veterans cooperate housing projects are accorded a preferential 95 percent insured mortgage. While not involved in this legislation, attention may be called to the fact that the Housing and Rent Act of 1948 gives veterans a priority for the purchase of all newly constructed housing and priority for occupancy in all newly constructed rental housing.

CONCLUSION

This country is experiencing a housing boom which promises to reach over a million units this year, a building record never before equaled in this or any other country. The provisions of this bill are designed to keep this momentum going. While a full use is being made of existing supplies of labor and materials it is believed that the financial incentives offered in this bill will attract labor and materials into an even greater production of housing units through emphasis on lower cost construction.

Americans Don't Want Peacetime Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by me on the subject, Americans Don't Want Peacetime Conscription, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICANS DON'T WANT PEACETIME CONSCRIPTION

My friends, if there is any European practice that Americans don't want, it is peacetime conscription. The drafting of young men in peacetime has been the curse of Europe ever since the days of Napoleon. It has robbed every nation in Europe of its young manpower during the period of greatest productivity and sooner or later has lined up armies of conscripts to fight and kill each other over trivial issues. The cost in destruction has kept European standards of living from even approaching ours.

No, we don't want peacetime conscription over here!

For nearly 4 years this administration has been trying to put through Congress a bill for universal military training. The Army was working for it. Big business put on a tremendous lobbying effort and most of the metropolitan newspapers were lined up in support of it. Yet this particular application of peacetime conscription has just been defeated in Congress for the fourth time.

Who do you suppose defeated it? It was the informal cooperation of a great variety of national groups of opinion that defeated it.

In the first place, the churches were against it, both Catholic and Protestant. When these great moral forces agree on a policy, they have tremendous power. They have been adamant against peacetime conscription.

The second great body of opposition came from the educators. A handful of eastern university presidents wanted conscription to back our policy of global intervention with the bodies of our young men but when a showdown came at a conference of university presidents, the vote after a hot debate was against it nearly three to one. And the same proportion or better prevails among the high-school principals and superintendents, and the grade-school teachers, who are the closest to the people. They know it is bad for the country and the plain people don't want it.

Then, organized labor is against it. The CIO and the A. F. of L. have found it difficult to agree on many things but they knew from the start that they were against peacetime conscription. They had seen how it worked in France, where the government broke strikes by ordering the strikers into the Army, and they didn't want that tyranny over labor to be started here. They know peacetime conscription is the last step before fascism.

And, of course, the farm organizations are against it. Farmers everywhere hate war, and the farmers of America are no exception. They love freedom. They hate being pushed around. And when the hearings on UMT were held this spring before the Senate Armed Services Committee, I was proud that, among the great organizations that testified in opposition were the National Grange, the National Farm Bureau Federation and the National Farmers Union.

I hardly need to add that the active peace organizations are against it. They know that governments with armies at their command are going to want to use them to get power or territory or maybe oil. I believe that this has become understood largely because of the splendid educational work of Mr. Frederick J. Libby and the National Council for Prevention of War, which for over 25 years has been the leader in this battle for peace. Peacetime conscription confers dangerous powers upon politicians and generals. An ambitious leader sometimes thinks it necessary to go to war in order to divert his people from their very real grievances at home.

Some Congressmen have thought that the opposition of these great national bodies came only from the top, that the rank-and-file were not interested. But I noticed that during the past month the geenral conference of the Methodist Church with 800 delegates representing 8,000,000 members declared almost unanimously against any peacetime conscription, and this included the present draft bill. I noticed that the Northern Baptist Convention, composed of 5,000 delegates representing a membership of as many millions, took exactly the same position. So did the great Presbyterian Convention and the Southern Baptist Convention and the Unitarian Convention. It is this practical unanimity among the members of national organizations that has made it impossible for big business and the big brass to impose peacetime conscription on the American people.

You may ask me, then, how it happens that the Senate has just passed a peacetime conscription bill called the draft bill. It is only because the Army whipped up an artificial war hysteria and people were jittery about what might happen before Congress gets back next January.

Not only was this war hysteria whipped up artificially for the express purpose of pushing a peacetime conscription bill through Congress before the people woke up, but in preparation for it, the National Guard and the organized Reserves for 3 years have been treated like stepchildren. The requirements imposed on volunteers have been stepped up until half those who applied could be rejected. Whereas the draft bill calls for 2 years' service, volunteers were accepted by the Army for nothing less than 3 years. The intellectual requirements have been raised to a point where, so the papers reported, the Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee himself was unable to answer five out of six of the questions GIs have been expected to answer.

In order further to confuse the American people, a new draft bill has been introduced every few days. There have been different bills in the Senate from those that were offered in the House. Many of us became convinced that the Army chiefs themselves don't know what they want except that they want peacetime conscription at any price.

I was 1 of 10 Senators that voted against this un-American system. I know that the draft bill is not needed to get a fine army, provided the obstacles to enlistment are removed and reasonable incentives are provided to make service in the American Army attractive.

I spoke on the radio recently against conscription and for human rights, and you would be surprised at the tremendous volume of approving letters that have poured into my office as the result of my opposition to the draft legislation that has just passed the Senate. Letters and telegrams have come literally in bucketfuls.

The House of Representatives has not yet acted on the draft bill. It will take up the question tomorrow or Tuesday. You should wire Speaker MARTIN to see to it that the House Rules Committee buries it tomorrow "without benefit of clergy." Then a simple bill can be introduced by the Armed Services Committee, stepping up the pay for GI's to a more reasonable figure comparable with the pay of civilians, reducing the intellectual requirements to somewhere near what they were during the war, permitting volunteers to enlist for a 2-year term instead of 3 years, and giving the National Guard and Reserves a square deal.

If the Rules Committee fails to quash the draft bill, then wire Speaker MARTIN and your Representaties to do so. The draft is not needed. It will upset 10,000,000 homes in order to secure 250,000 soldiers. A willing and contented army, obtained in the true American way, will be a finer army than the draft bill can give us. You can lick this draft bill but send your telegrams to Speaker JOE MARTIN and not to me.

We must maintain freedom in America. It is freedom's last home on earth. If we lose it here, God pity the world.

There is also now pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee the notorious Mundt-Nixon bill. Our American tradition allows us to speak our minds as we wish, to hear what we wish, to criticize the policies of our Government, and to join with others to advance our views.

Only with such rights can the people govern themselves. Without these rights we can neither inform others nor learn from them. We cannot solve problems if we silence those who offer solutions. We cannot have reforms if we suppress reformers. In our democracy ideas and reforms, initially unpopular, are constantly being woven into the fabric of our society.

For these reasons, the first amendment to our Constitution provides that Congress can make no law to abridge freedom of speech, press, or assembly.

The Mundt-Nixon bill would end these rights, so vital to our democracy. It would make criminals of persons seeking to effect changes in our Government by constitutional and orderly means. It would destroy organizations merely because they advocate change in social or economic conditions. For the first time, the Federal Government would, by penal law, brand groups of persons as subversive merely because their views are disapproved by the public officials temporarily in power.

The proponents of the bill tell us that it is directed only against some enemy within our gates which owes allegiance to a foreign power, and that it merely exposes these enemies without restraining freedom of speech and assembly.

These are not the facts, nor do we need this bill for these alleged purposes. We already have a plethora of statutes against treason, sedition, espionage, and the advocacy of the overthrow of the Government by force and violence. Our statutes already require the exposure by registration of agents of foreign powers. If these statutes have technical defects, they can be improved by technical amendments.

The truth is that the Mundt-Nixon bill is not directed against internal enemies; it is not directed against dangerous actions; it is not even primarily directed against communism. It is a blatant attempt to restrain the effectual advocacy of changes in the status quo.

The bill permits the suppression of organizations and the blacklisting of their members. The organizations which can be suppressed under the bill are described by definitions which are so vague and indefinite that they can be applied to almost any group whose views do not meet with the favor of conservative politicians. Furthermore, these definitions rely heavily on the views expressed by organizations that permit blacklisting of individuals not on the basis of their own acts or views but merely for a guilt derived entirely from association.

Thus almost any farm or labor union, for example, could be branded as a Communist-front organization under the definitions of the bill simply because it advocates certain views which are also advanced by the Communist Party. For example, advocacy of public housing, price control, repeal of the Taft-Hartley law, removal of racial discriminations, and extension of social security. The organizations of millions of Americans who, like myself, oppose the draft, could be labeled subversive because, perchance, the Communist Party likewise opposes the draft.

The evils of the bill are compounded by the circumstance that the Attorney General, always a prominent politician of the party in executive power, is authorized to determine under these loose definitions which organizations, including opposing political parties, are to be stigmatized as disloyal. And this determination would be made without benefit of jury or the presumption of innocence or the rules of evidence which prevail in court for the trial of the most petty offense.

Nor is it true that the bill only exposes and does not outlaw or suppress organizations. It is impossible for any organization to register under the bill and thereafter survive, since registration will be regarded as a confession of disloyalty and will likewise expose its members to economic and social blacklisting. Yet if an organization subject to the bill does not register, it and its members may incur severe crimial punishment. Accordingly, an organization found, under the vague standards of the bill, to be Communist, can neither register nor refrain from registering. It must either go out of existence altogether or become an underground organization hounded by Federal police for the very fact of existing.

It is gratifying that so many of our leading citizens and organizations recognize that the Mundt-Nixon bill is a threat to America's freedom. The labor movement, represented by the A. F. of L., the CIO, and the Railroad Brotherhoods, opposes the bill, as does the National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People, the Board of Christian Social Relations of the Episcopal Diocese of Newark, the Friends Committee on National Legislation, the National Council of Jewish Women, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Lawyers' Guild, Americans for Democratic Action, and a host of others.

The Mundt-Nixon bill is therefore, inconsistent with and a threat of a free government. I cannot believe that the people of this Nation will not recognize it as a measure of a police state.

Address by Hon. John Sherman Cooper, of Kentucky, to the Kentucky Society of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by me at the annual meeting of the Kentucky Society of New York, in New York City, May 19, 1948.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I deeply appreciate and I am greatly honored by your invitation to be your guest and to speak to you for a little while this evening.

In talking to your president, about a subject for the evening, I found him very generous. The only limitations which he imposed were the direct limitation that I should not talk too long and the indirect suggestion that I should avoid partisan politics.

Of course, to debar a Kentuckian from talking about politics is a great invasion of his freedom of speech, right of assembly, the right of petition and redress, and leaves him practically speechless. This restriction came as a kind of disappointment, as I had looked forward to finding here a political climate and atmosphere more favorable than a Kentucky Republican sometimes finds at home.

Actually, one of the great experiences of my life has been the opportunity that I have had to visit every section of Kentucky and to meet and know its people. I have found everywhere the great courtesy and consideration which are the hallmarks of the Kentuckian.

Of course I shall talk of Kentucky and I know that everything that I shall say has been said before and in a happier and clearer manner. We would not be true Kentuckians if we were not proud of our State and did not believe that its history, traditions and folklore make it a land set apart from others.

If we should view it without imagination, without a sense of history, and in the colorless light of material statistics, it might be difficult to establish our assumption.

We could say with truth that we are the largest producer of bluegrass, hemp, and asphalt, and the fourth largest producer of coal in the Nation, and yet be forced to admit that in industrial development we lag behind many other Southern States. Though we say with exact certainty that we produce in greatest volume products which contribute to the amenities and the pleasures of living—there will be souls without understanding who will not consider it important.

We can speak of a rich culture and of its native contributions; of Jouett, West, Duveneck, Hart, and Shryock, artists, sculptors and architects; of Audubon, Shaler, Linney, Fitch, and McDowell, scientists and naturalists; of Allen, Fox, Johnston, Cawein, Stuart, O'Hara, writers and poets; and of Prentice, Cobb and Watterson, journalists. If the work of our people who have written and sung of Kentucky is colored with romanticism and fails to give Kentucky the epical treatment that it deserves, we cannot object, for we, too, think and speak and sing of it in the same mystic and romantic manner.

Kentucky has sent an unusual number of her sons and daughters into the political life of the Nation. In every national election between 1824 and 1864, with a single exception, a Kentuckian was the choice of one or more of the chief political parties, either for the office of President or Vice President. One native son, Lincoln, and one citizen, Taylor, became President, four became Vice President, and Jefferson Davis was to serve as the lone President of the Confederacy.

Kentuckians have served as Speakers of the House of Representatives for a greater total of years than the citizens of any other State, and in the Congress there have been few Americans who have matched the eloquence, the influence, and the statesmanship of Clay, Breckinridge, and Crittenden. Nine of her sons have reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and today three of its nine members, including the Chief Justice, are Kentuckians. For a century and a half, Kentucky has been truly named the mother of Governors, for from her soil 107 have gone to serve 28 commonwealths and territories.

I shall not attempt to speak of its women, its Calloway, its Mary Breckinridge, its Laura Clay, its Roberts, Johnston, Rice, and of their courage, beauty, and social consciousness, for if I should say too little, it would be understatement, and if I should say too much or speak gracelessly, I would disappoint.

And yet with all the achievements of 150 years, there are defects in education, health, and other fields, which give us pause and lead some of our own people and people of other States to criticize the substance and fabric of our progress.

These criticisms should lead us to question objectively, and to inquire into the fundamentals of Kentucky life.

When the first cable to Europe was completed, and the first message sent, it is said that Emerson bore the news to his friend Thoreau that "a message had been sent by cable to Europe." Thoreau, with deeper perception, asked, "What did the message say?" We can similarly ask, What is the message that Kentucky history has borne to the Nation?

What are the elements, the characteristics of the Kentuckian? Who is he, and what manner of man is he? At home, he may not have reached that level of material accomplishment, of social progress, of social security, or planned mediocrity which seems to occupy our interest today. He may not be always conscious of his own attributes and characteristics, but in the perspective of history, I do not believe that I exaggerate or oversimplify when I say that his background, his interests, and his influence are important, because they have expressed principles upon which our concept of the free men and representative government are based.

He is the first and the continuing pioneer of the land. In defiance of an edict of King George III issued in 1763, that no person should immigrate beyond the Appalachians, Dr. Walker, Gist, Boone, Finley, Harrod, and the long hunters penetrated into Kentucky and wrested it from the Iroquois and Cherokees. When the Revolution was over, young veterans turned their tired faces from Yorktown, King Mountain, and Cowpens and began the long journey by Cumberland Gap and the Ohio River to that land which Dr. Walker had called "beautiful but devoid of inhabitants."

In an island of isolation, separated from the eastern seaboard by the mountains, threatened from the north and the west by the British and Cherokees, and with the ever-impending danger that the Mississippi River would be closed to them, the restless souls and energies of these pioneers demanded the expansion which was to bring into the Union an area larger than that encompassed by the Thirteen Colonies and the entire eastern seaboard.

In 1778 and '79, George Rogers Clark, just 26 years old, led 250 Kentuckians from the Falls of the Ohio to the West and in one of the bravest campaigns in history, established the American frontier upon the Mississippi.

Kentucky pioneers recognized the imperative necessity that the Mississippi should be free and in a large measure, it was their insistence which brought about the Louisiana Purchase. The list of States created from the Louisiana Purchase is eloquent testimony of their wisdom: Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, and Oklahama. Later, at Tippecanoe, at the Thames, and at New Orleans, they furnished the riflemen, and the bulk of men who, in bloody battle, made secure for the Nation the Northwest and the Purchase.

A second quality of the Kentuckian is his fierce love of freedom. At the very beginning of pioneer life Kentuckians repudiated a movement for the organization and domination of the State, its lands, and its government by the Transylvania Committee, a private organization. Later, when they found the institutions of Virginia too formal and restrictive for their needs and customs, they set in motion the conventions which made Kentucky County of Virginia the second new State in the Union.

In these first constitutions of 1792 and 1799, they were careful to incorporate a bill of rights of 28 sections guaranteeing that every Kentuckian should have the right of free speech, worship, due process of law, assembly, free press, and the right to bear arms in defense of himself and country.

Their understanding of individual freedom and civil rights was not that understanding which is so loudly expressed today—a demand for rights even though the demands deny the rights of others—but it was a universal concept of individual liberty for all persons. When, in 1790, the Congress of the United States passed the Alien and Sedition Act, empowering the President by proclamation to restrain the civil liberties of aliens, it was the Kentucky Legislature, encouraged by Thomas Jefferson, which adopted the famous Kentucky resolutions protesting the action of Congress. In the resolutions it was stated that this Commonwealth is determined to submit undelegated and consequently unlimited powers in no man, or body of men, on earth.'

It was only natural that this belief in individual freedom and the spirit of self-reliance forged in hard and difficult circumstances in which men and women lived, should foster an accompanying belief in the equality of men.

The Kentuckian may be reserved, diffident, backward, but in his attitude and demeanor there is no subservience. It never occurs to the resident of the mountains, the Bluegrass, the Pennyrile, or the Purchase that he is not as good as any other man. This is a characteristic that residents of other States do not always understand, and they are surprised sometimes to find pride and resentment in those to whom they would seek to extend the private or public paternalism and the new material social order which intrigue other peoples and sections of the Nation.

The sympathy of Kentuckians went out to the French in their struggle for freedom, and it is historically true early political leaders and clubs were influenced by the French philosophy of equalitarianism. It is, however, more practical to believe that the sympathetic feeling held for France by the mass of the people grew from their love of equality.

This belief in equality held by Kentuckians has contributed to the political structure of this Nation. Our Constitution was the first in all the world to grant the right to vote to all men, who at the time were free, without restriction, and today all men, of all creeds and color, vote in Kentucky. For the first time representation was based upon number, every man being treated as an individual rather than by his wealth, or his education, or station in life. In 1850, when the third Constitution was being written, the members of the Convention considered equal suffrage for women and invited Miss Laura Clay to address the Convention.

There is no doubt in the mind of the Kentuckian that he, his family, his State, his country, his community, stand as equals with all others.

A fourth quality of the Kentuckian is his understanding of the relationship between freedom and law.

The Kentuckian learned by hard experience that liberty and freedom live only under law. Chafing first under the restrictions of Virginia, and then of the Federal Government, disliking outside direction, possessed of an impatience with all restraint which moved Boone to say that he "no longer cared for Kentucky because its people had grown too easy of life," it was not surprising that in its early history, some were attracted by the intrigues of George Rogers Clark with the French, by those of Wilkinson and Sebastian with the Spanish, and by Burr, all concerned with the purpose of establishing a separate and freer nation in the West.

The majority of Kentucky delegates to the Virginia convention voted against the ratification of the Federal Constitution, and the Kentucky resolutions first voiced the doctrine of nullification.

The circumstances under which they lived forced them at times to act in advance of action by the law, and there was bred an extra-legal attitude, which persisted for generations.

But against these more drastic demonstrations of individuality outside the community and the law, two ameliorating forces were working.

One was political. The 10 conventions seeking statehood, the act of statehood, the adoption of two constitutions with their protecting bill of rights, the establishment of the courts, the participation in wars for the Union, the wise leadership of Humphrey Marshall, of Daviess, of Breckinridge, of Shelby, the philosophical discussions of political clubs, notably the Danville Club, struck deeper roots than the separatists knew, and tied freedom to law. The election of Jefferson expressed the political beliefs of the West, and cemented Kentucky emotionally to the Union. In the 30 years that followed, the leadership of Henry Clay bound intellectually the loyalties of Kentucky to the Union.

The second force against separatism and unbridled freedom, was the development of Kentucky's community life. In the seven difficult years following the adoption of a constitution, when 1,500 settlers were killed by Indians, the people raised the first instruments of civilization and culture. Schools, colleges, the press, the church, began their ameliorating influences, and there developed a love of home, of country, of State, and of section that is epitomized in the immortal song of Stephen Foster, "My Old Kentucky Home."

The two loyalties, one for State and one for the Union, were to clash but once and for a last time in a tragic war which still holds our interest today. In that war the division of loyalties was matched in the division of families, serving under the leadership of two Kentuckians, Lincoln and Davis, who led the causes of North and South.

As a State, Kentucky stood by the Union, and by that action renounced forever the doctrine of nullification, and yielded herself forever to the principle of liberty and freedom under the Constitution and the law.

Finally, Kentuckians know that liberty under law and the institutions of a free government, are worth preserving and must be continually preserved even if the struggle shall demand the sword.

In early pioneer years, when 1,500 settlers were killed by Indians, as they struggled to establish their homes, 300 Kentuckians went with Clark to win the West.

In the second war of independence, 7,000 Kentuckian volunteers were with Shelby and Johnson on the Thames, and her riflemen with their long rifles joined the Tennesseeans in Jackson's victory at New Orleans. They were at the Alamo and at San Jacinto where Texas won her independence. A flag, made by Kentucky women, was carried by Kentucky riflemen.

McKee, young Clay, Jefferson Davis, and Zachary Taylor are symbols of those who were at Monterey, Cerro Gordo, and Buena Vista, and the small villages in Kentucky which today bear Spanish names mark the return of the soldiers of the Mexican War. In the War Between the States, Kentucky furnished more troops to the North and South in proportion to its population than did any other State to either army.

In the Spanish-American War it oversubscribed its quota of volunteers; in World War I it furnished the only county in the United States, Breathitt, where volunteers made unnecessary the draft; and in World War II, before selective service became effective, it gave a greater number of volunteers to the service in proportion to its population than did any other State.

In battle, our people have been separated only once, and then not for long. On the battlefield of Chickamauga stands a statue erected by Kentucky to its dead. It is an unusual statue, different from that of all other States, because it commemorates the dead of both northern and southern armies. Its inscription reads, "As we are united in life, let them be united in death. Let one monument perpetuate their deeds, and one people, forgetful of all asperities, forever hold in grateful remembrance all the glories of that terrible conflict which made all men free and preserved every star on the Nation's flag."

I have not wanted to be fulsome or extravagant, nor do I desire to detract from the loyal devotion of every other section of the Nation. But as note today the cynicism of men toward the principles of free government and the worth and value of its maintenance, I have wanted to point out these qualities of Kentuckians which have influenced and will continue to influence the democratic and free development of the Nation.

The principles of free government and of free men are under attack today, not directly, but indirectly; not by the courageous, but by the glancing blow.

Since the very beginning of life the noblest concept of mankind has been that man may be free in body, in mind, and in spirit. There may be food and drink, material security, the refinements of civilization and the power and majesty of government, but the soul must die unless it is free.

In our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution mere men were not presumptuous enough to assume to confer these spiritual rights upon other men. They declared only that they would secure them against other nations, other men, the tyranny of the Government and its minorities and its majorities.

Our life has become complex. The aspirations and hopes of the people grow continually. It is difficult for them to find expression in an industrial society. Appealing to these unsatisfied desires, men are turning back from the progress made in centuries of struggle to a new kind of tyranny, the totality of the state.

We see statism in its worst aspects in Russia and the unhappy countries under its control, but it moves throughout the world. It is here. Wherever it is, or whatever may be the extent of its development, it is based upon power, force, and coercion, ideas inconsistent with the ideas of freedom.

Here and everywhere there is always the promise of benefits to be conferred by the state, followed by ever-expanding power which ultimately limits freedom. Such a system cannot live in the arguments of reason. It must exist by direct force, or indirectly by surrender to pressure groups. Justice gives way to favoritism, principle to expediency, and truth to propaganda. The last and worst consequences reveal themselves in the intellectual and spiritual life of men. The final end is a sort of mass consciousness destructive of personal responsibility.

In an industrial society there must be adjustments, and measures of security must complement the principle of opportunity. But we must have the vision and the will to make adjustments without losing the qualities of individual freedom and responsibility which set this country apart and make it the hope of the world.

Our system is at grips with communism, a system of force, either for peace or for war.

We cannot match it by surrendering to it. We cannot match it in the initial stages of force. We cannot match it in propaganda. Our greatest world influence will come from our own unashamed practice of individual and economic freedom. It has a quality which has always triumphed and will again triumph if it is but used.

It is the slow but eternal appeal to man's sense of justice, to his personal and spiritual responsibility.

I have dared to say that Kentuckians believe in and have practiced these principles throughout their history, and it is that belief and practice which marks their greatest contribution to the Nation.

Men today are impatient, but Kentuckians have a sense and love of tradition growing from their experience and their recognition of the continuity of the struggle of life. It is for that reason that we look to the past as well as to the future.

It is for that reason that we respect our families and our fathers. A century and a half has passed since they entered the quiet valley of our State, and no man lives today who knew them or heard their voices. Yet, in our noblest and best moments, they speak to us in all that we possess and in all that we are, and in all the future holds for us. I do not know what the days will bring, or when and how we will again be tested. I know that we will meet the test, and that when the day comes, the brave and gentle spirits of our fathers will be around us., their hands will slip into our hands and we shall hear them say "You cannot fail. You are our children."

The Communists' 1944 Endorsement of Mr. Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, there are perhaps many reasons why the President does not like to have Congress investigate communism in the Government. The information published in the Daily Worker on August 12, 1944, may have a bearing on this situation.

In that paper there is a special election article called the Decisive Three Months written by Eugene Dennis, the well-known Communist leader. Mr. Dennis speaks officially for the Communists. The gist of the whole article, written back there in 1944, was an endorsement by the Communists of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman. This Communist article says:

> The question is put whether or not labor and the people, the cause of progress, suffered by Wallace's defeat for the Vice Presidential nomination?
> The answer to this is a categoric no.
> It is true that Wallace, a staunch supporter of Roosevelt's policies and the leading choice of the popular forces, failed to secure the Vice Presidential nomination. But it is also a fact that the nominee selected is a win-the-war candidate and is a consistent supporter of Roosevelt's war and postwar policies. This can hardly be judged as a defeat for labor and the popular forces!

Apparently the Communists were very well satisfied with the selection of Harry Truman for Vice President. This official Communist article also says:

> Roosevelt and the camp of national unity have been strengthened and not weakened by Truman's nomination.

This article referred to is just full of advice and directions to the Communists of the United States as to how they could be more effective in bringing about the election of the late Mr. Roosevelt and Harry Truman. They say:

> The Democratic ticket headed by Roosevelt and Truman continues the national leadership dedicated to speedily winning the war and forging a just peace. It is a ticket representative not only of the Democratic Party but of important and wider sections of the camp of national unity.

Now, of course, the apologists for the New Deal's sinking ship will say that Mr. Truman was not responsible for this Communist endorsement and that he should not be held accountable for it. Well, here is what the Communists say about that in their same article:

> We Communists must refrain from taking such unilateral actions as that of endorsing candidates, unless this is done in full agreement with the given candidate and with our collaborators.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it will be quite evident to the voters of America that Mr. Truman never got very mad at the Communists until he lost their political support and they supported Wallace. Since then he has called them a lot of names. The record of the administration for keeping Communists in high office, especially in policy-making places, is well established. The evidence on that score is being added to day by day.

This matter is not merely material for a political argument, it reveals a grave tragedy. At the time our Nation was making every sacrifice to win two wars, at the very time that the brave American boys were advancing from island to island and from beachhead to beachhead, the Communists in the New Deal Government in Washington were destroying the peace, using the resources and might of this Nation to aid Stalin. This sorry world picture did not come about accidently. It is the result of the terrible failures of the administration.

In recent days evidence has been laid before the country that one Alger Hiss is a Communist. It is well known that Mr. Hiss has held many important positions in our Government and that he helped shape the policy. He was the man that the New Deal sent to San Francisco to make the arrangements and lay the ground work for the San Francisco Conference for the formation of the United Nations. The evidence indicates that at that time Mr. Hiss was an agent of Mr. Stalin. One thing is clear, about my record in Congress and that is that I have opposed communism at every turn. On November 28, 1945, I told the Congress:

> Mr. Speaker, if the efforts of General MacArthur, General Wedemeyer, and General Marshall, our new Ambassador to China, are going to be successful in maintaining peace, their efforts must not be sabotaged by underlings in the State Department. The Secretary of State owes it to his country and to his President, who is responsible for our foreign policy, to have the Federal Bureau of Investigation thoroughly investigate such men of his Department as Alger Hiss and others and make that record public.

The retaining of Alger Hiss in key positions in the Government certainly was not an oversight. Many others besides myself were making like demands upon the administration.

In 1946 I served on the special committee to investigate the conduct of elections. That committee found that the Communist Party did take part in the congressional elections in several States. We further found that the Communist Party did not file a financial report as required by law. Now, the Democratic Party had to file a copy of their receipts and expenditures, the Republicans had to do it and every other party had to do it. The Communists totally disregarded the law. By unanimous action of this special committee this matter was referred to the Attorney General of the United States. Did Mr. Truman's Attorney General take action against the Communists for this violation? No. I checked with the Department of Justice within the last 2 or 3 days and no action was ever brought up against the Communists for this violation. In order to be fair let it be said that if there were legal technicalities that indicated a prosecution could not be successful, at least the Attorney General could have reported back to Congress and asked for some amendments to the law so that the Communist Party would not have been treated any better than the other political parties. I wonder how the Democrats over the country like the idea of being required to file a report on the money they take in and the money they spend and no such requirement is made of the Communist Party.

A well founded report has come in to the effect that when this matter was laid before the Attorney General it was referred not to the criminal section or prosecuting section but to the section on civil rights. Just why laws should be enforced against Democrats and Republicans at the same time the Communists are being coddled and favored by the New Deal administration is quite hard to understand. Maybe the Communists were telling the truth when they said as I referred to in a previous quotation, that they would refrain from endorsing any candidate unless it is done with full agreement of the candidate and their collaborators. What kind of an agreement did they have with Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman back in 1944? Is there some good reason why the President wants to pass this off as the mere dragging out of a "red herring"?

The Record of the Democratic Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article prepared by me in regard to the record of the Democratic Party, published in the Philadelphia Bulletin of July 11.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR MYERS ACCLAIMS DEMOCRATS' RECORD

(By FRANCIS J. MYERS, United States Senator from Pennsylvania)

It has been 12 years since the Democratic Party held its first national political convention in Philadelphia in 1936. Democratic control of the executive branch of the Federal Government now is going into its sixteenth consecutive year. As delegates and alternate delegates from all over the United States and its possessions gather here to decide on the party's candidates for President and Vice President in this year of decision—perhaps the most fateful since the Nation was born—one fact stands out with clarity and force.

The Democratic Party must go before the people and seek their support and a vote of continuing confidence on the basis of its record of accomplishment since 1932. This record of fulfillment of pledges made to the American people in previous successful campaigns is the best possible guaranty of the party's good faith and ability and willingness to carry out the platform pledges that will be made in 1948.

As Democrats, we are content to stand on that record. Although there have been mistakes and countless irritations, I believe that the improvement of living standards and economic justice resulting from legislation passed during the Roosevelt and Truman administrations cannot be matched in the whole history of our country since the first Constitutional Convention established a new nation here in Philadelphia.

Much of this program now is beyond the reach of partisan destructiveness and will endure for many years as a monument to the Democratic Party and its leaders—Presidents Roosevelt and Truman.

REVIEWS STATE OF UNION

What is the state of the Union as we go into this crucial Presidential election after 16 years of Democratic control of the executive branch and 14 years of control of Congress?

Let us review briefly the condition of the country in January 1933, when the Democrats, under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, took over the reins of government from a faltering leadership. We were in the depths of the worst economic depression in our history. More than 12,000,000 were unemployed. The Nation's banks were closed.

Thousands of factories and mills were idle. Business was stagnated. Mortgages on farms and homes were being foreclosed in unprecedented numbers. Sheriff sales were at an all-time high.

With the calm assurance symbolized in his remark that "We have nothing to fear but fear itself," President Roosevelt and a Democratic Congress set about the task of reviving the economy and restoring public confidence.

Since that day, we have conquered a great depression and emerged victorious from the most terrible war in our history.

FREEDOM UNIMPAIRED

We have emerged from this war not only with our freedom unimpaired but stronger than ever before in our history.

We have accomplished the transition from an economy geared to global war to an economy of production for peace with a minimum of dislocation.

Not only have we maintained the high levels of profits, production, and employment achieved during the war, but we have exceeded them.

All segments of our economy have benefited, the farmer, labor, small business, and big business.

Farm income has more than tripled since 1932.

Corporate profits, after taxes, were seventeen billions in 1947. They unquestionably will exceed twenty billions after taxes in 1948 if current rates of earnings are maintained.

The average annual gross national production under the Truman administration has been more than $212,000,000,000. This compares with an average of $93,800,000 in the boom years of 1925–28.

SIXTY MILLION AT WORK

Civilian employment has averaged 55,400,000 during the Truman administration. It has reached the total of 60,000,000 at work.

The average for the years 1929–33 was 42,300,000 at work.

The average real disposable income per each individual in the United States today is $1,249 compared with only $744 during the years 1929–33. Even with the increase in the cost of living following the war, due primarily in my opinion to the failure of Congress to give President Truman authority to impose controls if necessary, and to the premature abandonment by Congress of genuine price control, that is an improvement.

Although the municipal government in Philadelphia was for many years hostile to the acceptance of help from the Federal Government for such projects as public housing, rehabilitation of the water system and slum clearance or to the idea of Federal long term, low interest rate loans for the financing of essential public improvements, the impact of measures taken by the national administrations to revive prosperity and increase purchasing power throughout the country have had a tremendous effect here. It is true that we lost hundreds of millions of dollars that rightfully belonged in Philadelphia. The Federal grants and loans that Philadelphia allowed to go by default were snapped up eagerly by other cities. Although Philadelphians paid their share, and more, of Federal taxes, other areas of the country benefited from tax dollars collected here. In addition, our failure to take advantage of Federal assistance at a time of low construction costs has made it necessary to pay for all of these necessary improvements wholly from local and State funds at a time of high construction costs.

OFFICIAL ATTITUDE CHANGED

It is significant that the attitude of Philadelphia's city officials has undergone a complete reversal since those days of early hostility and that they now are numbered among the most outspoken supporters of Federal assistance for such projects as airport development, low-income public housing, slum clearance and other public works.

This is in part a tribute to the successful working out of federally assisted projects already established here. More than 35,000 persons now are living in housing projects administered by the Philadelphia Housing Authority. This includes approximately 13,000 persons in low income housing units, and 22,000 in permanent war housing, temporary war housing, and veterans' housing projects. An additional 19,500 units of low income public housing for Philadelphia was contemplated but the provisions that would have made them possible were eliminated from the housing bill passed by the last Congress.

Philadelphia has acquired a "new look" since the first Democratic convention here in 1936 as a result of these and other federally financed measures for the assistance not only of low income groups and slum dwellers but of private builders and businessmen generally. Thousands of homes have been built by private builders and bought by middle income groups through FHA mortgage financing.

BUSINESS EXPANDED

Business establishments have expanded and in many cases staved off bankruptcy with the assistance of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the various war-loan agencies of the Federal Government. The International Airport was built with WPA labor. Many of the improvements in Fairmount Park and in other parks were accomplished with WPA labor. Many new public schools were constructed with the help of funds supplied by the Public Works Authority and the Federal Works Administration.

Labor's right to organize and to bargain collectively for higher wages and better working conditions were written into the fundamental law of the land.

Bank depositors were protected against loss through the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Millions were protected against an old age of dependence and pauperism through social security.

Millions were tided over temporary periods of unemployment through the operation of unemployment compensation insurance.

FOREIGN POLICY PRAISED

The recognition that the Federal Government has an obligation to aid in providing opportunities for employment to American workers was written into the law of the land.

In the field of foreign affairs, Democratic national administrations acted courageously to see to it that we were not forced to face a combination of powerful and hostile dictators without allies. This farsighted leadership gave us time to prepare and to build up our own Army, Navy, and Air Force.

One of the major accomplishments of the Democratic administration, which was hamstrung by crippling amendments by the last Congress was the development of the reciprocal trade agreements program initiated and nursed by former Secretary of State Cordell Hull.

That briefly and sketchily is the Democratic record. It is a record in which we can take pride. It is a record we offer to the American people as the surest guarantee that we will carry out our campaign pledges in 1948.

Nations must be dynamic to survive. We most look forward and strive constantly for new goals of progress and social betterment for our people, or we will retrogress and become weak. We of the Democratic Party, in this year of decision, 1948, are looking to the future.

War Record of Lt. Merrill H. Tilghman III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the war record of Lt. Merrill H. Tilghman III, of Wayne, Pa., who was buried in Arlington National Cemetery on July 27, 1948.

There being no objection, the record was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Funeral services were held July 27 for Lt. Merrill H. Tilghman III at Arlington National Cemetery, Fort Myer, Va.

Lieutenant Tilghman, a resident of Wayne, Pa., was a Field Artillery officer, 27 years of age, killed in action at Anzio on May 24, 1944. A veteran of those first spearhead invasions of Africa and Sicily, he held battle stars for five major campaigns, including some of the bitterest fighting of the war. He also held the Purple Heart. His promotion to first lieutenant took place on the field of battle in October 1943, a few months after the Sicilian exploit.

The citation accompanying the Bronze Star award for the latter reads:

"For valorous conduct in connection with military operations against an enemy of the United States. On August 4, 1943, near San Stefano, Sicily, an enemy artillery barrage, falling on the battery area, set afire a 2½-ton ammunition truck.

"The high explosive and smoke shells began exploding and in turn ignited the camouflage net on a nearby kitchen truck. Despite the enemy artillery shells that continued to fall nearby, and ammunition that was exploding only 30 yards away, Lieutenant Tilghman ran to the truck, disengaged it from a wrecked trailer, and with the vehicle's top burning, drove it to a place of safety where he extinguished the flames."

Lieutenant Tilghman was a graduate of Haverford School, Amherst College, and received his master's degree at the University of Pennsylvania. He was employed with the legal department of the Pennsylvania Railroad when he entered the service. He received his commission as second lieutenant at Fort Sill, Okla., in September 1942, and went overseas the following month, participating in the initial invasion of Africa.

The Civil-Rights Program

OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address regarding the privileges Americans enjoy, broadcast by me on June 7, 1948, over the facilities of the American Broadcasting Co.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, everybody I talk to says he loves liberty, freedom, democracy, the Declaration of Independence, the Bill of Rights, the Constitution, and all the rights that go with it.

The Freedom Train has spent months crossing and recrossing this land of ours. Millions of men, women, and children—those who are in the majority in this country, and some in the minority—who were permitted to see all these treasured papers, filed past the exhibits hour after hour and day after day.

The peace for which we fight in time of war and the peace we hope to maintain between wars, hot or cold, is a peace of all the people, maintained on the basis of harmony within our borders, and harmony with our neighbors in one world.

There was a pianist of some note who explained that harmony on the keyboard is obtained by blending the tones from the white keys and the black keys. Harmony is the absence of discord. Discord promotes strife and the common welfare thus becomes a costly thing to maintain.

Today the air is filled with discussion of such terms as "communistic," "fascistic," "subversive," "disloyal," and others, and almost everyone has his own idea of how to cure these cankers on the body politic; but cures are not brought about by the tonic of expediency nor the remedy of evasion and avoidance. Only the elixir of compliance without mental reservation injected into the blood stream of national life will ever bring us the domestic tranquillity, adequate assurance of full compliance with the necessity for the common defense, promotion of the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty, as set forth in the Declaration of Independence.

It was said of Thomas Jefferson, the author of our Declaration of Independence, that while he and his associates were at work upon this fiery document, just outside his study window were the slaves who had still to wait almost another 100 years before they themselves were to be made freemen.

I am not speaking my views on this occasion, now, any more than at any time in the past, simply because they are timely but because I believe that when I raised my right hand and placed my other hand upon the Bible, I, as did all the other Members of the Congress, along with the President of the United States, took an oath of office to defend the same Constitution of the United States against enemies from within as well as from without.

This is an election year; a time when precampaign promises are most numerous. The ink has not yet dried on the civil-rights proposals of the President's committee who challenged the discriminatory practices against minorities of our own people. This committee of devoutly earnest men and women, representing all segments of the population, set forth in clear language its analysis of the abuses against our less fortunate brethren who are the outcasts of our society.

As a signatory power to the Charter of the United Nations, with particular reference to article 55, we are committed to "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." The President's Committee on Civil Rights declared that in order to carry out our international obligations and to rid ourselves of the economic wastage and the moral dry rot resulting from prejudice, discrimination, and rank violation of our civil liberties, America must move forward along three fronts—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial.

The President has countersigned the recommendations of his committee and he has proposed to the Congress that there be action on Capitol Hill during the present session. The President's program is quite understandable and calls only for the same things that you and I must agree we want for ourselves, and certainly it will go full length toward eliminating all "isms" in the United States except Americanism. I was not a member of the President's Committee on Civil Rights though I endorsed every word of what the committee had to say. I now am fighting for the committee's program along the same three fronts—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial—to secure the God-granted rights assured to all in the Constitution, which I swore to uphold and defend. Since the time the President's committee's proposals came to the Congress, there seems to have been a general abatement of the campaign on the part of the executive branch for adoption of its principles. It seems that the President and his political party chairman and a number of the Members of Congress from below the Mason-Dixon line are not in complete agreement on what parts of the committee's document shall be chosen for adoption or rejection. And so we have only inertia where action should be the watchword.

The President's committee dislikes the unwholesome practice of lynching as a terrorist device reinforcing all the other disabilities placed upon the Negro. For more than a quarter of the century since the time when James Weldon Johnson began his fight on lynching, antilynch bills have been repeatedly passed by the House only to die by way of a filibuster in the Senate. This year it can be different. An antilynch bill already has passed the House and all that is needed today is for the majority, in complete control of the Senate, to place the necessary accent upon the bill and it will have to go on the statute books, because the President has already said "amen" to his own committee's agenda. It is just that simple.

Yet, out of all of the points included in the Civil Rights Committee's slate for progress, statehood for Hawaii appears to be about the only proposal the Congress cares to take seriously. We are still at grips with the problem of enfranchisement of 100,000 Indians in New Mexico and Arizona. This was a plank in the committee's platform.

This month the main political conventions will open for business in the City of Brotherly Love, a most appropriate locale where a report might be made that the President's civil-rights measures have been or have not been enacted into law and where an end to segregation and unfair labor practices against minorities and lynching and all the other hideous actions can be reported as having been ended. But I am afraid the President, who is off on a so-called nonpolitical tour, and the Congress that is still off on a political "tear," have left themselves little time in which to write "well done" to legislation advancing the general cause of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Some of our minorities are veterans, as are their dependents, yet we have not been able to afford decent housing for these citizens. Can we then bear hope that any other minorities will receive more than "lip service" from strutting protagonists who protest their love of all mankind, especially a few months before November?

The rules of the United States Senate provide that a two-thirds vote can limit discussion on any measure. The majority leadership can muster a two-thirds vote at its convenience. Such vote could, and I am sure would, guarantee passage of Mr. Truman's civil-rights program. It could, likewise, assure inclusion of nonsegregation provisions in a new national draft act, without which we still would be wanting for a democratic army.

Unless something happens on the civil-rights front before the major political conventions, I am convinced that the platforms adopted after the conventions will still be of the usual sweetness-and-light variety. Here and now we have opportunity for the legislative branch and the executive branch to stand up and be counted and to prove the full worthiness of their words with deeds.

I call upon each of you who believes in the principles of the civil-rights program, not only to write or wire the President, but as many of the Members of the Senate and House as you can, immediately. Do not ask merely for passage of the program but insist upon knowing without delay why the program was not approved months ago, and insist upon every provision of the program and not the anti-poll-tax plank or the antilynching plank alone.

Some persons are saying that if the Congress passes the draft act with civil-rights provisions, there will not be enough time left to hold a political convention. On the other hand, it might be said that if Congress does not pass a draft act with such safety clauses, the political convention may not be of any great consequence, to some who opposed the proposition. Others would remind you that Congress, by law, must wind up its session by July 31; this is true, but Congress and the President can agree to change the law applicable to the present session and to extend the time of the session until they have attended to this very vital issue. I am willing and anxious to see the Congress remain in session until we have clarified the meaning of the word "democracy" and until we have breathed the breath of life into the phrase, "pursuit of happiness," and until we have underscored the guaranties to personal safety and freedom of all our people from fear internally. All posterity of our minorities and our majorities can be bequeathed no greater heritage than that they can be born into a world of new freedom endowed with full assurance that the blessings of liberty mean what they say, and that the general welfare can be brought into full focus in the cause of the common defense when the hour of peril shall have arisen again and 100-percent support of all our people will need to be marshaled to repel the threats to their children.

During the fiscal year 1943–44, 69.4 percent of the reported cases of discrimination in this country originated with business Houses. Government, itself, added materially to discrimination by originating 24.5 percent of the cases while labor unions were responsible for 6.1 percent of such cases, and of those who were discriminated against, 96.7 percent were so discriminated against because they were Negroes, 72.7 percent because they were Jews, and 71.9 percent were discriminated against because they were Mexican-Americans.

The direct result of racial discrimination constitutes a hazard to national health. It has been found that the life expectancy of the Negro is 10 years less than that of the white man and that maternal deaths among Negro women are more than double that of white women. Some of the underlying causes of these conditions include the poor economic status of the Negroes, discrimination of medical facilities, and a shortage of trained, Negro personnel to administer the needs of their own race, which constitutes more than 10 percent of our total population.

I am proposing a series of amendments designed to prevent segregation in the armed forces, to prohibit inductees from paying poll taxes, to provide the protection of antilynch provisions of law, to compel contractors supplying goods and services for use by or for inductees to agree not to practice discrimination in employment because of color, race, or national origin. I shall continue to insist upon acceptance of my amendments until they have been approved or rejected. I believe that in taking such position I am living up to the full stipulation of my oath of office, without any mental reservation. Of course, those who oppose adoption of these amendments are fearful that once they become law, the same provisions will be broadened in civil life in that the Chinese wall of resistance to the march of progress, as the creator intended it, finally must crumble into dust.

In a poll of majority Members of the Senate, it has been found that the greatest number among those who favor civil rights legislation prefer to see action on the antilynching bill, already through the House. This plainly means that the bill is already at the threshold of final enactment, and that the Senate having discharged its duty, the bill becomes the property of the President who, some months ago, endorsed his own civil-rights committee's program to outlaw lynching on a Federal basis. I ask each of you to send separate letters or telegrams, addressed to your Senators, specifically calling for antilynching legislation. The time is short and the Senators will want to be hearing from you, I feel sure.

It cannot be said by anyone that I am making a bid for votes for myself. My term of office has yet to run more than 4 years; therefore, I am not a candidate. If I were seeking reelection at the moment, my position would be exactly what it is today, and which can be well summed up in the President's own words in his message on the four points in the "American Faith" when he said, "We believe that all men are created equal and that they have the right to equal justice under law."

Old-Age Assistance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. BUTLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend in the RECORD, for the attention of the Congress and the public as well, an article which appeared in the Minneapolis News of August 4. This article indicates that the increase in benefits for the aged provided in our amendments to the Social Security Act in this session, may not result in giving relief to our needy aged at all. The article is self-explanatory and is as follows:

FEDERAL OLD-AGE INCREASE TO SAVE COUNTY MONEY

The action by the Eightieth Congress to increase old-age-assistance grants will have no effect in Hennepin County, according to Ed. Kienitz, executive secretary of the county welfare department.

The reason for this, Kienitz explained, is that at present, 70 percent of the old-age-assistance recipients in the county are now receiving the top grant of $50 monthly.

However, the additional moneys voted by Congress will save Hennepin county about $22,500 monthly during the balance of this year.

New aid to dependent children, also voted by Congress, will give the county approximately $1,253 more per month for this type of aid.

Mr. Speaker, it was the intent of the Congress that the additional money provided for old-age assistance to the States should be used by the State to provide more money for those who are in need. It was not intended to be used by the States to reduce the amounts they are now providing. This news from the great State of Minnesota is appalling. It only goes to show an additional reason why we should have an adequate, decent, American old-age pension paid direct by the Federal Government.

My Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "My Day," by Eleanor Roosevelt, from the Pittsburgh Press of August 2.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MY DAY

(By Eleanor Roosevelt)

HYDE PARK (Sunday).—Yesterday morning I left Hyde Park about 8:45 to drive to Sugar Notch, near Wilkes-Barre, Pa., attended the memorial ceremonies there in honor of my husband, and was home again by 9:15 p. m.

The people of this little mining town, when they heard of my husband's death 3 years ago, placed his name, with a gold star beside it, at the head of their honor roll. At the time, this story was carried in the press because Sugar Notch was the first place in the United States to do so.

Later its citizens made a pilgrimage to Hyde Park to place a record of their memorial on my husband's desk, and now they have erected near their courthouse a memorial to him which I unveiled yesterday.

SAME HYMN FEATURES SERVICE

The people of the little town and some nearby areas gathered in the street for the occasion. Congressman Flood presided and the ceremonies were well arranged and carried through by John A. Riley, chairman of the Roosevelt Memorial Committee.

I was glad that I was able to be there. As the anthracite men's choir sang The Battle Hymn of the Republic, I could not help being reminded that this same American song was sung at the recent unveiling of the statue of my husband in Grosvenor Square, in London.

The memorials in different parts of the world, to a man whom the people of various nations have felt was a personal friend in times of trouble, are reminders not of that man alone but of the things for which he stood.

In the case of Sugar Notch, the memorial is to all the men of that area who died in the various wars that have made and kept us free and a united Nation. For that reason it is even more important to think not only of the men themselves and their sacrifice, but of the objectives which were served and for which they laid down their lives.

PEACE HOPES COME FIRST

There was no man who fought in this last war who did not hope that he was preventing future wars. That was one of my husband's great hopes and purposes. That was why the plans for the United Nations were made while the war was still going on.

He knew better than most people what the difficulties would be in uniting the people of the world and making them work for peace. He had had the experience in his own life of trying to keep the United States a united nation working for common objectives.

First we had met a tremendous domestic financial crisis. If all of us had not worked together, it would have been difficult to conquer the problems that we faced in 1932 and 1933. But, together, we succeeded not only in recovering from the great depression, but in preparing ourselves to fight our greatest war.

It remains to be seen whether the real war memorial to our war dead of which all the other memorials are only reminders—the building of a peace—can be accomplished by us.

Federal Grants to the States

OF
HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by me at a meeting of the Kentucky cooperatives of the Rural Electrification Administration at Louisville, Ky., on April 12, 1948.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Today, a great deal of thoughtful study is being given to the policy and practice of Federal grants-in-aid to the States, and to the measure of Federal control of local affairs which such aid often implies. It is certain that such aid is necessary in many fields, but it must also be recognized that a loose and irresponsible extension of the policy of granting Federal aid with Federal controls could seriously endanger the fiscal stability of the Federal Government and destroy local governmental and individual responsibility and initiative. Whatever the limits of Federal aid may be, the people of the United States should be pleased to know that the REA program can be supported and justified upon grounds of sound principle and upon its demonstrated success.

In principle the Federal Government is extending aid to those rural areas to which private enterprise either cannot or has not seen fit to extend its service. Again, in terms of principle, your affairs and business are not directed from Washington or even from Frankfort. Rather, in the best tradition of local self-government, your affairs are directed and managed by private citizens whom you select.

If we apply the test of achievement, I cannot think of any program, inaugurated by the Government for the benefit of the people, whose progress can be more easily and indisputably measured and judged, than the program of the Rural Electrification Administration.

Its primary purpose is to provide electric service to people living in rural communities who otherwise would not be served at all or, at best, would not be served for many years. The progress which has been made toward this goal, in a short span of 13 years, is a remarkable achievement.

In 1935, at the time of the creation of the Rural Electrification Administration, only 11 percent of the farms of the Nation received electric service from central stations. At the end of the last fiscal year, July 1, 1947, it was estimated that 3,574,641 farms, or 61 percent of the Nation's total, were electrified, and that over one-half of the farms which had been added were connected to REA lines.

In 1935, 8,480 farms representing only 3 percent of Kentucky's total received electric service. Today 104,434 Kentucky farms, or 44 percent of the total, are served, and 83,000 by REA lines.

I believe that it is a logical and fair conclusion that the 600-percent increase in the Nation's electrified farms and the 1,400-percent increase in Kentucky's electrified farms since 1935, can only be attributed to the REA program, either by its direct action, or by its stimulation of private power companies.

These bare statistics are known by you who are directly interested in rural electrification but I think it worth while to give them emphasis, so that the progress that is being made, and the structure upon which it rests, are made increasingly clear to people everywhere.

It should be emphasized again and again that the Federal Government does not give money to the State or cooperative in aid of this program, but that it lends money—money which must be repaid to the Government with interest at 2 percent, in a maximum term of 35 years. And thei you should emphasize that the money is being repaid to the Federal Government, and that the record of repayment is more favorable than that of most private and public institutions. One of the greatest compliments that can be paid to REA and to its local directors is to look at its balance sheet.

In the Nation, it has loaned nearly $837,000,000 to 1,031 borrowers, chiefly cooperatives, and only one foreclosure has been necessary; $154,000,000 in interest and principal has been repaid, and $23,000,000 of principal payments have been paid prior to maturity date.

The Kentucky record is even more favorable. Here, $27,000,000 has been advanced to 26 borrowers, all cooperatives, and not a single borrower is in default; 21 of your cooperatives are making principal payments in advance of their maturity.

If there are those who view the REA with suspicion as an extension of Federal control into local fields, or if there are those on the other side, who approve greater Federal authority and believe that REA is a step in that direction, I point out that both are grievously wrong and are confounded by the record of the program. It has demonstrated clearly, above all other things, that Federal aid is needed in certain fields, to meet needs and provide opportunities which the States, local government, and private enterprise cannot successfully or fully supply, but it has proved also that management and direction, and Government is best when it is decentralized, on the ground, and chosen by democratic methods. In passing, I cannot resist directing the attention of the people to one of your practices, certainly unique today—the practice of your directors serving without pay.

Looking to the future, it is probable that some of your hardest work is ahead of you. Approximately 2,280,000 farms, or some 35 percent of the Nation's total, are yet unelectrified. Many of these lie in areas isolated from sources of power, or in areas which are difficult and expensive to reach with transmission and distribution systems. It is reasonable to anticipate that a considerable volume of loan funds for cooperatives and other borrowers will be needed to reach these last areas. The funds must be appropriated by the Congress and it follows that you are interested in the action of Congress with respect to REA appropriations. I want to take a few minutes to tell you something of what is being done now to provide funds for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1948, and ending June 30, 1949, which is called fiscal year 1949.

For background, it might be of interest to you to know that the total appropriations to REA to this year are $1,300,428,288. From that sum, the REA has approved about $1,200,000,000 in loans and has actually advanced about $835,680,000 to its borrowers.

Last year, the REA requested the Congress to appropriate $400,000,000 for loan funds and was given $225,000,000.

This year the sum of $400,000,000 was again requested, but it was reduced to $300,000,000 by the Bureau of the Budget, before the budget was presented to the Congress.

The House of Representatives has passed the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture and, overriding the Bureau of the Budget, appropriated to the REA its full request for loan funds, $400,000,000. In addition, it appropriated an additional $175,000,000 as a deficiency appropriation to round out the full $400,000,000 requested last year.

Hearings begin before the Senate Committee on Appropriations on April 17, and while I cannot predict their action, I have every reason to anticipate that the appropriation made by the House will be substantially maintained. If this is done, the effect of the bill will be to make available in the coming fiscal year a total sum of $575,000,000 for loan authorized systems. This is certainly a very generous amount, especially when we consider that the total loans authorized by the REA in 12 years amount to $1,200,000,000.

The House also approved the sum of $5,000,000 for administration, matching last year's appropriation, and increased from $68,000 to $100,000 the appropriation to the Department of Agriculture for research in farm electrification. If these sums are maintained even in reasonable approximation, I believe that you will agree that REA has received fair treatment.

Before I pass from this point I hope you will allow me to make a few comments on the general subject of appropriations. The Congress holds the REA program in high regard. It does so because of sympathy with its objectives, because of its decentralized and self-governing structure and because of the care, economy, and good judgment you have shown in managing your own business. Its confidence has been strengthened by the fact that you have been able to justify your requests for appropriations with accurate facts and a record of achievement. It is your best recommendation. You can never afford to lose it by making extreme, unreasonable, or unwise requests for appropriations, or by substituting the arguments of reason for propaganda. Some agencies have done this and have hurt their cause. It is analogous to the well-known example of the individual who slowly but surely builds up a good reputation and then loses it in a few foolish and unwise acts. I know that you will not do this.

In this connection I would like to say that you are greatly aided in Washington by the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association under the leadership of Hon. Clyde T. Ellis, executive manager, who formerly served in Congress. As you know, your national organization, among other duties, carries on research and gathers facts which it presents to the proper congressional committees on matters affecting your interests, and to the Members of Congress through its magazine.

I have seen some of its work in bringing testimony before the Public Works Committee where we have been conducting hearings on TVA, and I was interested in its factual approach. In fact, I questioned several of the witnesses at length to inquire if any effort had been made to propagandize or mislead them or the people of the area for which they spoke, and I am happy to state that there was no evidence at all of such action. These are the things which promote confidence and lead me to commend the work of your organization in Washington.

While Kentucky has made great progress in farm, rural community, and rural business electrification, it is only fair to point out other less favorable aspects of our program. Only 9 of the 46 States in the REA program have a smaller proportion of electrified farms than has Kentucky, and six of these are Western States whose coal or water, sources of power, are less plentiful than in Kentucky. All of the States which bound us, with the exception of Tennessee, are farther advanced in their electrification program.

With respect to rates, it is my information that the average rural rate in Kentucky is the highest of all the Southeastern States. I will not attempt to assign the reasons for these conditions, for I realize that they are technical matters and involve factors which are in your province and the province of the expert. Inadequate sources of power, lack of competition, the rough topography of parts of our State which increases construction costs, the 25-year amortization period in Kentucky, which is a shorter term than that prevailing in the greater part of the States, undoubtedly have their effect on rates. The amortization period should be extended by your State government.

I raise these matters as challenges to you to join together in cooperative study and effort to find and correct their causes.

Rural electric cooperatives are always interested in sources of power. A number of cooperatives and communities in Kentucky have manifested great interest in the marketing and use of power that will become available upon the completion of the Wolf Creek, Dale Hollow, and Center Hill Dams, now being constructed by the Army engineers in the Cumberland River Basin.

Section 5 of the Flood Control Act of 1944 provides that power available from dams built by the Army engineers shall be marketed by the Secretary of the Interior and that he shall give preference to public bodies and cooperatives.

It has been known that the Tennessee Valley Authority has been interested in acquiring the power, and that certain Kentucky cooperatives do not favor the total acquisition of the power by the TVA and would like to build transmission lines to serve the areas with which they are concerned.

I have talked to Mr. Krug, Secretary of the Interior, about the matter and he informs me that arrangements are now under way to sell the power that will be developed at these dams to the TVA. The reasons which he gave me in support of this course of action are several. I am informed that 19 of the 64 Kentucky and Tennessee counties in the Cumberland River Basin are in the Tennessee River Basin, that the TVA service area embraces 70 percent of the Cumberland Basin, and that it is now furnishing about 80 percent of the electricity consumed in the Cumberland Basin.

Mr. Krug stated to me that it is his belief that it will be economical for the TVA to market the power because of its existing facilities, both of equipment and in engineering staff, and because it will provide for the TVA reserves needed to assure a more constant supply of power. He told me that it is the intention of his Department that every effort will be made to meet every need of Kentucky cooperatives that can be economically served. Like assurance has been given me by the TVA.

Again I must make it plain that these matters are so broad in their scope and of such a technical nature that it is difficult for me to comment upon them with accuracy and authority. My chief desire is to do what I can, within the limits of reason, economy, and efficiency to assure that my own State, Kentucky, shares fairly in these new sources of power. I hope that I will have the benefit of your advice in this matter and I assure you I will use every energy to protect the interests of Kentucky and its people.

I am going to digress for a few minutes to discuss with you the hearings which are now being held by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Public Works, of which I am a member, on a bill introduced by Senator McKellar, which would change materially the status of TVA. There are many provisions in the bill, but there is one which is chief and central and whose purpose overshadows all others. Section 26 of the present TVA Act provides in substance that the annual receipts from the sale of power may, after the payment of appropriate sums to the Federal Government in repayment of money advanced to the TVA, be held by the TVA and plowed back or reinvested in capital outlays, such as the construction of power facilities and transmission lines to meet new needs and requirements. It is this provision that gives to TVA its flexibility to adjust itself to new construction and needs similar to the flexibility of a private power company. It is the heart of the TVA. The bill which we are considering would require that all of the proceeds be returned each year to the Treasury and that appropriations be then made in advance for every specific development planned, or which might develop. No principle of accounting or of debt payment is involved, because the TVA does account for its expenditures and is required by law to make regular debt payments.

I do not have the time now, nor is this the place to discuss the entire philosophy of the TVA. When I first went to the Senate, I did not have the information upon which to base any fixed opinion about the operations of TVA but I wanted to learn something about it.

Last year when a committee of which I was a member began hearings upon the nomination of Mr. Gordon Clapp to be Chairman of the Board of TVA, my mind was open. At the conclusion of 13 days of testimony, I had developed two opinions. The first was that Mr. Clapp was an able, conscientious, and reliable public servant. My second conclusion was that the TVA project is one whose experience is valuable and will continue to be valuable to us, not merely because of its daily operations, but in the determination of many questions relating to the entire field of public power. We have invested $800,000,000 in TVA. It must either be continued or stopped, or its activities so circumscribed that it cannot properly perform its function. Obviously it will not be stopped, so the question comes down to its efficient operation. I reserve the right and the responsibility as a Member of Congress to examine and review its activities to determine if its operations can be improved, but I will not vote to destroy it.

Although I have talked too long, I have not been able to speak of the many personal and human benefits that have come to farm people through the Rural Electrification Administration. I can only say that I am happy that all of our people can now share in these advantages.

Before I close, I do want to speak to you as a farm group and of your responsibilities at this particular time. No one can ever forget the part played by the American farmer in the recent war. Comprising only 15 percent of the Nation's labor force, handicapped by inadequate manpower and equipment, you worked long hours and fed this Nation, its armies, and, in part, our allies. It was an unmatched example of devotion and patriotism. Your task is not finished.

The population of this country has increased by 10,000,000 people and our population, armed with increased purchasing power, has increased its food consumption by 17 percent. The population of the world has increased by 200,000,000, who seek just the minimum amount of food necessary for life. It is a tragic fact that today there is not enough food in the world for its people. Only the United States, Canada, Australia, Russia, and the Argentine have the capacity to meet this need in any important degree and the greatest burden falls upon us. Last year and this year we will export over 500,000,000 bushels of grain to hungry people throughout the world. These facts have brought home to the American people a realization of their own dependence and the dependence of the people of the world for mere survival, upon the American farmer. I would not minimize the part played by any other group in our economy, but every other group can reflect upon the fact that they are absolutely dependent upon the farmer. Today he is the most important person in our economy.

The Congress realizes that food must come from the soil, and we will appropriate sufficient funds to protect and conserve the soil, the very life of the Nation. They realize your shortage of manpower and your need for electric power to take the place of men who do not produce but only consume food, and we are going to appropriate sufficient money to REA and to power developments to promote the rapid extension of power facilities. They realize that production must be continued for many years, and we are going to maintain the parity principle so that your plans and your means and ability to continue to produce will not be destroyed. It is in your interest that we do this, but in a more fundamental sense, it is in our interest, in the interest of our survival and the attainment of world peace.

The appropriations made by the House for soil conservation, extension work, AAA research, and REA have in main been generous and adequate. There are certain appropriations relating to extension work and forestry which we hope to correct in the Senate.

Parallel with appropriations, action will be taken to either continue for a time the present farm program or to adopt a permanent farm program.

In conclusion, let me urge upon you the assumption of the responsibilities that fall upon all of us by reason of the uncertain times in which we live.

I have received many letters asking the question, "Do you believe that we are going into war?" It is a question that we cannot answer for others, but we can answer for ourselves by saying that we will do everything in our power that can be honorably done to avoid war. I hope that the Congress, the administration, and the people will never allow fear, hysteria or propaganda to sweep them into that state of mind which regards war as inevitable. When such a state of mind obtains, the power to consider critically our own action, to strive for every avenue of peace, and to make calm judgments, vanishes. The Congress, the President and the administration will never have the moral right to assume that war is inevitable or to assume that every step has been taken to avoid war. It is our responsibility to constantly review our policy and duty to take every possible step that can be taken with honor to avoid a war which could destroy civilization. Every policy should be accepted only if it will promote peace. We have taken certain steps. We approved the Marshall plan to bolster the countries of western Europe so that they may be able to stand on a basis of equal footing with an aggressor until that time when their economic recovery will permit a normal reestablishment of trade and peaceful relations.

It will be necessary to take such steps at home as are necessary for our own security and defense and to persuade an aggressor that we will defend ourselves.

Beyond that, I believe personally that the Nation should not assume that every avenue of agreement with Russia is closed, and that we should seek unceasingly through negotiations and the strengthening of the United Nations to find a basis of peace. Unless we can do this, we must maintain an armed camp, or ultimately fight, and live in an atmosphere of fear or uncertainty. I am not willing to believe that we do not have the reason, the intelligence and the moral force to find a better solution.

Representative government cannot match a totalitarian government in propaganda or in the initial stages of force. But we have something that they do not have and can never have, and which always triumphs ultimately. It is reason, ideas, and an appeal to the spiritual values of mankind. Our action must always be consistent with these basic values.

In closing, let me say that I have appreciated the opportunity to talk to you. I admire the work that you have done. I respect your stability, your sound viewpoint, your patriotic citizenship, your unswerving loyalty to our form of government.

I do not claim to know everything about all of your problems. I am deeply interested in them and you may rest assured that in every sound proposal of yours you will have my open, sincere, and energetic support.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address regarding universal military training broadcast by me over the facilities of the American Broadcasting Co. on June 13 last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

So that there will be no misunderstanding of my views, I first wish to state emphatically that I am against universal military training.

The program for universal military training brings acutely to the foreground a number of major questions, some of them of critical importance to this Nation.

Foremost among these questions is that of civil rights.

To understand this matter in its true historical perspective, it is necessary to bypass all of the usual arguments as to whether the Negro and other minorities may safely be entrusted with all of the rights of citizenship, many of which they do not possess. I say they may safely be so entrusted and that, by and large, all Americans of any race or color possess the instincts to lead a decent and worth-while life, adding their mite of service to the general good of the American community as a whole. Assertions to the contrary are the product of pure spleen and prejudice. From the Christian viewpoint, certainly, such claims are immoral and contrary to all of the tenets by which Christianity has sought to redeem the world and substitute the spirit of love and tolerance for the hatred and bias which man has inherited from his savage ancestors.

Be this as it may, however, there is an even more practical and demanding issue in the sense of its absolute immediacy—that is, the threat of communism to the world.

We may ask ourselves this simple question: Why do we want military training at all? It is expensive and a drain upon the entire physical resource of our Nation. It withdraws boys from schools, colleges, laboratories, and workshops at the most valuable and impressionable period of their lives. This is the period when the ability to absorb knowledge is perhaps at its greatest point. Thus, we not only sacrifice a great portion of the country's wealth, which could be used to provide a better life for everyone, but we also sacrifice in the interests of the Nation one of the most valuable periods in the lives of our young manhood. It is this youth who will make up the next generation and who will determine whether America is still to continue in a position of leadership in the world. To subtract from the lives of these boys 6 months or a year which might be devoted to self-improvement or to learning, is even more costly to America than the physical costs of maintaining this big universal training plan.

America is not a militaristic nation and never has been. If it feels itself goaded into this unprecedented peacetime military training program, and finds it necessary to pay this high price in order to guard its future security, it must ask itself why. Why do some feel it necessary to pay this high price in order to guard our future security? Against what are we protecting ourselves?

All of these questions, of course, can be answered simply. Our potential enemy, and the only potential enemy strong enough to contest our security in this world, is communism. It is through a fear of communism and of the means by which it has wrecked entire nations and seeks to crush the remaining free world, that we have girded our loins and are placing our Nation in battle array.

If there is no fear of communism and no Communist enemy whose deadly red eyes glare at us everywhere on this earth from the shadows, then all this talk of universal training, of Army, Air Force, and naval appropriations, is sheer militaristic saber rattling. Then it is a criminal squandering of the Nation's resources and a wanton misuse of the assets of this country by our officials, publicists, and leading minds.

Why do I bring this up at this point? Because if communism is really the enemy and is really the cause for this great rearmament and training program, then we must understand the nature of the attack which we believe is being made upon us. We must understand how to defeat it. If within the Universal Military Training Act itself is to be found the ugly face of the Communist monster, then we will not be defending ourselves against communism by this act, but sowing the seeds for its further growth. If by this act of universal military training we further strain the relations between various groups of Americans, and if by means through which this act is implemented, we build among large groups of Americans a feeling of resentment, of deep and justified anger, of the Negroes, Mexicans, Indians, or others concerned—we have committed an act of unpardonable injury to the future of this Nation we love and whose founding principles we believe to be the hope of the world.

There are some 16,000,000 Negroes in the United States, 400,000 Indians, thousands of Japanese and Chinese, and we have been warned by their leaders that they will not submit tamely to segregation within the fighting forces of the United States. If they are to be called upon to do their own proper share in defending the United States and the principles for which it stands, they have a right to ask themselves whether or not these principles are truly democratic.

If men are to find themselves subject to the vilest discrimination and to the un-Christian charge of inferiority, even during the period when they are sacrificing their young lives in the defense of American policies which refute that very discrimination, then inevitably they will turn to some other doctrine which promises them relief from this intolerable and degrading situation.

It is on this practical level that we must now assay the question of racial discrimination in the universal military training program, for what is the use of arming ourselves to the teeth to fight communism in Europe and Asia when we are building the very machinery to bring it, like a huge, ugly and unreachable Trojan horse, into the midst of our own Nation.

You may bear prejudice toward the Negro and other Americans of dark skin. You may talk of their rights with contempt, and embrace in this sense one of the most evil and anti-Christian doctrines which have ever been intended to plague men. There are perhaps 17,000,000 or 18,000,000 of these dark-skinned Americans, all told. Let me ask you on the practical level, how you propose to face the situation if anger, hatred, and resentment over their cruel lot causes them to lose faith in the purposes of this Nation and the system by which it has risen to greatness.

Do not think that these people will not turn to Communist promises of full equality of opportunity and full equality under the law. Let me warn you: They are turning to the lure of communism as steel filings to some giant magnet. They find the Communist promises of equal citizenship in the glittering Communist paradise which is being painted for them by the emissaries of bolshevism, almost irresistible. Many of them—too many of them—see in the promises and claims of the Communist spellbinders the only possible release for them and for their children from the cruel chains of segregation, inequality, and enforced inferiority which has prevented them by main force from enjoying the rights and opportunities all Americans are guaranteed under the Constitution.

Do you know what such a large body of radical-minded, disgruntled, bitter citizens can mean to the future of our Nation? You may dismiss them with contempt as the Romanovs did the rumblings of the embittered peasants, but it was from these lowly and despised serfs that the terrible revolutionary power came to overthrow the Romanov dynasty and to create the central power form which is now an almost impregnable citadel for the Communist monster. Who do you think was to blame for totalitarian communism—the despised peasants who revolted and followed blindly after the Bolshevik leaders, who promised them a new paradise in which they and their children would be free from the cruelties and privations of serfdom and second-class citizenship—or was it not the ruling classes of Russia themselves, who were so blind and so unwise as to believe that they could withhold forever from men their normal, minimum rights without risk?

And let us look further. What has caused the danger of Red communism in China? Do you think it was because the Chinese suddenly felt the urge to overthrow their time-honored traditions and their ancient belief in the freedom of the spirit and mind?

No, it was because the Chinese suffered almost unendurable privations and poverty, because their young men felt that they lacked opportunity, because they lost faith in the qualities of the old order. Starvation, second-class citizenship and lack of opportunity are the open doors to communism. Far more than all the schemes and arguments used by the emissaries of the Kremlin as an incentive to communism, is human suffering itself. And even more compelling in this regard than pure physical privation, is the suffering of the mind and spirit, the terrible feeling of degradation, humiliation and resentment which comes when a man feels all around him the contempt and hatred of his fellows.

Do you really think that you can safely perpetuate such a system, doing violence to all the proclaimed principles of American life, within the Universal Training Act, and do so without grave hurt to the Nation?

Will you not also ask yourselves this question: Are we to be alone in the world and to fight an eventual war in which the darker races and the Communists are to combine against us?

If we are to do this, we are certain to find the one and a quarter billion people of Asia as our sworn enemies. We will find the dark-skinned people of South America, our next-door neighbors, our enemies, too. Right today, all of these peoples, the South Americans included, are gazing with the gravest concern at our actions in depriving great groups of Americans of their civil rights, based purely upon a type of racial hatred which is much too close to Hitler's philosophy for comfort. The Chinese, Indians, and South Americans have expressed themselves openly on this subject. They are watching us with suspicious and questioning eyes. In India, that great subcontinent, with its 400,000,000 people, who are due inevitably to be a force in the world, there already have been anti-American riots, as there have been also in China. These have been based altogether upon the belief that Americans are seeking to build a world not of freedom, but of racial privilege, in which the dark men will have no natural rights.

This is a hideous nightmare which could spell eventual disaster to this Nation, and it is time that we took stock of what we are doing, not alone from the moral view, which is apt to be disregarded, but from the purely practical view of our own absolute needs.

If we have nothing better to offer the peoples of the world than a type of bias and exploitation of the rights of our colored citizens, simply because they happened to be born dark, then no one will believe us when we claim that we are fighting for freedom and decency and individual rights against the dark evil of totalitarian Communist doctrine. They will believe our claims to be fraudulent and of the same expedient quality as those made by the totalitarians themselves. As has been proved in the past, they will turn in desperation to glib promises of betterment once they have lost faith in the great tradition of equality and personal freedom which is our offering to the world.

For the pattern of freedom, decency, and absolute equity under the law, is a fragile and easily broken thing. If you break it in the case of the Negro so as to deprive him of his natural right as a man and an American, you have smashed a hole in the protecting wall of principle which guarantees the lives and freedom of all of us. Through this hole the surging forces of communism can pour in to obtain a strong, powerful foothold in this country. Once this breach is made, other and additional cracks in the weakened wall will appear.

If ever there was a time to resist segregation and the deprivation of Americans of their full rights as citizens, that time is now in the implementation of the Universal Training Act.

If men are called to serve under the act they should be reassured that whatever disabilities and prejudices may exist in the hearts of their fellow Americans, these do not have the sanction of national law, and that the Nation as a whole stands immovable upon its own founding principles, that all men are equal under the law, that the Americanism of Washington, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt is a living and vital expression of morality and justice, and that it is the hope of men throughout the world and not their enemy.

At this crucial moment, when we are loud in our claims that we are trying to build a better world, a world in which tyranny and deprivation will disappear, let us tell our dark-skinned citizens, and through them all the peoples of the earth, that at least as far as the Universal Training Act is concerned, America intends to respect the rights of every citizen, and to measure him according to his individual worth and his individual contribution to the success, power, and strength of the Nation.

If we are to make our democracy work, we must make it live. If it is to succeed in capturing the hearts and souls of men in the harsh struggle against world totalitarian doctrine, it must do so not only by the strength of its arms and the shining quality of its promises, but by the power and force of its example.

The Wheat Situation in Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement regarding the wheat situation in Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INFORMATION FOR FARMERS—$16,000,000 WHEAT FAILURE SPURS CROP INSURANCE SALES

To All County Agricultural Conservation Committees:

County agricultural conservation committees in Lancaster, Chester, Berks, Columbia and Lycoming Counties are organizing their annual sales campaign of wheat farmers under the crop-insurance program as enacted by the Eightieth Congress. Previously the crop-insurance program extended to all Pennsylvania counties where 50 or more farmers designated their wish to enroll in the program, but under the revised act the program has been confined to 200 counties in the Nation and 5 counties in Pennsylvania, with Lancaster carrying tobacco insurance and Chester carrying corn insurance in addition to their wheat-insurance program.

The failure of the 1948 wheat crop has spurred interest in the crop insurance this year, according to the Production and Marketing Committee, whose facilities have been placed under contract with the Crop Insurance Corporation as sales agents. The crop losses reports are being filed daily with the Pennsylvania office of the corporation and total to date 240 from the five participating experimental counties. Last year when Pennsylvania had 45 counties in the crop-insurance program only 252 losses were reported out of a total of 11,955 contracting farmers. There are 3,583 wheat-insurance policies in force for 1948 in the 5 counties.

The present failure of Pennsylvania's wheat crop has not been estimated by the Crop Reporting Office of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. The signs of loss developed rapidly and were not detected until farmers entered the field with combines and binders to harvest the crop. Signs of wheat stem rust, attributable for much of the loss, was not expected to affect the crop when the July 1 crop report was made. Other causes like poor pollination, European corn borer and Hessian fly were also not detected earlier. Now it appears that the loss which affects about 75 percent of the Pennsylvania crop grown in the southeastern counties of the State will approximate 50 percent. Based on the July 1 estimate of 21,640,000 bushels which is about 3,000,000 bushels above the average, it now appears that a total loss of about 8,000,000,000, bushels would cost Pennsylvania farmers more than $16,000,000 this year.

Many farmers who carried the 3-year contracts under the old crop-insurance program are now requesting coverage for this year's crop, since their contract had run only 2 years when the old program was abolished by Congress and the new experimental program was established to operate only in the counties designated. County conservation committees have no jurisdiction to honor these 3-year contracts for crop losses except in the counties authorized by Congress for the experimental program.

JOHN A. SMITH,
Secretary, Pennsylvania State Committee.

The Poll Tax

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a news article relating to the address by my colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] on the anti-poll-tax bill. The article is from the Birmingham Age-Herald of August 4.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(By James Free)

WASHINGTON, August 3.—Alabama's senior Senator LISTER HILL today delivered the longest speech yet made in this extra session of the Congress—a 6-hour-and-13-minute address in opposition to the proposed anti-poll-tax bill. Senator HILL's oration exceeded by 2 hours and 34 minutes the 3-hour-and-39-minute speech made in the Senate Monday by Senator A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, Virginia, also against the poll tax measure.

The Alabamian finished strong and said afterward, "I could have spoken for another 3 or 4 hours, but I wanted to give some of the other Senators a chance to express their opinion on this matter."

He added that he expects to speak again, if necessary, to prevent passage of the anti-poll tax bill or any other civil-rights bill that the Congress may take up.

He concluded at 6:52 p. m., eastern standard time, having begun at 12:39 p. m., eastern standard time. He started in a low conversational tone that was audible plainly in the galleries, and gradually worked up to a vigorous, eloquent appeal for national unity and elimination of partisan politics in consideration of the poll-tax proposal.

When he concluded, the Alabamian received congratulations of many Senate colleagues on both sides of the aisle. Senator JOHN C. STENNIS (Democrat, of Mississippi), told HILL that the Alabamian's speech was "the best I've heard since I came to the Senate last year."

Senator HILL concerned himself primarily with constitutional aspects of the proposed poll-tax repeal measure.

He said that the Constitution "plainly" left qualifications for voting up to the States and that, through such a step as an anti-poll-tax bill, the Congress would be attempting to change the Constitution of the United States through legislation rather than by constitutional amendment. HILL said that he personally hoped that many of the States would modify their poll-tax requirements, but that any changes should be made by States and not through Federal statutes.

Before taking the floor, HILL pointed out that the southerners making speeches against the poll-tax bill were, in no sense, preventing the Senate from taking up other business.

"Any time the Republican majority wishes to," he said, "they can move to set the poll-tax bill aside and take up any other bill. They haven't done anything like this of course, because they haven't got any other legislation ready.

"It should be remembered that the Republicans have had the floor during the past few days almost as much as the Democrats have. They could proceed with other business any time they saw fit to do so."

The Senate quit at 9:16 p. m., eastern standard time, until noon tomorrow when Senator MORSE (Republican of Oregon) will have the floor.

Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include my remarks on civil rights over Station WMEX, Boston, Mass., Thursday evening, August 5, 1948:

Fellow Americans, it seems strange that we, in the year 1948, should be faced with the problem of civil liberties.

We thought that issue had been solved in 1791, when the Bill of Rights was adopted.

But that great charter means nothing if the people fail to practice what it preaches. We live in times of stress, when men seek to excuse their mistakes by blaming others.

Underlying all this are the vague fears which lead to intolerance.

Whenever anyone discriminates against another human being because of his race, color, or religion, he is betraying the fundamental American belief that "Man is endowed by his Creator with certain inalienable rights.

"Among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Even though he may not know it, the person is guilty of intolerance, does more harm to our society than one who lives in another country and opposes our way of life.

We are on guard against the Fascists and Communists. But what are we going to do about the person who calls himself an American, even while his conduct is un-American? The bigot strikes against the unity of our Nation. Either he never learned the true meaning of our American heritage or has forgotten it.

In any case, he is dangerous, because he sets American against American.

This gives aid and comfort to those who seek our downfall. Intolerance is treason.

In the world of today ideas have power, as well as things. Americans must have inner strength, the moral rearmament that comes from a clear understanding of our faith and works.

It is a time to refresh ourselves at the fountainhead of freedom and then go on toward a realization of the goals which the founding fathers set before us.

The protection of civil rights is a problem which affects everyone. If we sit back indifferently when others are victims of intolerance, we should not be surprised if we, in turn, become its target.

One break in the dike can lead to a flood. Prejudice, no matter how small, must be counterattacked by truth and justice.

In the task of protecting our civil liberties, we have made mistakes, but we have also made considerable progress. The right of suffrage is being extended—slowly but surely.

Today the occurrence of a single act of violence is enough to arouse the conscience of the Nation, leading to demands for stronger protection.

This is a healthy sign. But there are cases, without violence, where people are quietly discriminated against. These are the walls which we must level.

Our American heritage emphasizes the importance of the individual person. Rich or poor, educated or illiterate, Protestant, Catholic, or Jew, white, brown, or black, each is entitled to the same dignity and integrity.

For each of us to be secure in his individual rights, each man must respect the rights of others.

We are still in the process of building social institutions that will guarantee equality of opportunity to all men and women.

While differing in race, religion, political views, or social position, we are united in the belief that freedom builds respect and cooperation.

We are finding a way to compromise differences without domination.

It is this variety, based on real tolerance, which is the source of our progress.

The men who founded our Nation, faced the problem of establishing a balance between personal liberty and group authority.

The common interests of the people must be protected by laws and procedures established by majority rule. But majorities, without any control, can be as ruthless as dictators.

Seeing this, and fearing it, our forefathers framed a Bill of Rights which placed certain personal liberties beyond the reach of popular majorities.

The people permanently denied to the Federal Government the power to interfere with fundamental, or inalienable, rights and freedoms.

Among these inalienable rights are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

To secure these rights, governments are instituted among men. So reads the Declaration of Independence.

In other words, Government is the referee in those conflicts which arise when some people or groups try to push their freedoms too far, interfering with the rights of others, or causing harm to the public welfare.

In the complex, industrial life of today, we are being confronted with new situations, and new problems, which require conciliation.

There is no copybook solution for any one of them. We must try to understand the other side on every issue, and through patience and fair play arrive at mutual agreement.

There are four primary rights which are necessary to the well-being of the individual and to the progress of society:

1. The right to safety and security of the person. Under this, the citizen is assured that he is safe from bondage, lawless violence, and unjust arrest and punishment.

2. The right to citizenship and its privileges. Every mature and responsible person must have an equal voice in the Government.

3. The right to freedom of conscience and expression. We believe in the ability of the people to make sound judgments. To do this they must have access to all the pertinent facts and to the various interpretations of these facts.

Our forefathers suffered torture and death for the right to worship God according to the varied dictates of conscience. As a result complete religious freedom in America is a fact.

4. The right to equality of opportunity. The opportunity of each individual to obtain useful employment, and to have access to services in the fields of education, housing, health, recreation, and transportation, whether available free or at a price, must be provided without discrimination. Without this the individual cannot develop his potentialities, and cannot share in the fruits of society.

These are the goals. On the road to them we have sometimes strayed from the course.

We once had slavery, religious persecution, and mob rule. In certain areas we still have unfair employment practices.

By honestly facing them we have eliminated most and will eliminate the rest.

We must practice tolerance, day in and day out in order to reach the goal of civil rights for all.

The Negro, especially in the South, is the chief victim of intolerance.

However, the biggest single forward surge of Negroes into the main stream of American life in the past 10 years has been their movement into the ranks of organized labor.

It is also encouraging to note the abandonment of segregated schools in cities like Trenton and Gary; the lifting of restrictions against Negro doctors by hospitals in St. Louis and Gary; the establishment of interracial churches in many communities; the admission of colored players on the baseball teams of Brooklyn and Cleveland; and the employment of more than 60 Negro teachers by 25 white or predominantly white colleges.

More recent was the order of the President to eliminate discrimination in the armed forces.

The poll tax, however, is a legal obstacle to full suffrage in most southern States.

It limits white as well as Negro suffrage. A poll tax places the payment of a fee between the voter and the ballot box.

In some States it adds up from year to year. It was estimated on the floor of the House of Representatives on July 21, 1947 that: "In the Presidential election of 1944, 10 percent of the potential voters used the ballot in the seven poll-tax States, as compared with 33 percent for the free-voting States."

Some of the standards of eligibility in our naturalization laws have nothing to do with a person's fitness to become a citizen.

These standards are based solely on race or national origin, and penalize some residents who may otherwise have all the attributes necessary for American citizenship.

We have removed some of these barriers. Before World War II, the Chinese had been barred from immigration and naturalization by the Chinese exclusion laws.

Other groups, such as Filipinos, Western Hemisphere Indians, and people native to India, were denied citizenship.

The largest group of American residents presently subject to this form of discrimination are those born in Japan.

The bar to landholding, the alien land law, most seriously impairs the alien's economic opportunities.

The first of these laws, enacted by California in 1913, made it illegal for aliens ineligible for citizenship, either to buy agricultural land or lease it for a period exceeding three years.

Other Western States passed similar laws. The present California law is much more strict.

In effect, it forbids American citizens of Japanese ancestry to support their ineligible alien parents with money derived from the beneficial use of land.

The moral impact of this discrimination is indicated by the words of a Japanese-American veteran of World War II, who said to the President's Committee Investigating the Problem of Civil Rights: "I would like to say that most of us fought as we did because we felt that, in spite of the way we had been kicked around.

"America was still the land of opportunity for all of us. I know my mother sent five of her sons. Every one volunteered for combat. One was killed. The rest of us were wounded.

"We have over 30 individual decorations and medals among us. Well, my mother wants to become a citizen. It is for people like my mother and for a lot of Americans of good will throughout the United States who have a lot of confidence in us and our loyalty that we did the job that we did."

The right to freedom of conscience and expression is being abused by the agents and sympathizers of totalitarian states.

The principle of disclosure is the best way to deal with those who would destroy our democracy by revolution or by encouraging disunity and limiting the civil rights of some groups.

Censorship is not the answer. Rather, let the people know who is behind the various moves to sway their opinions.

Congress has already made use of the principle of disclosure in both the economic and political spheres. The Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Trade Commission and the Pure Food and Drug Administration make available to the public, information about sponsors of economic wares.

The Federal Communications Commission, the Post Office Department, the clerk of the House of Representatives, and the Secretary of the Senate, are required to collect information about those who attempt to influence public opinion.

Hundreds of lobbyists are now required to disclose their efforts to influence Congress, under the Congressional Reorganization Act.

The Foreign Agents Registration Act forces certain citizens and aliens alike to register with the Department of Justice the facts about their sponsorship and activities.

Fortunately, we in Massachusetts have a good record in maintaining civil liberties, with the possible exception of job discrimination.

However, ours is one of the six States in the Union which have passed laws directed against discrimination in private employment.

It is a sign that we are alert to the danger and are determined to protect all of our people against it.

There is no partisanship on this issue. Leaders of all major political parties recognize that civil liberties must be extended and strengthened.

All Americans worthy of the name must guard against ignorance and prejudice in their own attitudes and their own conduct as well as in others.

Apart from legislation necessary to carry out the program, a long-term campaign of public education is needed to inform the people of the civil rights to which they are entitled and which they owe to one another.

The Government has the immediate responsibility for an internal civil-rights campaign for its 2,000,000 employees.

Moreover, in the armed forces, an opportunity exists to educate men and women while they are in service.

Federal, State, and local governments, together with private agencies, can accomplish much.

But in the final analysis the job is up to you and me as individuals.

The United States will be a more prosperous and a far happier society in which to live if we accord to every law-abiding citizen the respect, and the rights which we demand for ourselves.

Address by Hon. John Sherman Cooper, of Kentucky, to the National Federation of Women's Republican Clubs

OF

HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech made by me at the national convention of the National Federation of Women's Republican Clubs, at Louisville, Ky., on March 6, 1948.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have been in Washington only 1 year. It follows that I do not have a background of previous service against which to relate my present views upon the two major parties and the Government of the United States. But, my impressions do represent the interest of one who looks for the first time at an absorbing scene.

The most certain conviction that I hold after 1 year in the Congress is that there can be no stability in the Government of the United States, in either domestic or foreign policy, until the present administration is totally repudiated and defeated. The reasons for that conviction should be evident to everyone. They are found in the divisions within the Democratic Party which make impossible any consistent policy based upon fundamental principles. In the Congress today and in the membership of the party are found the conservative or traditional Southern Democrats who bitterly hate the control of Federal Government, New Dealers and extreme left-wingers for whom the extension of Government control is the answer to every problem, the middle-of-the-roaders who will go along with either group for the sake of party harmony, the vocal self-designated liberals, who are fascinated only by change and who with characteristic illiberalism would force change upon the people, whether or not they want it; the corrupt city machines whose only interest is patronage and protection; the pressure groups who do not ask but who demand that they be favored even at the expense of the whole people. Until recently, there was the Communist fringe, now in full cry after Mr. Wallace, until late, an oracle of the administration.

The slightest consideration of the character and interests of these groups makes us know that they could not possibly have any unity of common faiths and principles. They have been held together for 15 years by coercive devices of power, of spending, of patronage, of callous surrender to pressure groups, processes which have led this country away from its character as a free representative Government, and toward an all-powerful centralized Government.

The devices of Statism are the same wherever practiced in the world. There comes first the attractive promise of material and social gains, to be planned and assured by the Government; then, the imposition of controls upon the people; the creation of a vast body of administrators, judges, and policy to manage the controls, and to punish the people if they break synthetic laws which enforce them. Incidentally these employees vote. Always, there must follow taxing and spending for the distribution of benefits and favors, and inevitable debt. Such a system can survive only by a never-ending expansion of its power to coerce and control. To hold such power it must favor pressure groups to secure their votes. In this immoral political system, justice gives way to favoritism and law to expediency. Propaganda, cleverness, glibness, substitute for honesty and truth.

Central control is the system which in its best aspects provides the governments which we see in England and France, and in its worst and extreme development the police states of Russia and the unfortunate countries within its sphere of power.

It has been denied and will be denied that there is just basis for the charge that the administration of the last 15 years has moved this country consciously or unconsciously toward statism. In answer I point out that the devices which it has employed, admittedly in milder form, are characteristics of centralized control throughout the world.

The truest and oldest liberal tradition of all time—that liberty is the supreme political end of man—has been under fire every day as the administration has sought to extend its controls over the individual, his person, his busines, his farm, his labor. Only last November, with the war 2 years past, President Truman asked the Congress to give him full control over every business enterprise, every farm, and every individual in the United States.

There is nothing new in what I have been saying to you. It has been said again and again. Yet, I have deliberately chosen to emphasize that the struggle between two totally different concepts of government is still joined and has not been decided.

In 1946, a Republican Congress was elected and we hoped that the American people had made a definite choice of the type of government they wanted. The events of the last session lead me to believe that they have not made such a choice.

The Congress had not been in session long before it was condemned by the Democratic leadership, pressure groups, a considerable portion of the press and radio, and even by members of our own party as a do-nothing Congress. The Congress did move slowly for 3 months because it was in the process of restoring its constitutional function as a law-making body, which for 14 years had been surrendered to the executive branch of the Government. In these years, must bills were written in the executive branch of the Government, and rushed to passage, often without adequate hearings or consideration. The story is told that on one occasion when the printed bill was not before the Senate the then Senate majority leader, Mr. Robinson, lifted a folded newspaper, and the unknown bill was passed by a resounding chorus of Democratic "ayes." If it is true, I do not have to speak of the depths to which representative government descended on that day. The Eightieth Congress held extensive hearings upon every important bill, gave every interested group the chance to be heard, and wrote the bills. I call attention to the careful hearings given to the labor-management bill, the tax bill, and the Greek-Turkish loan. It was the careful consideration of the last measure under the leadership of Senator VANDENBERG which prevented it from being an absolute repudiation of the United Nations which was implicit in the speech of President Truman. The leadership of Senator VANDENBERG has been the most important factor in giving consistency to our foreign policy. Yet, it is important to note that this return to the legislative process, absolutely necessary in a government of law, meets with great opposition. It is the opposition of pressure groups, whose proposals will not stand up under examination, the opposition of those who want executive powers, the opposition of those who have been charmed by the emergencies, the fanfare, the drama of government by executive edict.

Two years ago, the people were outraged by the continuance of wartime controls. The Republican Party advocated and was responsible for their removal and stands on the same ground today. The President's course was dictated by expediency. In 1946, he said that price controls should not be lifted. In October, he decontrolled meat in an effort to save an election. In November and December he directed the abandonment of practically all controls saying "we have now reached the point where many of our shortages have disappeared and in many other cases supply is rapidly approaching demand." Last fall he denounced controls as the method of a police state. A few weeks later he asked the Congress to grant him the wartime controls which he had denounced.

The events of the past 2 months demonstrate the utter fallacy of his proposals. It was reported that his Cabinet was divided and that he himself had not made up his mind until the day before he delivered his message. It is certain that the Democratic leadership in Congress has not pressed for controls and does not want them. Yet when the President delivered his message, again part of the people and certain sections of the press snapped at government by edict, embraced his proposals without mature consideration, and demanded that Congress reimpose controls. It would appear sometimes that we are more interested in symptoms than causes, pain killers than cures. There can be no doubt that today's inflation grows from the practices of State control—waste and deficit financing which have diluted and cheapened our money, controls which have discouraged production, and a labor-industry policy which encouraged the stoppage of production.

Last year the Republican Party began to attack these fundamental causes, and again met the opposition of the administration and segments of the people. For the first time in 16 years, it reduced expenditures, balanced the budget, and made payments upon the debt from tax revenues. This action was resisted with all the power of the President, and the governmental departments at Washington. The administration would not sacrifice a penny in its spending although it was asking the American people to sacrifice billions in aid to other countries. In fact, the President asked for billions to finance new inflationary programs. At home, many people, misled by the propaganda which issues from governmental departments, objected to our efforts to reduce expenditures.

The Republican Party passed a labor-industry bill after 5 months of exhaustive debates and hearings. It is designed to use peaceful means and reason rather than force in the solution of labor disputes, and to keep production going. It supports a fundamental principle that no group shall be more powerful than all the people. Yet, it was vetoed by the President, who by his admission had only studied it 3 days. It was denounced as a slave-labor bill by an administration which just a year before had actually proposed that freemen who had struck should be drafted into the military service.

Enough for examples. They demonstrate that there has not yet been a clear understanding of the issues which divide the Republican Party and the present Democratic administration, or a clean-cut decision upon these issues.

This year we will elect a Republican President and increase the Republican majority in both Houses of the Congress. If victory is to be more than a mere postponement of a struggle that must be made later and again and again, we should make this election a determination of great basic issues. It should be more than a mere rejection of the inadequate personalities and the inept policies of the present administration. It should be a rejection of their cause, which is the movement toward powerful Federal control. It should be a conscious and positive affirmation of the American principles of representative government under law, of justice, of the expansion of the political and economic opportunities and liberty of the individual.

When we win, the principles in which we believe must be translated into action. I have spent some time in pointing out the defects of our opponents. We are not without blame ourselves.

In the first session of the Eightieth Congress a part of our difficulties grew from the announcement by some Republican leaders of a party program before it had been considered by all Republicans in the Congress. We cannot forget that our individual views may not always be the views of the people. It is a fundamental principle of government by the people that many opinions shall be voiced, considered, modified, rejected or accepted, and finally fused into a composite opinion which represents as best as is possible, the will of the people.

I hope that in its platform this year, and in its action in Congress after election, the Republican majority and the leadership will make the effort to find, to express and to carry out the composite will of the people.

From time to time it is said that the Republican Party is more interested in maintaining the status quo, and in the preservation of property rights, than in individuals. I do not believe it to be true. Yet it cannot be doubted that many people so believe and that their belief has been fortified by the criticism of sincere Republicans in Congress who challenge the status quo.

There are not just a few Republicans in Congress who believe that our party could be more vigorous in its approach to human problems. There are a great number in both Senate and House and their voices will be heard in the future.

The Republican Party was born out of a concern for human beings. Its spiritual and political leader, Abraham Lincoln, was interested above all things in human beings. Our type of government and the Christianity on which it rests is concerned with the individual. We criticize the Democratic Party because it has shifted emphasis from the individual to the State. The aspirations and the hopes of the people grow continually. It is difficult for them to find expression in an industrial society without a use of governmental power that would eventually destroy the quality of our system and the responsibility of the people. The Democratic administration has depended on governmental power for solution. We must find the answer in the expansion of political liberty and economic opportunity.

Finally, its party must become wholeheartedly the party of peace. The foreign policy of the Administration has been marked with inconsistency, dissension, loose fiscal practices, in its surrender of principle for the sake of expedience as has its domestic policy. The Republican Party has been bipartisan with respect to the United Nations, relief for needy nations, and the Marshall plan. It did not join in, nor does it subscribe to the decisions at Yalta, or Tehran, or to the abandonment of the Baltic states, and eastern Poland. Mr. Truman should not be surprised at the defection of Mr. Wallace. Mr. Wallace is following consistently a policy of Russian appeasement which was developed by a Democratic administration at Yalta and Teheran.

It is my own belief that we must assume our international responsibilities, that we must strive to strengthen the United Nations, that we must work toward the goal of disarmament, and that by a demonstrated will for peace we seek the support of world opinion.

Our greatest influence for democratic government will come from our own unashamed belief and practice of system of individual and economic freedom.

The record of the last 15 years indicates that these goals cannot be realized by the Democratic Party. They must be realized by the Republican Party.

A few days ago, I read these words. "The great community of the United States arose in a defiance of coercion, and grew strong and productive on the principles of voluntary free activity. Its solidarity is not that of men obediently following a pattern but that of men trying to work together at something useful; making mistakes, paying the price, trying again, finding in effort the techniques of mutuality, following the good as each man saw it, learning year by year to see it better, discovering by experience how the good of each involves the good of all. That process has no ending, it is the true American message to a stricken and despondent world."

You and all of us who claim to have a special interest in the party and in the continuation of democratic, free government, have a tremendous responsibility. It is our duty to inform and to lead.

It is a difficult task because we do not appeal to prejudice, to selfish interest, to passion, or by the spurious promises of the all-powerful state. Ours must be the slow but eternal appeal to man's sense of justice, right, and personal responsibility. I can think of no task which offers greater challenge to such a group as this to whom I speak today.

We have the judgment of history that our principles are right.

Investigation of Communist Activities

OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to jump at any conclusions respecting the guilt or innocence of those involved in the recent disclosures concerning Communist infiltration into the Government. Since the national security is involved, I feel strongly that the whole matter should be investigated from all angles in order to make sure our national interests are protected. It is serious—deadly serious. Mr. Truman's attitude and actions in making a laughing matter of the entire affair and in refusing to disclose evidence requested to the congressional investigating committees is most dangerous. The President should at least conduct an open and aboveboard investigation of his own, even if he is not willing to cooperate with the Congress for the public good.

Two appropriate comments on this subject are included in the following editorials from the Harrisburg Evening News of August 6, 1948, and from the Washington News of the same date:

[From the Harrisburg (Pa.) Evening News of August 6, 1948]

WHY FRET ABOUT IT?

President Truman's caustic comment on the spy investigation as a herring drawn to divert public attention from Congress' delinquencies seems most impolitic. Its effect may be to persuade the American people to think that the President is embarrassed by the revelations rather than delighted, as he ought to be, that the suspects are being listed, even if some are no longer in Government service.

If there is anything the Chief Executive should want it is the confidence of the people that he is as determined as they that every Government employee of questionable loyalty be disclosed and ridden rail fashion off his job.

There may be truth that nothing is being disclosed with which the FBI was not familiar or that was not told to the grand jury in New York which investigated communism, but the public was not aware of all of this business until a congressional committee turned on the light.

Well might the public ask was not this disclosure made by the Government rather than by Congress. It looks as though a hush-hush policy was being followed. If so, one can understand why President Truman is fretful about the hearings.

[From the Washington Daily News of August 6, 1948]

NOT FUNNY, MR. PRESIDENT

President Truman charged congressional hearings on Soviet spy activities are a "red herring" to hide the Republican Congress' failure on other matters. In doing so, he very foolishly accepted a measure of responsibility for an ugly and dangerous situation which previously could not have been charged against him.

Not many people who have followed the testimony in the current hearings will agree with Mr. Truman that the Communist problem in Washington can be laughed off as Republican politics, in our opinion.

Moreover, the President has further placed himself on the defensive on this issue by denying to the investigating committees information which is pertinent to their inquiries.

The failure of Congress to act upon the President's anti-inflationary program will not in any sense excuse him for his own refusal to cooperate in removing a very real threat to our national security. The issues are not in any way related. Today we are concerned with another problem.

Under Mr. Truman's own loyalty program, laid down by Executive order, it is the announced policy of the Government to bar from positions of trust in "sensitive" agencies any employee whose loyalty may be subject to question.

That policy broke down when William W. Remington was appointed chairman of the Commerce Department's export license committee although it was known he was under investigation for association with a confessed member of a Russian spy ring. That is not something existing only in the mind of Representative KARL E. MUNDT, as Mr. Truman would have us believe. It is an undisputed unexplained fact. And if the President's loyalty test was not applied in Mr. Remington's case, what reason have we to believe that it has been applied in any other case?

The two congressional investigations, particularly the one being conducted by Senator FERGUSON, have been extremely useful. But neither has more than scratched the surface, in our judgment.

We need a careful, searching inquiry, that will give free access to all pertinent information, conducted by an agency with the ability and the power to purge the Government of all disloyal and unreliable elements. An unofficial civilian commission should be created for this purpose, as a safeguard against the subversion of the Government by enemy agents or dupes.

Such a commission, to command respect and confidence of the public and Congress, should be composed of persons of the caliber of Herbert Hoover, Bernard M. Baruch, Henry L. Stimson, Charles Evans Hughes, Owen D. Roberts, Robert M. La Follette, and James F. Byrnes—men who know government, who respect civil liberties, but who would resolve all doubts in favor of national security.

Let's forget politics when the issue is security.

Address of Hon. Henry A. Wallace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of a radio address by Henry A. Wallace over the National Broadcasting Co. network on Thursday, July 29, 1948:

The Congress has reassembled in Washington. It has been called into special session by President Truman to create the illusion that it is the Congress, and the Congress alone, which is responsible for the sorry state of our national affairs.

President Truman did not call this present special session with any expectation of getting legislation which would serve the American people. He called it in the mistaken belief that he could make Congress the scapegoat for his own inadequate and often dangerous leadership.

Mr. Truman knew that a Congress which had worked hand-in-glove with his administration in scuttling price controls, in setting the stage for antilabor legislation, in whipping up false Red scares, and in giving service to international big business, rather than to the people at home and abroad—Mr. Truman knew that such a Congress would not suddenly reform in the heat of midsummer in Washington.

He was completely confident that nothing of real significance would happen. If he had not been confident, he would not have proposed, nor would his backers have permitted him to propose legislation which faintly imitates the measures for which progressives have been fighting these past 2 years.

As a professional politician, as a graduate of the Pendergast machine, as a close student of the utterly corrupt Democratic Party machinery, Mr. Truman was completely confident that he could hoodwink millions of Americans with the gesture of calling a special session.

This was a coldly calculated maneuver to create the election-year impression that there is a real struggle between the two old parties.

Nothing would please me more than to find honest reasons for believing that the President wants to fight for progressive measures. But the evidence is all to the contrary. The insincerity of this performance—this convocation of a special session—is apparent when one realizes the things which Mr. Truman might have done, could still do, but will not do to provide real leadership in solving some of the major problems of the people. Mr. Truman could pick up the Presidential pen from his desk and provide genuine leadership.

This very day he could request and receive the resignations of his own lieutenants, who are so largely responsible for milk at 24 cents a quart, meat at $1.30 a pound, and once low-priced automobiles at $2,000.

He could remove the banker, John Snyder, as Secretary of the Treasury. It was Mr. Snyder who first broke the dike. It was Mr. Snyder who set off the postwar inflation when he granted the steel monopoly a $5-a-ton increase while OPA was still on the statute books.

He could remove the myriads of Wall Street and military representatives with whom he has completely undermined the Roosevelt policy of using government to serve the people. There is James Forrestal, the Secretary of Defense, a leading architect of the cold war, who is a graduate of Dillon, Read, the investment banking house so concerned with rebuilding the industrial empire of the Nazi cartelists. He could remove Mr. Forrestal, whose insatiable appetite for bigger and better arms programs is a leading source of the inflation about which the President purports to worry.

From the State Department alone he could evict such leading representatives of the big business philosophy as the Under Secretary of State, Robert Lovett, formerly of the investment banking firm of Brown Bros., Harriman; and Assistant Secretary of State, Charles Saltzman, former vice president of the New York Stock Exchange.

From the key defense posts under Forrestal he could remove all those men who are sensitive to the desires of big business for even greater, more profitable arms, munitions, and aircraft contracts. There is the industrialist Secretary of the Air Force, W. Stuart Symington, and his assistant, Cornelius Vanderbilt Whitney; there is the Secretary of the Army, Kenneth Royall, who serves as chairman of the board and a director and officer of a number of corporations; and the Under Secretary of the Army, Gen. William Draper, Jr., another graduate of the Dillon, Read investment banking firm.

In the past 3 years it has become almost impossible to go to any key office in Washington without meeting an industrialist, a banker, or a general. These are not evil men, but they are unfitted by their personal interests to hold the key administrative posts in a Government which should be of the people, by the people, and for the people. These men have dominated the administration. They led him into the policy of the cold war; into the scuttling of necessary economic controls after VJ-day; and if they remain quiet now, it is to enable their man, Mr. Truman, to build a myth that he is fighting valiantly in the people's interests. They share his confidence that nothing will result except the perpetuation of an illusion that there is a difference between the monopoly parties.

If Mr. Truman were sincere about fighting inflation he would rid himself of the men whose advice led him to feed the fires of inflation. He has not replaced them. He has not reprimanded them when they have contradicted his own statements. He has kept them in the most important posts of our national government. In keeping these men he is showing the same insincerity which leads him to speak against commodity speculation and retain on his personal staff the proven speculator, Brig. Gen. Wallace Graham.

But the most appalling evidence of the President's insincerity in presenting his pseudo-liberal program to Congress is found in his own actions on the much-discussed civil-rights program.

With the same pen that could eliminate the Wall Street domination of the executive department, Mr. Truman—tonight—could end segregation in the armed forces.

This past week, as the Congress convened in Washington to receive his message, the President took a step which mocked the hopes of all democracy-loving Americans and most particularly the 15,000,000 Negro Americans who are this Nation's most subjugated minority. He issued an Executive order which ostensibly afforded a new status to the Negro soldier, sailor, airman, and marine. This order—though it created headlines and through headlines and illusion—did not end Jim Crow, did not abolish segregation in the armed forces. Mr. Truman's Chief of Staff has already made it clear that the new order will not end segregation in the armed forces. The fault is not with the Chief of Staff but with President Truman. Mr. Truman used the language of the southern bourbon, the language of the defenders of the Jim Crow tradition, by calling for equal opportunity and equal treatment. The southern bourbons have always mouthed phrases like separate but equal facilities in their defense of Jim Crow, though the words separate and equal are inherently contradictory. Mr. Truman used language which appeased his Secretary of the Army, Kenneth Royall, who threatened to resign if segregation in the Army were abolished. He used language which appeased those arch defenders of the caste system, the generals of the Army.

In another heartless dodge this week he appointed a commission to investigate that which has been investigated time and time again—discrimination in Federal employment. He resurrected the nauseating practice of the British imperialists and other oppressors from time immemorial—the device of the investigating commission. The colonial peoples of the world will understand Mr. Truman's dodge. The people of Israel, who saw 21 investigations used to delay justice for them, will understand. And the Negro people of the United States will see through this shabby political performance.

The emergencies in housing, inflated prices, in health and education which the President now recognizes so dramatically existed when the regular session of Congress adjourned in June. If the President were sincere he would have called the special session on the day he signed the antisemitic, anti-Catholic displaced persons bill. If he were sincere he would not have signed that bill. He would have thrown it back in the faces of Congress and told them to come back into session after the political conventions— to come back and pass a decent bill which would admit the homeless of all races, national origins, and creeds.

The sad, simple, shocking fact is that Mr. Truman's call for a special session did not come from a deep conviction that he must serve the people. It came from a belated conviction that he must do something dramatic to fool the people in an effort to split the progressive forces.

But what looks like a short-run political success will prove the final undoing of the Janus-faced one-party system. The special session will demonstrate that even if the President were sincerely dedicated to serving the general welfare he could not succeed, tied as he is to a corrupt, machine-ridden, monopoly-controlled political party.

The special session of the Congress—though it will not take action to curb monopoly and serve the fundamental interests of the people—is not without value. It will dramatize the need for the political realinement which is taking place; the alinement which will put reactionary votes in the Dewey column and progressive votes in the Progressive column. It will dramatize the fact that the only wasted votes in November will be those cast for the Truman ticket. It will demonstrate that no party can long exist half Hague and half free.

The special session, like the civil-rights program before it, resulted from the demonstrations that the American people are determined to maintain their traditional freedoms, their living standards, and to end the cold war.

While both old parties recognize this demand, their battle is a sham. Both pretend that they want to stop inflation and contend that they only disagree on methods. The Republicans say the way to stop inflation is to reduce Government spending, yet they overwhelmingly support the huge appropriations for unproductive arms, which saps the strength of our economy and promotes inflation.

The Democrats speak of controls—of price and wage controls and consumer-credit controls. But the kind of selective controls which Mr. Truman proposes would not halt run-away prices. The Truman program is a sham and it stands in marked contrast to a real anti-inflation program like that introduced in the last session of Congress by Senator GLEN TAYLOR.

Even if Mr. Truman's program were enacted by the Congress fuel oil which should cost you at most 9 cents per gallon would still be costing you 13 cents per gallon. And the price of beef, which could be cut 20 cents a pound without reducing the farmers' net income, would stand where it is or go even higher. The prices of other commodities would probably continue to rise if the Truman plan of selective controls were enacted into law. There is no provision for an immediate freezing of prices. It relies on the establishment of an administrative machine which would take several months to assemble.

The fundamental fact for every wage earner, farmer, housewife, and independent businessman to recognize is that the Republicans and Democrats both agree on the basic policies which cause inflation.

They agree on the bipartisan policy of the cold war—on the program for militarizing our economy. They have demonstrated their agreement on the policy of turning the Government over to the representatives of international big business.

Jim Forrestal's Mr. Truman and Winthrop Aldrich's Tom Dewey may disagree on who should get the lion's share of profits from inflation. They may reflect disagreements between Forrestal's Dillon, Read and Aldrich's Chase National, between one investment banking house and another, between one industrial empire and another, but there is no disagreement which will lead either political servant to policies which will genuinely serve the American people.

Both parties have said that partisan politics must stop at the water's edge; that our foreign policy is not subject to fundamental debate. With such an attitude neither of the old parties can cope with our domestic problems, because in this world today it is the cold war which dictates our manner of living. It is this policy on which they agree—the policy of guns instead of butter, of tanks instead of tractors, of bullets instead of medicine which make inflation inevitable.

If any further proof were needed that the cold war is the basic cause of inflation and that neither the Truman administration nor the Republican Party is interested in tackling inflation, the events of the last few months would supply it.

Early this year, after the break in commodity markets, there were many predictions that the inflation was at an end. The big business interests who pull the strings of government didn't like the prospect. They called on their man Truman to do something about it. He did. He gave the inflation wheel another whirl.

In his crisis message of March 17 in which he asked for the draft and UMT and in which he paved the way for increased military appropriations, Mr. Truman not only failed to call for price curbs but went so far as to say that we must be prepared to "pay the price" for meeting his crisis.

As I warned at the time, and as all the leading financial papers pointed out, the Truman March 17 program was bound to support, not curb inflation. The inflationary wave he set off then has continued unchecked. In the last few months alone the price of meat has risen 10 to 20 cents a pound, the price of steel $10 to $30 a ton; and the price of automobiles from $100 to $200 each.

The monopolists have permitted Mr. Truman to make a show of combatting inflation, because they know that their present power in Congress makes effective action impossible; and because they are worried lest the wrath of the people express itself in votes for the one party—the Progressive Party—which is dedicated to the fundamental job of controlling monopolists.

As part of the sham battle, the Republicans and Democrats are leveling charges at one another. Last evening Senator TAFT charged that Mr. Truman is trying to "regiment" the country and to set up a police state with his special session program.

The fact is that both old parties are trying to regiment the country, to initiate a police state, but Truman's program has little to do with it.

The other day the Federal Trade Commission—an independent Government agency not yet corrupted by bipartisan appointees—sent a special message to Congress warning that the growth of monopoly threatened this country with collectivism—with the extinction of competitive enterprise.

This warning will fall on deaf ears. The bipartisan Congress and the bipartisan administration will not tackle the fundamental problems of monopoly control of our economy, because both old parties are the servants of monopoly.

Eight months ago in another special session called by Truman the Congress passed and Truman signed a law giving the monopoly corporations power to establish cartels for the control of basic raw materials. This law gives big steel and big oil the power to regiment all of American business dependent on oil and steel. It gives them the power to create further shortages and through shortages to raise prices.

At the last session of Congress a bill was passed and signed by the President which gave to Secretary of Defense Forrestal the power to determine priorities for steel. This was a major step in the creeping coup d'etat by which the bankers and militarists are gaining control over our civilian economy. They were thwarted in World War II by Roosevelt, but they have been assisted by Truman.

The National Association of Manufacturers and its political stooges, both Republican and Democratic, who cry "communism" every time a measure essential to protect the people is proposed, are the real advocates of collectivization. The only political party in the United States today which is dedicated to preserving independent business enterprise and to protecting workers, farmers, and consumers from monopoly is the new party, the Progressive Party.

The men who cry loudest against regimentation here at home are blatantly demanding regimentation in western Europe. The truth is that they are ardent advocates of regimentation both at home and abroad. Today Averell Harriman, Democrat, and Paul Hoffman, Republican, are in Europe trying to force reluctant governments to adopt detailed 4-year plans for production and foreign trade—plans which will serve international big business rather than the great mass of people either here or abroad. The attempted regimentation of Europe is being carried out under the same bipartisan auspices as the relatively silent regimentation of America.

Already our foreign trade is being curtailed by a mass of red tape and stringent licensing requirements which favor large corporate interests to the growing exclusion of independent traders.

Today the Government run by the generals and big business controls as much as one-fourth of all the goods made in our country. It is only the beginning. The Republicans, who sound like economic anarchists, and the Democrats, who sound like economic radicals, are jointly following in action the tried and tested methods of the European cartelists who regimented Germany and most of Europe in bringing on World War II.

The industrialists and bankers, the international big businessmen, have set the stage to absolve themselves of guilt for bringing us to the verge of another war by acquitting in mock war crimes trials their German counterparts. Only this morning most of the world was shocked to learn that an American military tribunal has absolved the top officials of IG Farben, the industrial monopoly which provided Hitler with his chemicals and poison gas. Previously Krupp, the steel and tank king, and Stinnes, the big Ruhr operator, were given clean bills of health—were freed to help recreate the very prewar cartels we were pledged to eliminate.

I must warn the American people to guard against new bipartisan tricks in this special session of Congress. I must warn against the possible passage by Congress and the signing by Truman of legislation which will not stop inflation, but only increase the power of the monopolists and militarists.

I must warn of the rabbits which Congress and the administration may pull out of their hats—Russian-menace rabbits, Red-menace rabbits, Thomas-committee rabbits. They may try again, as they have done before, to hypnotize us with these hysterical sideshows while they take the next steps in the drive toward war.

The American people have had enough red herrings; they are entitled to more red meat. But the bipartisans will continue the cold war, will continue the basic cause of inflation until the people demonstrate their independence of the old parties of the monopolists and militarists.

I speak of the Progressive Party. I speak of the party which stands for an America where 60,000,000 people are producing houses, not bombers; autos, not machine guns; washing machines, not tanks—an America where prices are going down and wages are going up.

Today the Government with its war policy directly and indirectly gives employment to more than 5,000,000 men. If these 5,000,000 Americans were working for peace instead of war, prices would be going down right now. But that would mean that both the Republicans and Democrats would have to forego the luxury of using the red menace as their chief political asset. They would have to abandon their friends in the great corporations. They would have to turn their backs on scarcity, monopoly, and war and embrace the philosophy of abundance and peace. Neither old party will do this. This is why the Progressive Party is so all-important.

The legislation proposed for this special session of Congress by the Progressive Party would stop inflation, would advance civil rights, would serve the people.

The real progressives have consistently fought for the people; in and out of Congress. As a member of Mr. Truman's Cabinet I opposed the premature lifting of controls which paved the way for killing OPA. Senator TAYLOR stood almost alone in combatting the antilabor hysteria bred by President Truman at the time of the railroad strike—the hysteria which led to Taft-Hartley. In the House of Representatives the men who have allied themselves with the Progressive Party—as well as a few who are progressives at heart but who are still wearing old party labels—have consistently fought for the kind of price and economic controls which would benefit the people, not the corporations. We Progressives have consistently fought against the bipartisan policy of "cold war"—the root of inflation and fear; against the policy of "cold war" which drains the resources we need for housing, health, education, and social security.

Many of those who have formed the new Progressive Party, the antimonopoly party, the human-rights party, have fought at risk of prison terms and in face of threatened violence to break down the bars of segregation. The Progressive Party has not and will not equivocate in fighting for full justice for all Americans.

This is the talk-big, do-little Congress. The Republicans talk big about ending the poll tax and lynch law, but they do not mean it. The Democrats talk big about ending inflation and building houses. They do not mean it either. It is all shadow boxing. They have not landed a single solid blow. Only the Progressive Party packs a real wallop.

We have both the old parties screaming with anguish and using their servants of the press to launch vicious attacks on the Progressive Party. But we glory in their abuse. It is a measure of the essential worth of our program to curb monopoly and strike at the very roots of the people's problems.

If you ask me as an economist, as a businessmen, as a farmer what you can do to protect yourself against the mounting inflation, I can give no easy get-rick-quick formula. If you ask me as a citizen what you can do about housing shortages, about security for your old age, about civil rights, about all of the pressing problems of the day, I can give only one honest answer:

Use your ballot. It is your only real weapon against mounting inflation, eventual depression, and war. Use your ballot to help build the Progressive Party. It is the only party which has a real program for solving the fundamental problems of the people.

Why Labor Should Be Interested in the 1948 Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Members of the Congress have accustomed themselves to speak in language which the average citizen sometimes finds complicated or roundabout. Too often our real meaning is actually obscured by our verbiage. All of us should from time to time listen to how very simple people talk about the problems we discuss here in our National Legislature.

Today I received a copy of a one-page letter written by a 21-year-old girl who works in a textile mill in Pennsylvania. In very few words this young woman sums up a great deal of sound economics and social philosophy. The letter was written in connection with a contest staged by the Penn-Appalachian Joint Board of the Textile Workers Union of America, CIO, which has its headquarters at Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Miss Catherine Micho, who won the first prize, was awarded a trip to Washington to watch the Congress of the United States in action.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY LABOR SHOULD BE INTERESTED IN THE 1948 ELECTION

Today the labor in the United States is at a critical point. As it is, the Government has some control over the unions.

If the wrong men or women are elected into Congress, we will be helpless. Our unions will be broken up. Many will lose their jobs. Our wages will be cut. We will have to work twice as hard as we are now.

If the right men and women are elected into Congress, we will be able to fight for our rights. They will aid us in every way as possible. They will see that such laws as the Taft-Hartley bill are done away with. They will see to it that our rights are as good as any manufacturer's.

We should elect someone that will fight for reduction in prices and taxes. They will also fight for our equal rights. We must vote for the people that are reliable and honest.

Our recent union-shop elections show that we are interested in our unions. We know that since the unions are here, they have aided us in many ways. They fought for higher wages, insurance, seniority rights, and greater improvements in working conditions.

All unions must get together in the coming election and vote for the right persons, if they wish to be established forever in this country. Why should the manufacturers be always the main cheese? Give us a chance.

Assistance for the State of Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW L. SOMERS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to introduce a number of measures before the House over the past 8 years in connection with the problem of America's policy toward the Hebrew people, a nation now reborn on its ancient soil in Israel. I have only recenty proposed that the United States Government lend $150,000,000 to the new state of Israel. At this time I would like to outline a five-point program which I consider essential for the United States Government to adopt in its relations with the Israeli government and the people of that newly created state.

This program I offer in the best interests of our country. It is not only our moral obligation to a people which fought at our Allies' side during the war against the Axis; it is not only our duty to the United Nations; it is regard for our own interest as Americans that prompts me to formulate these five points, which I deem the minimum requirements for a sane, just and enlightened American foreign policy in the Middle East:

First. I urge again that the United States Government lend $150,000,000 to the state of Israel for reconstructing and development, to assist in the economic problems entailed in the rapid absorption of hundreds of thousands of displaced, as well as reconstruction of war ravages.

Second. I call upon our Government to grant full de jure recognition to the state of Israel, to exchange official diplomatic missions with the Israeli Government, and to sponsor the admission of Israel as an equal member of the United Nations.

Third. I ask that the embargo on arms and men which has been imposed on the new state of Israel be lifted. Ever since the embargo has been in effect, I have sponsored a resolution to protect the citizenship of Americans who wanted to go and fight for freedom in Palestine. Yet, this is only a temporary expedient. The embargo has been imposed not merely on the shipment of arms to Israel, but on the movement of people to that country. It is my opinion that the psychological effect of raising the embargo would end any conceivable threat against the new state from Britain directly, or indirectly through British-sponsored Arab attacks. Our raising the embargo would force Britain to release the 11,000 Hebrews who are confied in concentration camps in Cyprus.

Fourth. I again urge, as I urged 9 months ago, that American ships transport all stateless Hebrews from the displaced persons camps in our occupied zones in Europe to the land they have determined to live in: Palestine. It has always been my opinion that these stateless Hebrews were actually citizens of Palestine by their own choice and determination, and that only British force has prevented them from reaching their home territory. I have never favored smuggling Jews to Palestine; but have insisted that they go openly and proudly as is their right. I want the United States Government to send them, to provide the ships and other facilities necessary. This will end the moral crime of the DP camps. This will end the heavy burden of expense on America for maintaining the camps, and the scandal of our taking over Hitler's role of keeping Jews in cages.

Fifth. Finally, I urge that Congress go on record as favoring the incorporation of the city of Jerusalem into the territory of Israel. It is impossible to conceive of France without Paris or of England without London. It is just as impossible to have an Israel without Jerusalem as its capital. One-seventh of the Hebrew population of Israel lives in Jerusalem. They are entitled to security; they want to belong to Israel. Israel must have Jerusalem if unrest and disturbances are not to persist indefinitely in the Holy Land. There is no international regime possible in Jerusalem, no matter how much certain great powers wish there were. The regime that controls Jerusalem will be, in the final analysis, either British—through Abdullah—or Israeli. There is no doubt in my mind where the sentiment of the American people lie in such a choice, and where we must throw our weight, in the interests of a lasting solution to Palestine questions.

I do not approach the question of America's interest in Palestine as a newcomer. Before Pearl Harbor I had the privilege of introducing the resolution before the House calling for the creation of an army of stateless and Palestinian Jews to fight against the Axis as part of the Allied forces. My reasons for supporting this idea were twofold: to increase the strength of the Allied forces in the field, and to give the reborn Hebrew nation training and experience for an army which I foresaw would one day be necessary for them. The Jewish Brigade was created, acquitting itself with valor throughout the war. Its veterans are the backbone of Israel's defense.

Even prior to creation of Israel, when people laughed and said it was an idle dream, I called on the United States Government to recognize a Hebrew republic. I sought to commit American foreign policy to the Hebrew cause and to avoid confusions of the sort we have witnessed in recent months.

To me the speedy rescue of displaced persons has always been a matter of top priority. I worked as a private citizen to assist in raising money so that displaced persons could be moved via underground channels to Palestine, hoping that if thousands of American citizens took the initiative our Government could then be persuaded to follow officially.

In this session I introduced House Joint Resolution 407 calling on the Government to provide vessels to transport all Hebrew DP's to Palestine so that the abominable camps could be closed by October 1 of this year. It is my fervent hope that, spurred on by this resolution, American ships flying the American flag will arrive in Haifa harbor carrying the new citizens of Israel from the DP camps of Europe and Cyprus. I want to see all Jewish DP camps in the American zone closed before another winter. The arrival of these people in Israel will be Israel's greatest defense against invasion.

In 1945 I made a trip to England to see Mr. Bevin and Mr. Attlee. I talked with them at length about British policy in Palestine. But I soon recognized the futility of negotiating with the British or of relying on their promises. I saw that the rebirth of a nation on Palestinian soil would have to be the work of the Hebrew people themselves, and I sought to give them as much American aid as possible.

Throughout my long interest in the Palestine problem as it related to America's foreign policy, I have supported measures designed to provide a decent and honorable solution. In fact, I have made it my concern to maintain a steady pressure wherever it would do most good in order to direct our Government's course of action along the lines I believed essential if America were one day to have a firm, strong ally in the Middle East. I have been opposed to expressions of wordy sympathy—I have demanded practical deeds by our citizens and our Government as the only means of forcing the British Empire to retreat and give the Hebrews the effective support for victory.

It is my intention to go to Israel this summer and to make a survey on the scene. I propose to confer with the leaders of the Israeli Government and determine what the new state needs from America and what America can do to solidify a permanent two-way alliance with the new free people of Israel. I shall report my findings to the Congress and introduce such legislation as is necessary to carry them out.

The five-point program which I have here suggested at the beginning of these remarks is a program which all Americans can support in the certainty that they are working for the highest interests of our country. The $150,000,000 loan which I propose will strengthen Israel's economy. The full diplomatic recognition and admission of Israel into the United Nations will link this country intimately with its most loyal ally in the Middle East. Raising the arms embargo will put an end to the hopes of the warmakers in the Middle East that they can resume their aggressions against Israel and destroy the precarious peace in that strategic zone. Repatriation of Hebrew DP's on American ships from the DP camps to the shores of Israel will discharge our obligation, close the camps, and give additional manpower to the developing power of free Israel. Recognition that Jerusalem is and must be an integral part of Israel, indeed is naturally its capital city, will be final notice to the intriguers and agitators of the Middle East that they cannot expect to carry on their trickery against Israel, against America's strategic interests, or against the peace of the world from the vantage point of the Holy City.

It is my sincere belief that if these five points are implemented by our Government the threat of continued warfare in the Middle East will be for all practical purposes eliminated. America will have made a great contribution in support of the United Nations and toward peace in one of the danger zones of our world. We will have an increasingly powerful ally on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean. And, above all, we will have aided the solution of one of the oldest problems in western history, a solution which we and our children's children will be rightfully proud to have brought about.

Mr. Speaker, we will see the solution to the so-called Jewish problem in equity and justice, if we abandon the hypocrisy which evil forces have injected into our Middle East policy and proceed to give full and proud backing to the Hebrew struggle. I am certain that Israel shall be victorious. I want my country to participate in this historic achievement.

Congressman George MacKinnon Filing Statement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE MacKINNON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include my statement of July 24, 1948, on filing for reelection as Representative in Congress from the Third Minnesota District.

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE MACKINNON ON FILING FOR REELECTION AS MEMBER OF CONGRESS, THIRD MINNESOTA DISTRICT

ENDORSED UNANIMOUSLY FOR REELECTION

Having been unanimously endorsed for reelection as Third District Congressman by all the official Republican Party organizations in the Third Congressional District, I have today filed for renomination on the Republican ticket.

PROMISES FULFILLED

The Eightieth Congress has lived up to the promises it made to the Nation in the 1946 campaign. These were fourfold, first to cut unnecessary strikes, second to cut taxes, third to balance the budget, and fourth to remove controls. All these promises have been fulfilled.

NEW LABOR LAW

Under the new labor law strikes have been cut 4,600,000 man-days per month, which amounts to over 55,000,000 man-days a year. This is a 64-percent cut in idleness due to strikes. It represents an annual saving to workers of about $1,000,000,000 a year. And official statistics released by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics show conclusively that labor's bargaining position has not been harmed. In this connection I was instrumental in Congress with others on the Education and Labor Committee in—

1. Establishing labor's bill of rights which guarantees democratic procedures and gives union members security in their union, access to union financial records, and job opportunity if union membership is denied them in violation of their civil rights.

2. I also worked with others to protect the principle of union security through the union shop and a bargaining area coextensive with the employers bargaining organization.

3. In committee I offered the amendment to remove railroad workers from the Taft-Hartley Act. This was adopted. It preserved their rights and procedures under the Railway Labor Act.

PLEDGES OPEN MIND

If abuses on the part of management or labor arise under the administration of the new labor law I will be alert to support modification of the law in the public interest so the Nation will not suffer a repetition of the spectacle we have just gone through where gross abuses were allowed to continue unchecked until the national situation became intolerable.

INFLATION RESULT OF DEMOCRATIC LONG-TERM POLICIES

Our present inflation is the result of long-term policies of the present Truman administration which dates back to the time when President Truman accepted Henry Wallace's unsound advice that wage increases would not bring price increases. Unsound Government purchasing policies have also contributed to the evil. The cure for inflation is sound long-term policies and it is apparent that these cannot be obtained from the Truman administration. Price and wage controls, as proposed by the President, would only deal with the effects of inflation. Their relief would be only temporary and they would bring the greater evils of scarcities, black markets, and diminished purchasing power. The President's so-called anti-inflation program is at best only a temporary expedient which would produce limited benefits until after the November election and then the evils would be magnified. To cure inflation we must have sound money, sound governmental spending policies, reasonable taxes, and an increase in production to equal or exceed demand.

FOREIGN RECOVERY

As stated in my 1946 campaign I have supported the foreign recovery program and believe that the expenditures and hardships which that program entails are small beside the greater expenditures and hardships we would be forced to bear if communism were to be successful in its world-wide aggressions.

EXPERIENCE COUNTS

I consider it a high honor to have been chosen to represent the Third District in Congress and am submitting my candidacy to the electorate with the knowledge that the additional seniority and experience that goes with reelection will make it possible for me to express a more influential voice for all the people of the district and for all the people of the Nation.

Higher Pay Is Buying Less

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER B. HUBER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, many statements have been made both in and out of Congress regarding the ever-increasing cost of living. Reams of reports have been sent out by economists who have analyzed the situation.

In glancing through my home-town paper, the Akron Beacon Journal of August 5, I was pleasantly surprised to find an article by my old friend, Clyde Mann, of the Beacon Journal staff, dramatizing the hardship that the workingman is suffering. This is the best report I have seen to date, and I am inserting it in the RECORD.

I see no reason to inject politics in my remarks at this time, although I have definite views with regard to the cause of existing unreasonable high prices. I can only say that the cure rests with this Congress. I urge my colleagues to forget politics and name calling, to forget efforts to fix the blame, to forget this mad scramble to adjourn, and to stay on the job and put out the fire of inflation even if it takes until Christmas.

I remember the boom-and-bust days of the twenties and we must not let it happen again. Depressions are not inevitable, they can be prevented with just a little foresight and horse sense. So let us all stay on the job and tackle the problems of inflation, housing, and other emergency matters with which we are confronted.

Let us do the job now.

HIGHER PAY IS BUYING LESS—RUBBER WAGE EARNERS LOSE HCL BATTLE

(By Clyde Mann)

Rubber workers are losing ground steadily in the hot race between the cost of living and the pay envelope.

Three wage increases have pushed the pay level in industry to the highest point ever reached. The wage scale of the rubber industry is one of the highest in the Nation.

But most of the more than 70,000 rubber wage earners in the Akron area are not as well off now as when the war ended.

For one thing, the cost of living today is the highest in history. And second, the rubber worker has chosen to stay on the 36-hour workweek, which cuts his weekly take-home pay.

The fact that he was better off during the war will not be startling news to the thousands of men and women deeply worried about the speed with which their pay disappears every week.

Neither is the problem of how to make income meet the zooming cost of living confined to the production workers. They make up the largest single economic unit in the area and as such receive and spend the biggest slice of the area income.

But thousands of white-collar workers, school teachers, clerks, Federal, State, city, and county employees, and professional people also have to count every penny these days. And the plight of the pensioners and those on retirement income is even worse.

The average rubber worker is taking home less pay now than he did in 1946, despite the three wage increases that have boosted his hourly income a total of 41 cents since that year.

The plight of the rubber-plant employee can be stated very simply. He is getting the highest hourly rate ever paid in the industry. But he is working shorter hours and the huge jumps made in living costs have wiped out all the profits in the pay increases.

With a complete new round of price boosts now in progress, the rubber worker actually was better off in February 1945 than he is today.

Then he was earning an average of $1.19 an hour, working 48 hours a week or more and getting overtime pay after 40 hours. Weekly, he was taking home $70, on an average.

He was paying 39 cents a pound for steak and 30 cents for pork chops. He could buy an 8-year-old car for $295. If he had a garden that spring he could buy tomato stakes for 5 cents each.

The cost-of-living index measured by the Bureau of Labor Statistics early in 1945 was 126.9.

Today he's earning $1.70 an hour, on the average. He's getting no overtime pay and 36 hours a week work at the most. He's taking home an average of $59 a week.

He's paying 89 cents a pound for steak and 69 cents for pork chops. An 8-year-old car will cost him $800 or more. And if he still has that garden, he will pay 11 cents for tomato stakes.

The cost of living, according to BLS, is now 171.7 and climbing.

The rubber worker says that he should be taking home at least $94 a week to keep his family budget balanced.

He points to Federal statistics which show that it costs 123 percent more to feed a family now than it did in 1939.

Clothing for the average family has gone up 97 percent, furniture and household furnishings, 91 percent, BLS reports.

A suit of medium grade which cost $27.50 in 1939 now sells for $55. A pair of men's shoes costing $5.50 in 1939 now costs $12.95. The cotton work shirt that sold for 70 cents 9 years ago is now retailing for $1.95.

Before the war a refrigerator sold for $174. Today a similar model will cost $225.

Today the two-piece living room suite that sold for $139 in 1939 will cost about $150 to be reupholstered and rebuilt. A new one will cost $239.

Axminster rugs have gone up from $31.50 to $70, a sewing machine from $104 to $165.

According to Federal statistics rent has been held down firmly by Government controls.

But at present it is rising point by point. It's 12 percent higher now than it was in 1939.

Prices for new homes are up 100 percent since before the war. With labor and material costs increasing, new home prices are expected to go still higher.

Federal Funds for Public School Building Construction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD O. McCOWEN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. McCOWEN. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill today to provide Federal funds to assist the States in the acquisition and construction of plant facilities for public schools.

Of course, I am aware of the fact that this bill cannot be passed at this special session of the Eightieth Congress. But, conditions could come about that would cause another special session of the Eightieth Congress, in which there would be time to have the bill enacted into law.

I fully appreciate the fact that this is not at all probable or likely. The bill is not being introduced with that purpose in mind. It is being introduced for the purpose of calling the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives and the public in general to the fact that school buildings in the United States, speaking generally, have deteriorated very greatly since before World War II and improvements were impossible during the war. In the years since the end of the war, costs have been so high that it has been impossible to do much in the way of school-building construction because of the small amount of total wealth in many of the rural and village districts, in particular, in the United States, making it so that districts could not be bonded sufficiently for school-building construction. School population has increased in hundreds of localities tremendously and the buildings have become overcrowded and entirely inadequate for even fairly efficient school purposes.

Another reason for calling the attention of the Congress to this matter at this time is because it is quite likely that there will be a considerable amount of unemployment during the next 2 years, and the construction of new school buildings will help provide employment for many thousands.

Very briefly stated, this bill provides for a 5-year program and for the appropriation of $200,000,000 for the first year ending June 30, 1950, and the sum of $100,000,000 for each of the 4 succeeding fiscal years. The funds are to be given on a 50–50 basis.

Since no State would be compelled to take advantage of this law, it cannot be said that the provisions of the law are being forced on any State. But, it is very unlikely that any State would refuse to take advantage of the law if it should be enacted because even the wealthiest of the States have very great need for new school buildings; and each of the wealthy States have many districts in them that are not financially able to build school buildings adequate for their needs.

Since money for school buildings was provided by the Federal Government under the PWA and the WPA Administrations in the 1930's, there is good precedent for this legislation.

This bill is being introduced strictly on my own initiative. It is to be hoped, however, that a general demand will arise for this type of important legislation by the next Congress. A new bill to be introduced in the Eighty-first Congress after January 3, 1949, may carry a different amount of money and may contain a different period of time for construction. But, in the main, the thought will be the same.

It is to be hoped that the United States Office of Education will undertake immediately to discover the real needs of each State through the respective State departments of education, so that this data as to needs may be correctly stated and a bill introduced accordingly.

The Congressional Smear—First Investigations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial that appeared in the Washington Post this morning:

MUNDT'S ADMISSION

Representative MUNDT let the tiger out of the bag in his statement about the object of the House spy inquiry of which he is acting chairman. He said the object is to "expose, call attention of the proper authorities to the spying, write letters, make press statements, and try to needle Tom Clark into action." In other words, the committee's action is a vote of no confidence in the Executive in the discharge of his constitutional duty faithfully to execute the laws. So the House committee is going over the grounds covered by the grand jury in New York which after a 3-year $1,000,000 investigation returned no indictments against the persons who are being put on the grid in Congress. In effect the committee is usurping the functions of a grand jury. We ask, in all seriousness, whether this the way of a government of powers divided among the executive, the legislature, and the judiciary. Beware, warned Jefferson, of the tyranny of the legislature.

The President calls the inquiry a red herring. To some extent, of course, he is right, as is clear to anybody who listens to the House proceedings. Examples: "He is a Republican, isn't he?" "He is a Democrat, isn't he?" But the Presidential ascription does justice neither to the seriousness of the issue of Communist activity in our midst nor to the flagrant disregard of proper procedure in investigating it. Communists, in our opinion, would stop at nothing in serving their Red masters. They are inverted theologians, thoroughly amoral, ever ready to sabotage and destroy. It is the presence of these vipers in our midst, together with our critical relations with Moscow, that accounts for the Red scare and the advantage that the investigators are taking of it.

But it is the purpose of the law to reach out and prosecute termites. And it is the job of the FBI to get the evidence to convict. As to the law, Governor Dewey, in the Dewey-Stassen debate May 17, said, "There are 27 acts already that outlaw every conceivable form of subversion." As to the FBI, no institution in the capital today operates in such favor from the appropriating body. But what the House committee is doing is telling the American people that neither their courts nor the FBI is giving them protection. This is dangerous procedure—highly dangerous. The legislators' lack of trust in the courts is bound to evoke, if the people take the committee seriously, the same lack of trust in the courts on the part of the people. What is worse, the committee itself is giving an example itself of lawlessness by ignoring due process.

Representative McDOWELL sought to extract from Mr. Alger Hiss Wednesday an admission that he had had a fair hearing. Mr. Hiss' reply was to the point:

"Mr. McDOWELL, I think I have been treated today with great consideration by this committee. I am not happy that I didn't have a chance to meet with the committee privately before there was such a great public press display of what I consider completely unfounded charges against me. Denials do not always catch up with charges."

The answer made an impression which the Representative sought to offset by what was circumstantially a prevarication. "The committee," he said, "does not know in advance what a witness is going to say." Now, Mr. McDOWELL, even if you don't know, why didn't you make sure by listening to witnesses in camera? The answer is that any such protection for the individual would fly in the face of the declared object of Representative MUNDT to let the espionage cases be decided in the court of public opinion, to let the people determine whether the committee is right, or Attorney General Tom Clark is right. In other words, if the courts won't convict, then a form of lynch rule must prevail. A fine example to provide for the American people—taught as they are to regard justice as the end of government.

National Income Statistics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE MacKINNON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MacKINNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article which appeared in Finance and Commerce, Minneapolis, Minn., July 15, 1948. This article makes some very interesting observations with respect to the present division of our national income among workers and investors.

LABOR'S SHARE OF OUR NATIONAL INCOME RISING—INVESTOR'S SHARE HAS DWINDLED ALARMINGLY, UTILITY EXPERT FINDS

NEW YORK.—Labor's share of America's national income measured in dollars, has risen by leaps and bounds since 1929 while the investors' share has dwindled to an alarming figure, according to a survey, based on official Government statistics, compiled by John A. Ritchie, chairman of the board of the Fifth Avenue Coach Co., which in brief, summarizes the findings of this New York utility executive who has just completed an authenticated survey of the trend of the national income from 1929, peak of the so-called prosperity period and harbinger of the depression, up to and including 1947.

Similarly, the real value—the purchasing power—of labor's share has increased far beyond the rise in the cost of living, while the purchasing power of the investors' portion has dropped sharply.

Although carefully abstaining from interpretation of its factual content, the survey is by itself an answer to the claim of certain labor leaders that corporate profits are far outdistancing the gains of the American workingman.

Thus, while corporate profits amounted to $17,400,000,000 last year, or 8.6 percent of the national income, labor's share in wages and salaries from private business totaled $105,200,000,000 which represented 52 percent of the national income.

Wages and salaries showed a dollar gain of 132.71 percent over 1929, while dividends increased by only 16.78 percent. Only $6,800,000,000 was paid out to investors in dividends. All the remainder was retained for capital expansion, improvements, and reserves—to increase and improve production, seek out new markets, create new jobs, and make more secure the jobs already held.

In real value—purchasing power—labor's share in 1947 was 81 percent greater than in 1929, while dividends paid investors last year were reduced in purchasing power by 9.18 percent over the same period.

The real value of the 1947 dollar, based on prices prevailing in 1939 (when World War II broke out) was 63 cents. Thus, wages and salaries last year increased, in real buying power, to $66,276,000,000 compared with $36,617,000,000 in 1929, while the purchasing power of dividends shrunk from $4,717,000,000 to $4,284,000,000 in the same period.

Shipping Rates

OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I want to include a statement from the Department of Justice which will have a bearing on American shipping:

Attorney General Tom C. Clark today announced the filing of a civil action in United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, Newark, N. J., charging the Far East Conference and 25 shipping lines with a conspiracy to monopolize the direct cargo-carrying trade from ports on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States to ports in Japan, Korea, Formosa, Siberia, Manchuria, China, Indo-China, and the Philippine Islands.

Nineteen of the shipping lines named as defendants are foreign lines and six are American flag lines. The names and places of incorporation of the defendant shipping lines are as follows:

The Bank Line, Ltd. (Scotland).
The China Mutual Steam Navigation Co., Ltd. (England).
Dampskibsselskabet af 1912 A/S (Denmark).
A/S Dampskibsselskabet Svendborg (Denmark).
The De La Rama Steamship Co., Inc. (Philippines).
Ellerman & Bucknall Steamship Co., Ltd. (Great Britain).
Fearnley & Eger (Norway).
A. F. Klaveness & Co. A/S (Norway).
Isthmian Steamship Co. (Delaware).
Skibsaktieselskapet Igadi (Norway).
A/S Besco (Norway).
Aktieselskapet Ivarans Rederi (Norway).
Lancashire Shipping Co., Ltd. (United Kingdom).
American President Lines, Ltd. (Delaware).
Lykes Bros. Steamship Co., Inc. (Louisiana).
Nederlandsche Stoomvaart Maatschappij "Ocean" N. V. (Philippines).
M. V. Nonsuco, Inc. (Philippines).
The Ocean Steamship Co., Ltd. (Great Britain).
Prince Line, Ltd. (England).
Silver Line, Ltd. (England).
States Marine Corp. (New York).
Swedish East Asiatic Co., Ltd. (Philippines).
United States Lines Co. (New Jersey).
Waterman Steamship Corp. (Alabama).
Wilhelmsens Dampskibsaktieselskab (Norway).

The defendant shipping lines are members of the Far East Conference, organized under section 15 of the Shipping Act of 1916, as amended. The Government charges that the defendants have required shippers to agree to patronize the lines of conference members exclusively under pain of penalties calculated to deter the shippers from patronizing any steamship line not operated by a member of the conference; that by means of such contracts the defendants have secured control of virtually all the commercial cargo transported in the trade involved and are excluding competition from such trade.

In announcing the action, the Attorney General declared that the exaction of such a contract by a group comprising the dominant lines in a trade effectively forecloses competitors from engaging in a substantial part of the foreign trade of the United States.

"Such a denial of opportunity to independent shipping lines to compete for traffic, within the rules of fair play enforced by the Maritime Commission, does violence to our American ideal of competitive enterprise," he said.

Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division said: "Under the exclusive patronage contract system, the shipper is compelled to agree to confine his dealings exclusively to the lines of conference members in order to get the benefit of so-called 'contract' rates, which are substantially lower than regular tariff rates.

"The enjoyment of such lower rates is not related in any way to the volume of freight shipped but is conditioned entirely upon the shipper's agreement to employ conference lines exclusively. Any shipper who enters into such an agreement and subsequently patronizes a nonconference line thereby incurs oppressive penalties and fines.

"This system effectively ties the shippers to the conference lines and excludes independent competition which would probably result in rates even lower than the contract rates. The system is identical in purpose and effect to the deferred rebate system which was specifically outlawed by the Congress in 1916 as a monopolistic abuse."

It was pointed out by the Department of Justice that since carriers with foreign flags are in an overwhelming majority in the conference, and since some of the conferences have gone so far as to delegate to themselves the power to fix rates, by majority vote, there are involved in this litigation questions of serious import to the United States. The goods, the rates on which are subject to the jurisdiction of the conference, include relief shipments not only by the American Government but by American religious and charitable organizations.

If the Government is successful in this litigation, all United States shipping companies participating in the various shipping conferences will be benefited through the elimination of a measure of foreign control over American flag ships.

The case was prepared by Joseph E. McDowell, trial attorney, and Carolyn R. Just, attorney, under the supervision of James E. Kilday, Special Assistant to the Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division's Transportation Section.

Who Are You To Prattle About Freedom?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

Who are you to prattle about freedom?

You were born American, you say? So what of that. By no choice of your own were you born free. By no act of your own have you kept free.

Since the day of your birth you have known only free men, men free to work with you—men free to think with you, men free to grieve with you—men free to sing your songs, men free to love the things you love. Not once have you or yours felt an oppressor's curse. So—who are you to prattle about liberty? How dare you try to tell your children what it means. You've known no thing with which to contrast liberty. You've known no thing by which to measure freedom's distance from the depths of tryranny.

No booted brute has ever crashed your door at night to drag you from your family to a firing squad.

No hateful neighbor by false witness ever sent you to the tortures of a concentration camp.

No grudging food control has once denied your own those crusts they needed to retain their strength.

No bayonet has ever driven you, half starved, to sweat long hours at hateful work beyond your power to endure.

No tyrant—once adored—has torn from you your children—at a tender age—to shape them into godless brutes who would some day defame the memory of their mother and of you.

In other countries crafty leaders told all men, not long ago, it couldn't happen there.

You've had your troubles, some perhaps quite hard to bear. So have we all.

But all around you there have always been men free to lend you strength to carry on, free men to help you to the hope of better days.

And better days have come for you, as they can surely come where men are free.

When famine threatens war-cursed nations do they turn to despots for relief?

Or do they turn to your kind land, where generous men are free to give, and never fail mankind in need?

Think you that your America, with her great heart, save under whips of tyrants born to rape and kill, would once permit her worthy own to starve?

Beware the leader who too loudly claims that he alone would keep faith with humanity.

All tyrants in the making have claimed that.

Some neighbors you have loved.

Some men you have not trusted, dared not trust.

But none could crush you.

None could hold you when you chose to move.

Yes, you have been free.

For that you take no credit, please.

For that please now thank God, and those brave souls who fled from foreign tyrannies and built for you a land of law, to help you guard your liberty against the treachery of ever-lustful men, against the blunderings of honest men and fools.

Are you gone soft in your enjoyment of the fruits of liberty, by far the richest ever known to man?

Those who invent for, those who produce for you, grow heartsick at what seems to them to be your blind indifference.

Depressed, they lose their will to serve your Nation's destiny, as their rewards for sacrificial labor disappear through legal strategems devised by leaders who in turn are followers of aliens sworn to weaken and destroy your industries and all your Nation's power.

Men forfeit leisures, plant new gardens, only when assured they may possess the yield, assured it will not go by force to wasteful purposes of men who neither plow nor plant.

The dust of honored graves stirs restlessly these fateful hours as troubled spirits rise to warn that there is time, but none to spare.

So dedicate today your every strength responsive to each neighbor's call for help against the creeping curse of communistic larcenists.

And as you gird give thanks again, in soberness and prayer, that others gone before you fortified your freedom with traditions strong, to help you guard your liberty if but follow their clear light.

Would you be likewise thanked by grateful children who some day must shoulder all your burdens and plod on?

Then make you double sure that you turn back at once those lustful men who would persuade you now again to close your eyes while they, by cunning, rob you of the things for which your fathers fought, that you might have your chance to keep your children free.

Why learn from alien tyranny too late what your departed freedom meant to you?

Why feel, some early day, the lasting scorn of children now your friends?

Would you have children know you missed your chance to pass along to them that freedom your more thoughful fathers did not fail to pass to you?

Take one long look deep into a youngster's eager eyes before you seal his fate.

Then pledge to him your faith, your high resolve, to live and act American!

Taxpayers Are To Foot More of the Bill for Truman's Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Chicago Tribune of August 1. The editorial follows:

SMOKE SCREEN

A day after Mr. Truman had dressed down Congress because his party's policies had made prices high and housing expensive, his Attorney General, Tom Clark, announced that the Antitrust Division had started a crusade against collusive action on food, clothing, and housing prices. Three new field offices are being established for this purpose and eight existing offices are being enlarged.

This means that the taxpayers are to foot more of the bill for Truman's campaign. The party war chest is in sickly condition and part of the trick of compelling the taxpayers to finance the campaign consisted of calling back Congress for an expensive extra session so that the New Dealers may use it as a sounding board and whipping boy. Now the public is to pay for more bureaucrats and more branch campaign headquarters to put on a propaganda campaign to represent prices as the product of a sinister plot.

You can lay to it that Republicans will be found at the bottom of any villainy the New Deal publicity foundry can invent.

If Mr. Clark wants to find out why prices are high, all he has to do is to review the whole course of New Deal domestic policy since Mr. Roosevelt started out to cheapen the dollar, plow up crops, and kill pigs to raise prices. He will, in this investigation, come upon the war and discover the dimensions of the New Deal debt. He will also note the postwar program of huge military expenditures and appropriations for foreign aid. Added together, all of these have produced enormous purchasing power without a matching volume of goods—what is called inflation.

Since the discovery of these economic facts of life would not assist the Truman campaign, Clark will naturally direct his search in other directions. We note that one of his new field offices is to be at Kansas City, Kans., bordering on its larger Missouri neighbor. While he is in the vicinity he might investigate who blew the courthouse safe and stole the evidence in the 1946 Democratic primary vote frauds, perpetrated by Truman's pals in the Pendergast machine. That way something useful might materialize, though, in view of Clark's record, we are not raising our expectations too high.

Draft Repeal or Totalitarianism?

OF
HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, when the President recommended and urged enactment of the draft law, he wanted that law either because of the imminence of war or because he desired to expand his own powers as Commander in Chief of the armed forces in peacetime. Congress has granted this extension of the President's power by the enactment of the draft law, effective for 2 years, because of the imminence of war if I judged the debate correctly. During the debate on the draft bill, I contended that the lust for power and the recommendations of military leaders in their ambition for power lay back of the hue and cry for the draft, because the total lack of development of every other phase of preparedness belied the imminence of war.

Subsequent developments uphold my view of the true motive of the proponents of the draft. I listened closely to the President's address before the special session of Congress July 27 and I have read his address carefully. The only preparedness item mentioned by the President was UMT and that was mentioned only incidentally. UMT is a long range preparedness policy and not a policy designed to meet an immediate war emergency.

Adequate stock piles of strategic and critical materials, a healthy mining industry in America, the maintenance and preservation of a balanced supply of weapons and ammunition, and the dispersion and distribution of industrial development away from a few highly concentrated areas have been ignored by the President, and yet our total lack of preparedness in those fields will cause untold and unnecessary death and destruction in any future war. The special session of Congress is rapidly drawing to a close and still no message or appeal has come from President Truman or the Army, Navy, and air services for building these essential defenses. Either President Truman and his administration are grossly derelict in their duty to build these defenses if war is imminent or they stand convicted of desiring the draft only for the extension of their power over the citizens of our own land. Congress was persuaded to approve the draft because of the threat or the imminence of war whereas the true purpose of the President and other proponents of the draft was the increase of the powers of the President and the military leaders in peacetime. This concentration of power is a serious threat to the principles that made our Nation great and is a real surrender by Congress to a dangerous trend. Extension of the President's power was specifically withheld from him by our Constitution. At the earliest possible date, Congress should therefore repeal the draft law and place the armed services and the President back in their proper role as servants of the people before we drift step by step into totalitarianism and the complete subjugation of the individual citizens to the power and direction of the Federal Government.

Amendments of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, it has consistently been my position that, although I do not favor the repeal of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, I recognize that in practice, from time to time, it will be evident that various amendments should be enacted.

Last July, for instance, I introduced H. R. 4419, designed to except from the prohibitions and penalties contained in that part of the law governing political expenditures, any outlays made either by a corporation or a labor organization in connection with the publication or distribution of a newspaper or news magazine, regularly published at stated intervals, not less frequently than monthly. The purpose of this provision was primarily to insure that no legitimate labor newspaper should be interfered with in any way in the presentation of its editorial views regarding issues or candidates for public office. I am sure that there is much support for this legislation, which I am hopeful will receive favorable consideration in the next Congress.

Another situation has been brought to my attention which I consider most unfortunate. An impression seems to have been raised in the minds of some union members that the requirement for the filing of a non-Communist affidavit by the officers of labor organizations, in order to obtain representation in proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board is, in some way, a reflection upon these members. In other words, while the vast body of patriotic working men and women in this country have no objection, indeed, vigorously endorse the idea that their labor unions should be completely free from domination by subversive elements, some of them have raised the question, perhaps with justification, why the same requirement was not exacted from an employer before he was permitted to use the facilities of the Board.

This argument has impressed me. Certainly it was far removed from my thoughts in voting for this measure, by any implication or stretch of the imagination, to infer that there was any distinction in patriotism or loyalty to our country between employers and employees. The vast body of both groups render their allegiance only to the flag of our country. Unfortunately, in both groups also are to be found a tiny minority who, through lack of appreciation of the blessings of our American way of life, or from even more sinister motives, have elected to align themselves with those elements which seek to destroy us.

In order that there may be no possibility that any invidious distinction be drawn in this respect, I have today introduced a bill to make applicable to the employer the same provisions of the law relating to the filing of a non-Communist affidavit which now apply to a labor organization, as the representative of its employee members.

I realize that the shortness of the present special session will not make possible any action on this bill in this Congress. It is my hope, however, that its introduction may serve to focus the attention of the joint Senate-House committee upon this problem to the end that early action may be taken in the next Congress.

There are other respects in which I feel sure the study of this committee will result in the conviction that changes should be made. One in particular seems to me to be the provision which requires, in all cases, the holding of an election as a condition to the making of an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment.

It seems to be unnecessary to hold elections in all of those cases where the result is a foregone conclusion. It simply puts employers, employees, and their union representatives to a great deal of unnecessary trouble and the Government to a substantial expense. I am impressed with the argument of those who contend that a labor organization, once selected to represent the employees of a plant, should continue to do so until a majority of those employees have indicated, by appropriate action, that they wish to have such authority rescinded.

I am hopeful that legislation to improve this situation will also receive early and favorable action at the next session.

The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 has served to reduce substantially the loss in man-hours through work stoppages and has given to the working men and women a greater voice in the affairs of their own organizations. It has greatly benefited the employee, the employer, and the consuming public. We should, however, stand ready and eager at all times to lend an attentive and sympathetic ear to those who may urge specific and constructive suggestions to improve this legislation and make possible the complete fulfillment of its desirable objectives.

Black Canyon Irrigation Project, Idaho

OF
HON. JOHN SANBORN
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, so many instances have come to my attention where the present departments of Government have misused the administration of their offices and have put out false propaganda for political effect that I would like to call your attention to a specific instance which is being perpetrated in the State of Idaho.

I believe the letters and clipping will reveal the story. I received 57 protesting letters and I am including 3 of them together with my reply. I am also including a clipping and letter from the editor of the local paper together with my reply:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SANBORN: On returning from the service I purchased a piece of land near Middleton, Idaho, under the Black Canyon pump unit of the Boise irrigation district, with the understanding there was water for it. I put down a well and started a dwelling. This drained my bank account pretty low. Now, to my disappointment, there's no water. My rent expires here this fall. I will be forced to move to this dry land. It will be pretty hard to make a living for my family of seven without water. I have $7,000 worth of machinery which will also stand unused.

Will you please give the restoration of the $175,000 for the lateral system all your consideration. We are counting on you.

Yours very truly.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SANBORN: We are writing you in regard to the Black Canyon pumping unit. We understand that if Congress does not grant us the $175,000 appropriation that we have previously asked for, we wouldn't be able to get water for a long time.

We are one out of at least 100 families that are planning on making our home in this unit north of Middleton and unless we get water on this land soon, we will be unable to continue, as we have invested about all of our life savings in this land. We have now a nice well, couple of new buildings, a nice dairy herd and all the land is levelled ready for water and we must soon realize an income off of this land if we are to continue.

We will be very grateful to you as our Congressman to get us this appropriation.

Sincerely yours.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SANBORN: Our secretary of the Black Canyon Settlers Association called a meeting last evening to inform us that we would not have water for irrigation in 1949, which was a blow to us settlers.

Mr. Adams, the reclamation engineer, was present and explained that the House of Representatives had failed to appropriate the amount of money to finish the lateral work, which would be $175,000 or more.

Most of the land has people living on it now, with all they have in money tied up in improvements and have the ground plowed and ready for the 1949 crop. Some have dairy herds and no chance to raise feed for them, which will force them to sell their cattle and in many cases leave their homes, and seek employment if they can find it.

As for our condition, we bought a man's right to 80 acres last fall. Said land was State land and we have a sales certificate from the State land department with so much to pay each year. How can we meet the payment without water? We have had a well drilled, 200 feet deep, which cost us $1,275. We have the land ready for the 1949 crop, have buildings on it, have spent about $2,500 hard-earned cash on the land.

I went to the reclamation office before I bought the land to see when we would have water, and they told us to make our plans for water early in 1949. Now here we are and as it now stands, no hopes for water.

I am 69 and my wife 67. My mother is with us and she is 87. Our cash is tied up in a dry farm with a yearly payment to meet. Yes, we can take the old-age pension, but (not for us) we have never called for help. All we ask for is a chance to help ourselves. Give us water and we will do the rest. Please help us with water so we can help ourselves.

We are in one of the garden spots of the United States and with water nothing in the agricultural line is impossible here, but we must have water. Will you please use your greatest influence in our behalf.

We most sincerely thank you.

Respectfully.

DEAR SIR: The letters that I have received from you and others on the Black Canyon irrigation district are indeed distressing. Such a condition should never arise. I have pioneered on irrigated land ahead of the water and know what it means to stake everything on the assurance that water will be on hand in the coming spring. I can fully appreciate your consternation when the bureau notified you that because the Congress cut the appropriation by $175,000 you are going to be left high and dry for another year after they had assured you that you could count on water next spring. To me it is an outrageous, unthinkable thing that Mike Straus and the Bureau and the Interior Department would play politics with your situation regardless of the suffering they may cause you by so doing. They are so intent on fastening the tentacles of their growing Federal power monopoly on our economy that they have lost interest in reclamation unless they can use it to promote their power program.

They have promoted through the Budget Bureau a request that this special session appropriate $56,000,000 additional money but it is all for power development. They were telling you that your laterals could not be built because Congress had cut the appropriation by $175,000 but they were not concerned enough about you to include the story of your plight in their request and ask for your relief. There was not a word about it. They have said nothing to Congress about it. You surely must wonder why.

Congress, in the last regular session made two appropriations for the Payette division of the Boise project, one of $800,000 in the spring as an emergency appropriation to give a group of settlers water in 1948. This appropriation was necessary and granted in full by Congress because the Bureau had made a previous miscalculation. The other appropriation was for $1,525,000, making a grand total of $2,325,000. That included your district as well as the Cascade Dam and so forth. The request for the last appropriation had been for $1,700,000. The difference is $175,000. That is where that sum comes into the picture. This Congress has appropriated a great deal more for reclamation than any previous Congress. However, in an effort to get the Bureau to render better dollar value and to reduce their over-staffing to more efficient numbers, budget requests were trimmed generally but in no case enough to create a condition such as yours.

It is impossible for Congress to appropriate such sums as this $1,525,000 in such a way as to designate in every little detail how it must be spent. Congress must depend on the cooperation and honesty of the Bureau in carrying out its intentions. If they go all out for politics instead, this is what you get.

It is my understanding that there is no reason why the cut of $175,000 should fall on you other than the whim of the administrators of this fund to have you rise in indignant protest against a Republican Congress. There are other places on the project where a possible delay caused by the lack of this $175,000 would not be important but that would not hurt you and would not create the proper reaction.

Your able Congressman ABE MCGREGOR GOFF has done a wonderful job in promoting your interests under difficult conditions and so has your conscientious, hard-working Senator HENRY C. DWORSHAK. I am proud to work with them. I am joining them in demanding that Mr. Straus and his bureau stop playing politics with you, but, instead, use the money appropriated by Congress for this project in such a way that he can take care of you as the Bureau has promised. Congress intended that this appropriation would be used where it would help most. The Bureau has the money. We will do our best to see that you do not suffer.

Some members of the Committee on Interior Appropriations are planning to visit your district about September 7. I hope to be with them.

Very truly yours,

JOHN SANBORN.

[From the Boise Valley Herald, of Middleton, Idaho]

A hundred and twenty-five Black Canyon settlers filled the Sand Hollow community hall last night to remonstrate with Congress over the delay in providing the final $175,000 for the completion of their already much too long delayed irrigation project. The part of the project affected by this spirit of congressional crawfishin' economy, lies north and northeast of Middleton. It comprises 100 farm units. The trunk-line ditches are ready for the water; and provisions have already been made for financing the construction of the wasteways and the contract has been let, we understand for this construction.

Unless the $175,000 is allowed on or before August 5, the very vital lateral-system part of the project will be in default and the long-awaiting settlers will not be able to proceed with their work for next year's crops.

The last night meeting passed a resolution petitioning Congress to correct its error it made in its effort to economize, and replace the amount once promised, but now held in abeyance, so that the settlers can go forward with their work.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SANBORN: I assume that you are aware that the United States Government entered into a contract with what we know locally as the Black Canyon irrigation district to construct its project for the purpose of supplying water for crop-growing within the limits of its metes and bounds. I assume you are aware that the settlers, as their part of fulfilling that contract, have had to plan ahead (for years ahead) and be in readiness to apply themselves and their working resources to the limit of their economic ability as well as their physical ability, and that by far the major part of that planning—which in most cases is for the balance of their life expectancy—is predicated on that contract in which the United States Government pledges its honor and its credit to fulfill.

I assume, Congressman SANBORN, that you accept the premise that when a contract is entered into relative to any project that the obligations apply to the project as a unit, a whole, and not merely to a part or a fraction of the whole.

Whether or not there was a time limit set for the completion of the project, it was a reasonable and prudent assumption that the completion of the secondary or minor part of the work would proceed with the same directness that had been given to its primary or trunk-line part, and that it devolved upon the settlers to lay their plans and order their work accordingly.

The above observations being obvious, it seems to me equally obvious that it is the duty of every Congressman to do all he can do to see to it that the Government proceeds to fulfill its part of the Black Canyon project.

Respectfully,

PUBLISHER, BOISE VALLEY HERALD.

DEAR SIR: I have read your letter and enclosed clipping regarding the remonstrance meeting. Obviously you took the representations of the Bureau at face value, which you should have been able to do. However, in this case it was a gross misrepresentation and caused you to blame a Congress that had been much more generous with reclamation than any previous Congress. It was a little regrettable to speak of "this spirit of congressional crawfishin' economy." This Congress, in its two regular sessions, appropriated $3,222,000 for this project alone. It was the Bureau and not Congress that decided to withhold funds from this particular work and to use this budget cut of $175,000 as an excuse in order to enflame the people against a Republican Congress. You can see what an impression they can make if the facts are not known.

This is not the only instance where they are guilty of doing this. Politics has no place in such a spot and especially so when it involves resultant hardship and suffering. It should not be condoned under any circumstances.

I am enclosing a copy of a letter that I have sent out to those who have appealed to me for help. I believe the settlers will be provided with this development.

Very truly yours,

JOHN SANBORN.

Commander Krum Appraises Work of Eightieth Congress for Veterans

---

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by Commander Tyrrell Krum, Times-Herald veterans' editor, in which he credits the Eightieth Congress with doing a great job for the veterans of this country:

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

(By Tyrrell Krum, lieutenant commander, U. S. Naval Reserve, retired)

One of these fine days the Eightieth Congress of the United States will wind up its affairs once and for all and set sail for home. There, for the ensuing months, a big majority of the Members will be concentrated on getting themselves reelected.

The Eightieth Congress did a great job on behalf of our grand army of war veterans, and one which will go down in the history of veterans' affairs. There wasn't—I hasten to explain—very much done in the way of new legislation, but there was a great deal of straightening out of details of vital features voted in the past.

In this, we are glad and proud to have played a role. We fought consistently for the increase in GI educational subsistence. We exposed the facts behind the slashing of GI job-training wages-plus subsistence ceilings which caused so much despair and depression among veterans and their families everywhere.

And it was on our direct petitioning to Congress that the ceilings were raised again and the total subsistence paid students was increased.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Eightieth Congress shows what was done, and it is something of which one can be proud.

We also fought for the increases in the disability pensions paid men and women who returned from war service ill in health and mind from their wartime experiences. And we fought for the recent increases in death compensation paid widows and orphans and dependent parents of men who failed to come back from war or who died from the effects of their wartime service.

Now, where does the Congress go from here? That is, what will be their job when the next Congress comes to town?

I have some very definite thoughts on this matter which I offer to the old Congress while it's still here. At least, it's something which might well be drawn into the minds of those who will be coming back.

In the first place, we must remember that the time is getting around when we are nearing the end of the so-called readjustment period following World War II. The GI bill was purely a readjustment measure. In fact—even though it is repetitious to write the word again—the GI bill is officially known in the lawbooks as the "Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944."

It is fairly easy to figure out that the GI bill—passed exactly 4 years ago—is now well along the way to have done the major share of its job. And—in spite of the handicaps set up by the Veterans' Administration—the bill has worked out pretty well.

But how long are we going to have a readjustment period and when and where will we begin to cut back to normal times again?

I think that the whole subject of the veterans' readjustment should become the No. 1 item for congressional consideration when the new session gets under way. Veterans' benefits—plus administrative cost for operating the VA—run in the neighborhood of eight billion dollars a year.

That, my friends, is just about one-fourth of our national annual budget.

We should go over the whole thing carefully. We should examine into the entire set-up at the Veterans' Administration. We should take up veterans' affairs as a major point of interest and a first-line item of national interest.

The war is far behind us. But we still have a great responsibility. We must not continue veterans' benefits which clearly are outmoded and a burden on the taxpayers. We must fight with all our force for those veterans' benefits which should be carried on.

We hope that the people of this country will send a lot of veterans to Congress this coming session. Because they—only those men and women who have been in the uniform of their country—really know the veterans' problem. Only a veteran knows how a veteran's mind operates.

It is just good common sense that only veterans can do the job—both on behalf of veterans and on behalf of the taxpayer. There must be kept a balance of interest between the two.

Because the veterans' affairs picture in this country is the biggest thing we have before us, especially when we still face the danger of a war which might come at any time or may be dodged for a long time to come.

Democrats Fail To Pin High Prices on GOP

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the attached article from the New York Sun, Thursday, July 22, 1948, entitled "Democrats Fail To Pin High Prices on GOP":

DEMOCRATS FAIL TO PIN HIGH PRICES ON GOP—UNITED STATES STATISTICS SHOW RISE WAS FAR GREATER UNDER DEMOCRATIC REGIME THAN SINCE REPUBLICAN CONGRESS TOOK OVER

(By Phelps Adams)

Democratic attempts to blame the Republican Congress for present-day high prices ran afoul of the facts today as Republicans prepared to air the issue thoroughly on the floors of the Senate and the House during the special session which begins next Monday.

While the Democratic platform adopted at Philadelphia last week declares that "the Republican Eightieth Congress is directly responsible for the existing and ever-increasing high cost of living," the records of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor appear to refute the statement.

According to these records, the cost-of-living index stood at 97.6 at the end of 1932, when the Democratic administration came into control of both branches of the Federal Government. Fourteen years later, when the Republican Congress took over in January, 1947, the BLS index stood at 153.3. Under the Democrats the cost of living had risen 57 percent.

Since Republican control of Congress began, the cost-of-living index has mounted to 170.5—a rise of 11 percent in prices under the Republicans. Thus, living costs went up five times as far under the Democrats as they have since the Republicans came into power on Capitol Hill.

BLUNDER BY TRUMAN

Especially embarrassing to the Democrats as they face this major issue of the Presidential campaign, is the blunder which President Truman made in the course of his acceptance speech at Philadelphia. Declaring that special privilege had controlled the Republican Party ever since its inception, and that this was concretely proved in the Eightieth Congress, he proceeded to examine some of the sins of omission and commission in the record of that Congress, choosing price control as the first target for his attack.

"Time and time again," he said, "I recommended the extension of price control before it expired on June 30, 1946. I asked for that extension in 1946. That price-control legislation didn't come to my desk until June 30, 1946, on the day on which it was supposed to expire, and it was such a rotten bill that I couldn't sign it.

"Thirty days after that they sent me one that was just as bad, and I had to sign it because they quit and went home."

The delegates cheered, delighted that the President had really pinned it on the Republican Eightieth Congress. The only catch in it was, of course, that the Eightieth Congress had not yet come into office, and had not, in fact, even been elected at that time.

WAS DEMOCRATIC CONGRESS

The Congress which did all these horrible things about which Mr. Truman protested was the Seventy-ninth. It was not a Republican Congress. It was controlled by the Democrats, who held substantial majorities in both Houses.

It was this Seventy-ninth Congress which wrote into the bill the provision denying the OPA the right to force anyone to sell a product at a loss, and it was this provision which made the bill so rotten in the President's eyes that he vetoed it.

It was the President's veto of that bill, of course, which wiped out the OPA and all price controls instantly, without any advance preparation and without warning. When the new "just-as-bad" law was passed 30 days later by the same Democratic Congress, the OPA was restored to power, but the President was given the right to end meat and other price controls at his pleasure.

Just before election day, in November 1946, the White House was besieged by telegrams from Democratic candidates demanding that meat controls be lifted and warning that the Democrats would be defeated if this were not done. Yielding too late to these pleas from the members of his own party, the President—not the Republicans—did abolish meat controls by Executive order despite the fact that at a press conference only a few days earlier he had said flatly that he would not do so. Later, just after election, he abolished all remaining price and wage controls except on rice, sugar, and rents, and although he had the power, under the law, to reimpose them at any time up to June 30, 1947, he never did so.

OFFERS NOVEL THEORY

Riding in the dining car of a Washington-bound train after the adjournment of the Democratic Convention in Philadelphia, last week, a Democratic Senator who has fought many a battle for the administration was discussing the price-control issue in tones loud enough to be heard several tables away.

To all those within his hearing he advanced the opinion that the real truth of the matter is that the American people themselves abolished price controls, because they simply would not tolerate an OPA, with its attendant black markets, in peacetimes, any more than they would tolerate prohibition with its attendant bootlegging.

Probably the Senator came as close to the truth as anyone ever will in the course of the furious congressional debate that will be heard on this issue as the session progresses.

Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent to everyone that the old law of supply and demand is not working during these critical days. Prices keep on going higher and higher—until they are beyond the reach of the average consumer. They seem to be pyramiding upward often with no relation to the normal laws of economics. This means, Mr. Speaker, that there is much speculation in this country—speculation in the commodity markets and among the groups which ordinarily take advantage of the unwary and careless buyer.

The housewife is having a difficult time. The wage earner is having a more difficult time. Food, clothing, and housing has reached an all-time high, according to the figures of the Department of Agriculture released this week. Price of everything needed to sustain body and soul has increased to the point that the small man is reaching the end of his rope.

Much of this increase is, in my judgment, due to speculation. I believe more speculation is going on in this country today than occurred immediately prior to the historic market crash of 1929. Profits of certain corporations are unconscionable. Each day records figures which make all-time records in corporate profits. The consumer is paying the bill, and is paying in profits which reach record proportions.

In the meantime people are digging into their savings. They are reducing their diets; and if this continues, of course, the amount of work they can do will be reduced accordingly. It will serve no useful purpose to place the blame on one cause or another. What we must do is to bring the balloon prices back in line. We must make our dollars count.

Housing Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, the housing situation in the United States is a national disgrace. Three million families are living doubled up with relatives and friends due to the housing shortage; nearly 50 percent of these homeless families belong to veterans of World War II. It has been estimated that 40 percent of all city homes and two-thirds of all farm dwellings are substandard. America needs a constructive housing program to eliminate the immediate housing shortage, and meet our long-term housing requirements. The Taft-Ellender-Wagner Housing bill, with its provisions to build 15,000,000 new homes during the next 10 years, would establish such a program, and is the only logical answer to the housing problem.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the August 3, 1948, edition of the Philadelphia Inquirer, and which urges the passage of the TEW housing bill:

CONGRESS SHOULD PASS HOUSING BILL

It would be folly to expect Congress, in the short space of the present special session, to give consideration to all the problems touched upon by President Truman's hodgepodge program. There is simply no time for the study that would be required.

One subject, however, is an outstanding exception. That is housing.

This problem has been already exhaustively investigated by both Houses of Congress. At least three congressional committees have conducted full-scale hearings on housing relief, and one committee traveled all over the country studying the subject.

There is surely not one aspect of housing needs that has not been examined in Washington. The conclusions reached by various experts in the field have gone into the makeup of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill to promote low-cost housing.

The Senate has already passed the bill. It is locked up in the House Committee on Banking and Currency, and there are many indications that the House would promptly approve it if the committee would only release it.

There is no excuse for adjourning the present session without favorable action on the Taft-Ellender-Wagner law. On many other proposals before Congress the Members can find reason for doing nothing at this time.

But they will not be able to convince the people that they are doing the right thing by killing off housing relief.

Too many persons have suffered acutely by reason of the housing shortage and the high prices of available houses and apartments to shrug away this subject.

One of the greatest double-crosses of our times has been perpetrated upon the American people in the matter of housing relief.

There is hardly a politician, from President on down, who has not promised to do something, since the day the war ended, to solve the housing problem. The problem is as unsolved as ever.

The Truman administration has mangled the subject of housing relief. It has periodically promised the construction of millions of homes and has gone through the motions of appointing housing commissions and expediters, but those millions of homes remain unbuilt.

Unable to work out anything on its own, the administration has all but washed its hands of the problem and turned it over to Congress. That body has had an exceptional opportunity to demonstrate its determination to accomplish something where the President failed, by pushing to passage the Taft-Ellender-Wagner law.

Opponents of Government-stimulated low-cost housing, however, spearheaded by an indefatigable real-estate lobby, have managed thus far to keep that law from passage.

The results are visible on all sides, in the continuing scarcity of homes, particularly in the low-cost field. Veterans who returned to the accompainment of promises that homes would be found for them are still living doubled up in houses other than their own. Rental dwellings are almost impossible to locate in many sections and home seekers are frequently compelled to buy houses priced above their means, simply because they have no other choice.

Favorite argument of the real-estate lobby in opposing the TEW bill was to the effect that the housing problem would solve itself, without Government aid. But it has not worked out that way.

So it is now objected that the housing bill would be "inflationary," which is a fashionable term for almost anything that is disliked. If this objection is valid it would hold against virtually every public improvement, too, and we might find highway and sewer construction labeled inflationary.

The Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill would help thousands of families to obtain decent homes at moderate cost. It is urgently needed. It could be passed quickly, without any further debate. The Republican majority in the House will be making a grave mistake—a political mistake—if it permits this bill to die.

International Airport or Whistle Stop?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been deeply concerned for a long time with the problem of securing direct air service to the Hawaiian Islands from the Pacific Northwest. I appeared before the Commission at the hearings held in Portland, Oreg., in my district, last year, urging that this certificate be issued. I am glad that the Northwest Airlines has been granted a 5-year certificate for direct service, for which we have been fighting.

Portland is the hub of my congressional district and is the air terminal for the Pacific Northwest. It has a direct air route through the Columbia River gorge east and is the only large city in the Northwest so favored. Immediate steps should be taken to make certain that it will have coterminal status in this new air line route. If facilities are not already available in the Portland airport to permit its use for the large type planes such as the DC–6's it should be made so without delay.

I include as a part of my remarks the following editorial from the Portland Journal in its issue for August 3 entitled "International Airport or Whistle Stop?":

INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT OR WHISTLE STOP?

Now that Northwest Airlines has been granted a 5-year certificate for direct service to Hawaii from the Pacific Northwest, the question of Portland's coterminal status arises.

Fear is expressed in some quarters that Portland municipal airport cannot attain coterminal status, because its 5,500-foot main runway can't handle the heavy four-motored equipment necessary for the 2,400-mile hop.

This fear is well-founded, insofar as the new DC-6's and Boeing Stratocruisers are concerned. The former is now certified by the Civil Aeronautics Administration for 6,900-foot runways, with a gross load of 93,000 pounds and standard weather conditions. The latter can use 6,000-foot runways with a gross load of 140,000 pounds. It would therefore be necessary for either of these types to reduce their pay loads in order to use Portland Airport and comply with CAA regulations.

The DC-4, with which Northwest Airlines expects to start its new Hawaiian service, is something else again. Matson ran nonscheduled experimental flights to Hawaii from Portland with its DC-4's, and had no trouble, finding the 5,500-foot runway adequate for gross loads of 74,000 pounds.

So the answer seems to be that Portland Municipal Airport will be handicaped, rather than eliminated from coterminal status—until it lengthens and/or parallels its existing runways.

The port of Portland is fully aware of this situation. And it is seriously considering extension of the main northwest-southeast runway or construction of a longer parallel runway.

The point that should be driven home now is that these improvements should be taken out of the serious-consideration stage and started immediately. And while the port authorities are at it they should start right now on engineering studies designed to provide Portland with an alternate flood-free airport capable of handling heavy transports.

Portland has won a long, hard fight for international air terminal status. It would be inexcusable to endanger or limit that status by failure to provide the airport facilities to handle the new overseas equipment—particularly when Federal aid can be had.

There isn't much time. Northwest Airlines, which already serves the Orient from Seattle and Minneapolis, via Alaska and the Aleutians, will start its Hawaiian service with DC-4's in 60 to 90 days. But it will receive delivery of the first of 10 new Stratocruisers shortly after the first of the year. Portland should be ready to accommodate them.

And that suggests another project for the Portland Chamber of Commerce.

Why not go after a Portland leg of Northwest Airlines' existing service to the Orient? Northwest has four flights to the Orient each week, originating in Seattle. All, or part, of them should originate in Portland.

Portland can be a real international airport or a whistle stop. It's up to us.

Summary of Legislation Passed by the Republican Eightieth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am including herein a summary of some of the important legislation passed by the Eightieth Congress.

Certain people seemingly are very desirous of showing that the Eightieth Congress did not pass any constructive legislation worth while. The record shows, however, that the Eightieth Congress was one of the most constructive Congresses in recent years, and that the legislation passed in that Congress was of vital importance to the American people. I desire to give a brief summary of some of the legislation enacted by this Congress. Space will not permit, however, of my enumerating all of the important legislation which was passed. I shall itemize a few of the laws passed by the Eightieth Congress:

First. Public debt: The Eightieth Congress reduced the national debt by $7,000,000,000.

Second. Budgets: It reduced the Presidential budgets by more than $6,000,000,000, thus eliminating many unnecessary proposed appropriations.

Third. Balanced Federal budget: The Federal Treasury, for the first time in 16 years, is using black ink instead of red, and is no longer resorting to inflationary deficit spending. Fiscal 1948 ended with the biggest Treasury surplus in all history—$8,400,000,000, seven times the previous high established 21 years ago.

Fourth. Cut taxes: The Eightieth Congress reduced taxes $4,800,000,000, despite three presidential vetoes, with 71 percent of the tax relief going to those with incomes under $5,000. Seven million four hundred thousand earners in the lowest brackets were removed from the tax roll; married couples were allowed to divide their income for tax purposes, and special relief was provided for persons over 65 years and for the blind.

Fifth. Aid to foreign nations: The Eightieth Congress appropriated $9,500,000,000 for relief to impoverished humanity in foreign countries, to help reestablish their national economies and to restrain Communist aggression; created an Economic Cooperative Administration to administer foreign aid. For the first time, therefore, the American taxpayer will be furnished an accounting of our expenditures abroad. Heretofore, no accounting was provided the American people. Senator VANDENBERG, who has been vitally interested in the United Nations Organization, states that our foreign-aid program is of vital importance to the perpetuity of the United Nations Organization with its hope of lasting peace.

Sixth. Freed competitive enterprise: The Eightieth Congress liberated the people from 76,000 rules, regulations, directives, and orders, thereby releasing the energy and the capacity of the people, with resulting all-time highs in employment, production, profits, and wages, and a record $200,000,000,000 annual national income.

Seventh. Exposed Communists: The Eightieth Congress has accomplished a great deal in the elimination of Communists from the Federal Government. The recent committee hearings in Washington, both by the Un-American committee and the Senator Ferguson committee, shows the wisdom of Congress in its anti-Communist attack. Testimony to the two committees mentioned above clearly discloses that several high Government officials in confidential positions were acting as spies for certain European countries.

Eighth. Strengthened national defense: The Eightieth Congress rescued our disintegrating National Military Establishment by unifying the armed services; by making cash appropriations and contract authorizations totaling $24,000,000,000. Special emphasis was placed upon the development and increase of our air power; by authorizing $178,000,000 for merchant marine expansion; and by revising Army justice in an effort to assure completely fair treatment under Army law for officers and enlisted men.

Ninth. Veterans' legislation: The Congress passed 188 bills meeting needs of war veterans, including increased compensation for disabled veterans with and without dependents; increased compensation for dependent survivors of war dead; increased subsistence payments to World War II veterans in institutional training; increased allowances for student GI's; increased proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training; provided higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans; and provided aids for veteran housing.

The Eightieth Congress also provided, under the Blackney terminal leave law, for cashing of GI terminal-leave bonds. The Blackney terminal leave bond bill, H. R. 4017, therefore became Public Law 254, Eightieth Congress. It now enables several million veterans who held more than 9,000,000 terminal-leave bonds, worth approximately $2,500,000,000, to cash the same, should they desire. In cashing these bonds the veterans received in cash the face value of the bond, plus accrued interest, which the banks of our country redeemed without any cost to the veteran. This bill was passed to alleviate the inequities previously existing affecting terminal-leave bonds, because under the old law the officers received their terminal leave in cash, but the enlisted men received 5-year nonnegotiable bonds. It was my judgment that if we could spend billions of dollars abroad, I could see no reason why we should not pay our debts to those veterans who so faithfully defended our country. The passage of this law and redeeming of the bonds will reduce the national debt and save the taxpayers of our country in excess of $60,000,000 in interest annually.

Tenth. Record home building: The Eightieth Congress freed the building industry of stifling rules, reguiations, and directives; stimulated construction through Government guaranties of building loans; had the Government assume a large part of responsibility for veterans loans. To show you the progress of building, in 1946 only 437,800 dwelling units were completed. In 1947, under the Eightieth Congress, 835,100 units were completed, and with the increased building occurring in 1948 a million dwelling units will be completed this year, the largest building boom of all time.

Eleventh. Helped farmers: The Eightieth Congress adopted a long-range agricultural program, pledging price support for maximum production of food; provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress; appropriated more than $500,000,000 for soil conservation; launched the greatest rural road-building program in history; fostered stability in agriculture through a new workable Crop Insurance Act; chartered Commodity Credit Corporation; and greatly expanded Government aid in campaigns against livestock foot-and-mouth disease, and crop deterrents, such as weeds, insects, and other pests.

Twelfth. Expanded social security: The Eightieth Congress passed, over Presidential veto, a bill increasing payments by $5 per month for the needy, aged, and the blind, and increasing payments by $3 per month for each dependent child, thereby adding $184,000,000 annually to social-security payments received by 3,500,000 needy dependent children, the aged, and the blind.

Thirteenth. National Heart Institute: The Eightieth Congress established a National Heart Institute within the United States Public Health Service, to fight America's No. 1 killer, diseases of the heart and circulation; provided $500,000 for the Research Institute, to combat these diseases which affect 1 person in 16, cause 1 out of every 3 deaths, and result in a loss of 152,000,000 working days a year.

Fourteenth. National Cancer Institute. The Eightieth Congress provided $28,400,000 for the study of the disease of cancer, and to disseminate knowledge on how to reduce its terrible toll in lives.

Fifteenth. Increased pay for postal and Federal employees: The Eightieth Congress gave to 478,000 postal workers a pay increase of $450 a year each, and to 840,000 civil-service employees an increase of $330 each; increased some postal rates as a partial offset to the $600,000,000 cost of the pay raise.

Sixteenth. Aided small business: The Eightieth Congress created special committees of the Senate and House of Representatives which are seeing that small businesses, the backbone of American industry, get a fair break, especially in the awarding of Government contracts for national defense and aid to foreign countries.

Seventeenth. Extended Reciprocal Trade Act: The Eightieth Congress extended for 1 year the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, with amendments requiring the President to report to Congress and the people when, in secretly making a trade agreement with a foreign country, he exceeds recommendations made by the United States Tariff Commission, pursuant to standards prescribed by Congress for protection of American industries and agriculture.

The Eightieth Congress passed hundreds of other measures that are benefiting every segment of our population and creating wholesome conditions for prosperity and happiness; measures aiding industries, agriculture, and mining; supplying long-needed banking legislation; strengthening the Federal Reserve Banks operation; reorganizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and in other ways making for a sound national program.

SPECIAL SESSION

The Eightieth Congress, now in special session, is making an intensive study of food prices and inflationary tendencies, and will pass a bill which, we hope, will alleviate many of the existing inequitable prices.

Also, the Congress is studying closely the housing problem in the hopes that they may be able to make provisions for increasing the already greatly increased housing program.

Conditions in Mental Hospitals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include herein at the request of my friend and constituent, Mrs. Estelle E. Marshall, of Leominster, Mass., the following brief statement on conditions in mental hospitals, taken from one of her recent letters to me:

I just heard an address on the subject of conditions in mental institutions wherein the speaker stated that he was positive that at least 10 percent of the people who were incarcerated in mental hospitals should be free. That statement agrees with the views of an outstanding doctor who believes that a much higher percentage should be free. That is surely a frightful situation and so wholly unnecesary in a land of not only freedom, but the most intelligent and wisest statesmen, philosophers, and able thinkers who need not succumb to any such tomfoolery, chicanery and plain stupidity, to say nothing of robbing the taxpayer of untold millions of dollars. However, as another doctor says, until the taxpayers refuse to pay the enormous sums required for heaping us pell-mell into these bedlams, the practice will continue.

Mrs. Marshall has been interested for some time in reforming conditions affecting mental hospitals throughout the country and at her request, I am privileged to submit her views.

Naval Aviation

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, in discussing air power, we often fail to depict the importance of the naval air arm as a necessary prerequisite to the achievement of air supremacy. While the air force was laying plans for the minimum peacetime air protection of the United States, which resulted in the proposed 70-group program, the Navy simultaneously developed a program of naval aviation which it deemed essential to carry out its missions. The Navy plan for aviation calls for a force of approximately 14,500 planes. In considering naval aviation the term 14,500-plane Navy is used. This is employed because the various components of the Navy must be expanded if we are to have the necessary support for the 14,500 planes.

Unfortunately the program for naval aviation has not been described as clearly, and the requirements for naval aviation are not as familiar to the country as the requirements for the 70-group air force. It must be borne in mind, however, that the plane program for the Navy is as important to ultimate achievement of air supremacy as the 70-group program. Without an efficient striking naval air arm, we cannot hope to attain complete control of the air. A 14,500-plane Navy has been approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the same basis as the 70-group program for the Air Force. Just as the 70-group program of 20,541 planes constitutes the number of aircraft to give the irreducible minimum air protection by the Air Force, so the 14,500-plane Navy will give the irreducible minimum air protection by the naval air arm. A total of 35,000 planes is all too small a number for the protection of the United States.

NAVAL PROGRAM ACCELERATED

Originally the Navy planned to realize its program of a 14,500-plane Navy over a period of 6 years. It was estimated that in 1954 the cost of such a Navy including aviation, would level off to approximately $8,000,000,000 a year. The appropriations until then were to be on a sliding scale.

Since the submission of the original naval budget for 1949, the world picture has become much worse. In view of the increasing international tension, the Navy has decided to bring into actual readiness for operation the 14,500 plane Navy as soon as possible rather than wait for a period of years for this achievement. It was determined that beginning in July 1948 the Navy would start to build up to a 14,500-plane inventory to be completed by July 1, 1949. In order to do so it is necessary to take out of storage 3,000 obsolescent aircraft. The Navy has the original structure and most of the personnel to implement a 14,500-plane Navy next year. It is imperative, however, to replace obsolescent aircraft with modern planes. Since this change in planning has become essential because of Soviet aggression, increased international tension, the general deterioration of world relations, and the necessity for national security, Congress—if it views realistically the disturbing international picture—must increase immediately the appropriations for the Navy. Much more money must be provided in the future than was authorized by the Congress for the current fiscal year.

MONEY VOTED FOR THE NAVY

In the bill acted upon by the House on April 15—this later became law—the money allotted to the Navy amounted to $903,000,000. One hundred and fifty million dollars of this is assigned for liquidation of obligations already consummated. Seven hundred and fifty-three million dollars in new funds were provided for contractual authorizations for new planes and related equipment. This amount of money is insufficient and much more should be made immediately available for procurement if the Navy is to realize a modern up-to-date 14,500-plane program. True, an inventory of 14,500 planes can be realized by July 1, 1949, but a large number of these aircraft will be obsolete.

NEW AIRCRAFT REQUIREMENTS

The financial requirements for new aircraft have greatly increased as a result of more complete and detailed cost break-downs. The original estimates for the development of a 14,500-plane Navy were far too low. More realistic schedules have been prepared for the annual deliveries necessary if the Navy is to achieve its program. The cost of planes has increased tremendously due to to the high prices of all materials.

For the current fiscal year 1949, approximately 1,093 planes are to be delivered to the Navy. The money for all but about 60 of these planes was authorized in the 1948 budget. In the budget estimates for the fiscal year 1949, provision was made for 1,050 planes to be delivered in 1950. The 1949 appropriation estimates, as approved by the House of Representatives on the 15th of April, and later agreed to by the Senate, contain $753,000,000 for the procurement of 1,535 new aircraft and related equipment in 1949 with deliveries in 1950. The actual appropriation for the construction of new aircraft is $738,700,000. The difference between this and the $753,000,000 is for pilotless aircraft, industrial mobilization, salaries, and so forth. Even this appropriation is not sufficient.

Authorization of procurement and delivery of planes should be as follows:

Authorization:
1951	3,810
1953	3,760
Deliveries:
1949	1,093
1951	3,622
1954	3,760

It is estimated that after the Naval Air Force is made modern by replacement of obsolete and over-age aircraft that an annual procurement level of about 3,300 aircraft will be required. Naval aircraft become obsolete every 5 years. According to the best figures available $1,970,000,000 will be required annually for procurement of the 3,300 naval planes necessary to replace the air force of the Navy every 5 years.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PROCUREMENT

In order to bring into existence the procurement program I have outlined, much money must be allotted for this purpose. Funds for the procurement or purchase of the required planes to be delivered during the four fiscal years beginning with 1950 are estimated as follows:

Fiscal year	Number aircraft	Cost
1949	1,535	$738,700,000
1950	3,810	2,346,000,000
1951	3,810	2,250,000,000

From the above we can readily see that if we are to achieve a 14,500 up-to-date plane Navy that it will be necessary to appropriate for the next fiscal year about three times as much as we have appropriated for the construction of new aircraft this year. We should have made a greater start in beginning to achieve the 14,500-plane Navy by increasing the 1949 budget procurement figures to $1,351,074,000 as was suggested. This would have been an increase of $598,074,000 above the $753,000,000 recently approved by the House. In other words, the Congress should have voted approximately an additional $600,000,000 for naval procurement to start the 14,500-plane Navy. Had we done this the aircraft procurement would have been increased for the current fiscal year by 1,467 planes or a total of 3,002. Since this was not done much more money will have to be appropriated in subsequent years if the Navy realizes its 14,500 modern plane Navy goal by 1953.

The total over-all appropriation for the Navy for 1949 was $4,817,000,000. This will have to be substantially increased in the years that are ahead. The best estimates available indicate that naval appropriations of $8,000,000,000 annually will be necessary when we finally achieve the 14,500-plane Navy and keep it up to date.

The figures I have given in the table above are for the construction of aircraft only. When the figure $738,700,000 is compared with the figures for 1950, 1951, 1952, and 1953, the comparison speaks eloquently for the necessity of immediate action to realize what is deemed the minimum naval air strength to carry out naval missions.

The following figures are estimates for the total naval air arm beginning with the fiscal year 1949 and ending in 1953. They include the construction of aircraft and related equipment, electronics and instruments, maintenance and operation, research and development, but exclude personnel and carriers:

Fiscal year—	Total
1950	3,443,749,400
1951	3,341,000,000
1952	3,361,000,000
1953	3,401,000,000

CONTROL OF THE AIR

I wish to state as forcibly as I know how that if we are to achieve United States air supremacy, we must have an air force equal to any air force or combination of air forces in the world. If we are to develop air power so that our voice can be heard and our will respected in the sections of the planet where there are American interests, then it is necessary to bring into being immediately the 70-group air force program and the 14,500-plane Navy.

Since in the event of another conflict, the first attack will come from the air, it necessarily follows that the defense must originate from the air. In all probability, Navy planes will strike first because they are on carriers which are mobile and can be brought within close proximity to any shore. When we have appropriated sufficient funds to provide 20,451 planes for the Air Force and to create a 14,500-plane Navy, we will have a striking force of approximately 35,000 planes. This is only the minimum air protection for the United States. It is not air supremacy. Should we be attacked, vast and immediate expansion would be necessary. With the 70-group program of the Air Force and the 14,500-plane Navy, we would have the basis on which to build air supremacy. We would have the starting point for winning the next war.

We must be realistic; first things must be placed first. Air power, overwhelming and invincible, must be created at all costs. A strong and all-powerful United States is the surest guaranty for the perpetuation of a society of free nations. By adopting and acting upon the principle of sufficient preparedness, by the appropriation of funds to carry out this purpose, and by insisting that the armed services achieve complete air supremacy, we will be able to win the long-protracted struggle in which we are engaged for the achievement of an enduring peace.

Henry Wallace: A Divided Mind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Henry Wallace: A Divided Mind," by Gardner Jackson, from the Atlantic magazine for August 1948.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HENRY WALLACE: A DIVIDED MIND

(By Gardner Jackson)

I

Less than a year after Henry A. Wallace was appointed Secretary of Agriculture one of his principal ghost writers told me he felt uncomfortable collaborating with the new Secretary. "He's unlike anyone with whom I've worked before," said this writer, who had been in the Department of Agriculture several years before Wallace took it over. "He gives me an eerie feeling that he really isn't listening when I talk with him. He may be listening with his brain, but certainly not with his guts. He doesn't seem to know how to have a belly laugh—least of all at himself. He gives me a strong impression of considering himself a man of destiny, a person answering calls the rest of us don't hear."

These remarks of the ghost writer throw light on Wallace's decision to embark upon his present campaign. Wallace obviously is pursuing what he deems to be his destiny. If this were not so, it is reasonably certain there would have been no third-party campaign—or new-party campaign, as he and his associates label it.

The central committee of the U. S. A. Communist Party at its October 1947 meeting could have laid its most devious and high-powered plans for the campaign. It could have been assured of ample supplies of money with which to retain skilled artificers of screen, radio, and print. All would have availed little had the "confused liberal" not seen his destiny along a road paralleling the one charted by the Communist high command. At best a campaign without Wallace—with a less well-known figure—would have been such a fizzle the newsprints would have relegated it to a few stickfuls in the back pages.

The campaign, then, is a Wallace-seeking-his-destiny campaign. It is not a Communist Party campaign, despite the closeness with which he has hewn to the Kremlin's party line and despite the number of party members and party-liners manning the machinery of the campaign. Wallace turned a deaf ear to many of his friends and former associates who pleaded with him not to take the step. But their earnest arguments were deflected by the Communist and other voices, both from outside and from within himself, which impel Wallace on.

Sir Willmott Lewis, emeritus Washington correspondent of the London Times, may have given a clue to the Wallace enigma in responding to a query on the campaign. "One of my British friends," Sir Willmott remarked, "commenced to declaim on what a singular fellow Wallace is. I quickly interrupted him. 'No, no!' I said. 'You're wrong. The trouble is he's plural.'" Trying to figure out which self of Wallace's plural nature is listening to what call has long been a Washington preoccupation.

Wallace brought to the New Deal Cabinet in 1933 a wide and practical agricultural experience in the rich corn-hog State of Iowa. He was steeped in the tradition of his grandfather and father, whose strong character and imaginative thinking helped so much to develop the State. He himself enhanced the family reputation by distinguished experiments in genetics—the best-known being that which resulted in a greatly improved hybrid seed corn. He also had contributed notable thinking on the social and economic problems of farming. Roosevelt had more than ample grounds for selecting Wallace on the basis of his accomplishments alone.

Wallace became a hero and symbol for liberals when they were working in the Government with him, when they were projecting their ideas into and through him—and when they were shielding his reputation from the tarnishing effects of his various sorties into the occult typified by the Roerich affair and his fascination with numerology and Navajo Indian medicine men. Only a handful of Wallace's former associates are with him in his present crusade. A majority of the others—though they are as deeply disturbed at the incredible mishandling of American foreign policy by the Truman administration as Wallace—have lost confidence in him.

Their loss of confidence is not based on fear of risking their jobs and salaries if they should go with Wallace—a charge he made publicly when asked why so few of his former colleagues are in his camp. This callous accusation reveals either a complete lack of feeling for past relationships, or the exaltation of martyrdom, which persuades him that every former friend who now opposes him is animated by base motives. I believe it is a combination of both.

II

The first considerable talk I had with Wallace concerned the fight a number of us in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration were making to keep the price of milk to the consumer within reason while increasing the income of the dairy farmer. The milk industry—National Dairy Products, Inc., its big processing and distributing members and affiliates in the major cities, and leaders of the milk marketing associations supplying those cities—bitterly resisted our efforts to hold margins down. Early in the fall of 1934 the leaders of the industry held a secret meeting in Philadelphia to perfect plans designed to eliminate from the AAA some of us active in the tussle, and to force Wallace out of the secretaryship if he wouldn't go along.

The plan was to supplant Wallace with Chester C. Davis, who was then Administrator and who had perceptibly cooled towards our program. Through a lawyer representing one of the big processors, I learned details of the meeting. I wrote Wallace a personal note apprising him of the designs being laid to get his scalp and the scalps of certain of his lieutenants. The next day he asked me to come to his office. I was at the time Assistant Consumers' Counsel and had violated strict administrative procedure by addressing a note personally to him. He sat silent gazing into the distance while I unfolded my warning.

When I finished he roused himself from his reverie and said, "I don't understand you—you and your friend Justice Brandeis. When you see something you think is wrong, you want to do something about it right away. You want to act quickly. I'm not like that. I'd rather sit under a tree and let the cycle of time help heal the situation." As he said this he made a circular motion with his right arm. Then he ended the conversation by adding, "I know in Rex [Tugwell] and Chester [Davis] I've got two ill-matched horses in harness together. I may have to let one of them go when we get a bit farther down the road. I can't tell now which it will be." Not a word from him evaluating the views of Tugwell and Davis—only a casual observation that he might have to make a political choice between them.

Approximately 6 months later he had made his decision. A number of us, including Jerome Frank, the AAA general counsel and an intimate of Tugwell's, were given peremptory dismissal notes by Administrator Davis. Davis did not dare dismiss Tugwell because of the latter's intimacy with Roosevelt. Tugwell was, however, transferred from the Department to head the newly established Resettlement Administration. A legal opinion by Frank supporting enforcement of more equitable distribution of benefit payments to sharecroppers in the cotton South was the pretext Davis used in addition to the milk controversy. Most of us couldn't believe that Wallace had sanctioned the action. Only 2 days before, he had upheld us in a long-drawn-out struggle with the Administrator over a basic principle; namely, that in all marketing agreements and codes entered into during the economic emergency, with the antitrust laws in abeyance, the Government should have the right to examine the books and record of the industry involved.

Late in the day of our dismissal Wallace sent word that he would see two of the people on the dismissal list. Jerome Frank and a member of his legal staff, Alger Hiss, were delegated for the interview. Wallace haltingly greeted them (and, through them, others on the list) as "the best fighters in a good cause" he had ever worked with. But he said that he had to fire them. Frank asked him why he hadn't talked it over with us beforehand as his friends and assistants instead of letting Davis wield the ax—we might not have agreed with his reasoning, but we would at least have seen how he arrived at the judgment. He replied that he just couldn't face us.

Despite this denial of normal human amenities between friends and coworkers—not to mention a sacrifice of principles for political expediency—many of us continued to back Wallace. We had put too much of ourselves into him to let go of him. We rejoiced in his nomination and election to the Vice Presidency. We did whatever we could to uphold his hand as chairman of the Board of Economic Warfare in the fundamental controversy with the head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Jesse Jones, over procurement and stock-piling policies on critical war materials. The leader of the BEW's side of that explosive fight was not Wallace. It was Milo Perkins, executive director of the BEW, whose vision and courage carried Wallace into actions he himself would not have taken.

Dismissed by Roosevelt from the BEW post—along with Jones—at the climax of that battle, Wallace took on more than ever, in the eyes of many liberals, the aspect of a crusading Galahad. But the machine politicians of the Democratic Party, who gagged when Roosevelt forced Wallace down their throats as Vice Presidential candidate in the 1940 convention, had by this time determined he was a political liability. With the approach of the 1944 convention it was clear they had persuaded the President of this also.

Nor were the machine politicians the only ones wanting to dump Wallace. It is ironic to recall that a couple of months before the convention C. B. Baldwin, Wallace's present campaign manager, was ready to throw Wallace overboard. Baldwin was then the executive vice chairman of the National Citizens Political Action Committee. Clark Foreman, Wallace's present campaign treasurer, and others active at the top levels of the NCPAC had come to the same conclusion. So had Sidney Hillman and some of his CIO-PAC assistants. Baldwin participated in a conference at the White House with Roosevelt to try to come to agreement on a substitute. Only because CIO President Philip Murray went to bat for Wallace with a crack down on Hillman, Baldwin, and the others was a serious division of forces behind Wallace averted. Because of Murray's action the demonstration that night at the Chicago 1944 convention came within a hair of nominating Wallace instead of Truman. It was prevented from doing so only by Convention Chairman Samuel D. Jackson's abrupt adjournment of the session.

I talked a number of times with Wallace during that convention. It was there, I believe, that he felt for the first time his developing power as a spellbinder. His speech to the convention was the best political speech he had ever made. He was no longer the diffident, inarticulate geneticist torn between his search for the truths of the natural sciences and his search for personal security in supernaturalism. He was well on the way to becoming a rabble-rouser drinking in the response of the crowd and learning how to elicit that response to satisfy his thirst—a complete metamorphosis of his outward self.

III

The next significant stage in Wallace's evolution into his present crusade was his acceptance of the consolation prize Roosevelt offered him, the Secretaryship of Commerce. When rumbles began in the Senate against his confirmation, particularly if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (renamed the Federal Loan Agency) remained in his domain as Secretary, he let it be known in high moral terms, to friend and foe, that he would not take the job unless it included the RFC. That multi-billion-dollar agency, first established by Herbert Hoover in a vain attempt to prevent the debacle of the speculative banking economy during the last years of his administration, was in Wallace's mind a potential instrument of major social amelioration and change. In the end, confronted with an adamant Senate, he accepted confirmation to the Commerce post stripped of control over the RFC. He had once again made a moral declaration and abandoned it in the pinch.

Wallace's endorsement of the unbelievable Johannes Steel, radio commentator, for Congress in 1946, plus his praise of Vito Marcantonio as having "the best voting record in the House," caused some of us finally to stop giving Wallace the benefit of the doubt. Steel entered the primaries in the Nineteenth District, New York City, against the Democratic incumbent, ARTHUR G. KLEIN, whose voting record, from a liberal point of view, was well above average.

Nothing that happened after he took Steel to his bosom surprised us. His letter to President Truman on the Baruch atomic energy program for the United Nations and his Madison Square Garden speech in September 1946 might have been anticipated. It was almost inevitable that his atomic energy letter would distort the facts, and that, when confronted by Mr. Baruch and his associates with demonstrable errors, he would agree to revise what he had said and then never do so. And it is significant that he omitted some sentences adverse to Soviet policies and tactics in his Madison Square Garden speech when the booing grew.

Even before the Steel endorsement there had been a clear top-off on Wallace's changing frame of mind. In a speech before the Congress of American-Soviet Friendship at Madison Square Garden on November 8, 1942, while he was still Vice President, he voiced his loss of faith in political or bill-of-rights democracy. He agreed with those in the United States who believe that we have overemphasized that type of democracy. "Carried to its extreme form," he declared, "it leads to rugged individualism, exploitation, impractical emphasis on States' rights and even to anarchy." Then he added, "Russia, perceiving some of the abuses of excessive political democracy, has placed strong emphasis on economic democracy. This, carried to an extreme, demands that all power be centered in one man and his bureaucratic helpers. Somewhere there is a practical balance between economic and political democracy."

Despite the qualifications with which he sought to surround this abnegation of faith in political or bill-of-rights democracy, it can fairly be interpreted as an announcement by him that in our present stage of evolution the peoples of the world cannot be trusted to carry on their struggle as free men for a better life—that at least a moderate application of the methods and procedures of authoritarianism or dictatorship is required for their own good. The key to his whole new party campaign is to be found here.

In many of his campaign speeches he has tried to deny this. One of these speeches—at Evansville, Ind., April 6, a month after the Czech crisis—reworded his state of mind with special clarity. "Though I detest the whole idea of dictatorships," he declared, "there is a great difference between the Fascist dictatorship, which tries to perpetuate itself for its own profit, power, and glory, and the dictatorship in the Soviet Union, which has as its goal an economy of abundance for all its people and the eventual dissolution of the dictatorship. The Fascist dictatorship must expand its working area. It must seek new sources of raw materials, new markets for its goods, and new people to exploit. This necessity is not inherent in the dictatorship in Russia. The Russians have no necessity to expand their borders, nor will they for many decades to come, except as external threats and pressures compel them to seek military security."

In that rationalization he closed his eyes to the facts of Russian imperialism. Of more significance, he turned his back on the sameness of the methods and processes of all dictatorships—the brutal destruction of individuals, singly and en masse. He rejected the findings of the best minds of the ages, from Plato to John Dewey, that the means to an end inexorably shape the end, and he slammed the door against those who believe that bloody dictatorship is more evil when clothed in moral protestations than when it asserts itself as naked might.

A number of liberal Senators, both Democratic and Republican, after trying to get behind the veil of Wallace's destiny-yearning while he was presiding over the Senate, reached substantially this opinion about him: That he had made up his mind that governmental collectivism is inevitable throughout the world, including this country and the Western Hemisphere; that the Soviet brand of this wave of the future is preferable to other brands; and that he himself is specially designated to ride that wave and channel its course when it rolls across our land. Their opinion is supported, it seems to me, by steadily mounting evidence.

IV

For some of us who worked with him in years past, the most shocking experience comes in comparing the positions he is taking in this campaign (including those set forth in his campaign book, Towards World Peace) with the positions he took in action while in government. A typical example is his fervent and self-righteous outcry, on every campaign occasion, over discrimination against the Negroes and over exploitation of the lowly and downtrodden as exemplified by the sharecroppers. But his record as Secretary of Agriculture on that score was bad enough to invite the present opposition of Walter White, secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and of other Negro leaders.

He didn't really start to redress the gross administration inequities under the AAA Act suffered by the sharecroppers in the South until many months after he had dismissed our group. And that purge was in part because we tried to do something about that distressing situation Nor did his elevation to the Vice Presidency seem to encourage him to take a more forthright stand on this issue which is now part of his stock in trade. He literally ran away—physically, down the Senate Office Building corridors—according to members of a delegation who waited 3 hours for him beyond their appointment time to tell him why they felt that a Negro sharecropper from Virginia, Odell Waller, had been unjustly sentenced to execution for murder. Wallace, as members of the delegation describe the incident, slipped out of his inner office door just as the delegation was leaving the outer office. One of the delegation, Mary McLeod Bethune, noted Negro woman leader, gave chase calling "Mr. Wallace, this is a great tragedy. We must talk to you." To which the Vice President, according to members of the delegation, replied over his shoulder, "There's nothing I can do," as he disappeared around the corner. Harassed by the widespread publication of this episode in the Negro press, Wallace has said it didn't happen. But, despite their joint efforts in a personal interview, he and his manager have been unable to persuade Mrs. Bethune to give them a letter denying the occurrence. Nor have any other members of the delegation been found to deny it.

Even more recently—during his Secretaryship of Commerce—Wallace's attitudes and actions on this problem of discrimination aroused the outspoken hostility of Negro organizations and their leaders. He insisted that segregation policies in the National Airport restaurant, under his jurisdiction, could not be changed because it is located across the District of Columbia line in Virginia and is operated by a private concessionaire who sets the policies. Secretary of War Stimson, confronted with the same circumstances as to location and operation, by concession, of the cafeterias in the War Department's Pentagon Building, found no difficulty in establishing a nonsegregation policy.

The deep resentment of non-Communist Negroes toward Wallace is shown in the following paragraph from an editorial in the February 1948 issue of the Crisis, monthly publication of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People:

"Under his Secretaryship, the Department of Commerce was more than ordinarily ridden with humiliating separation of workers because of color, and limitation of promotion for the same reason. While in the latter months of 1947, just before the announcement of his candidacy, Mr. Wallace was railing against segregation and refusing to speak to separated audiences, for 5 or 6 years prior to that time he had dodged speaking before conventions of the NAACP, the organization which has had 'no segregation' as its war cry since it was formed. While turning aside NAACP invitations, Mr. Wallace found time to speak several times at Tuskegee, an institution where white and colored guest speakers are sent to separate guest houses."

Admittedly, this is a difficult issue, but Wallace's glorification of his running mate, Democratic Senator GLEN H. TAYLOR, of Idaho, for inviting rough handling and arrest by the Birmingham police, when the Senator tried in May to enter a Negro entrance to an auditorium there, is in contrast with his own performance. Wallace's inadequacy on this issue is not likely to be wiped out by the between-the-lines confession in his California speaking tour, in May, that he hadn't done all he should have done on the problem when he was in Government.

A similarly sharp reversal of position is found in his stand on the equal-rights amendment advocated by the Woman's Party. For several years prior to his new-party campaign he championed that proposal. I was with him on an inspection of the White Motor Co. war plant in Cleveland in the winter of 1943 when he experienced a reaction from the women workers which greatly impressed him and threw him more strongly on the equal-rights amendment side.

He was addressing several thousand workers in the plant yard, a large proportion of them women. With gestures from the truck serving as his rostrum, he was describing the outpouring of improved kitchen and household appliances which would come after the war from many of the factories then turning out war materials. He was picturing a new life of leisure for the housewife. "So," he declared, "when you go back into your homes * * *." At that point the women hissed and booed resoundingly. His arm was upraised in gesture when this happened. He kept it there for an instant or two as he shifted his face away from the microphone to look with a stunned expression at the crowd. Then he added, "if you want to," at which the women clapped and cheered. "That means something," he said with feeling as we rode back in a taxi to the hotel. It was not surprising to note him among the Woman's Party supporters soon after that.

But in his May 8 campaign speech at the Commodore Hotel, New York City, to the founding conference of the New York State Women for Wallace, he again about-faced. After analyzing the economic and legal disabilities of women, and proposing remedial legislation, he declared, "I oppose the so-called Equal Rights Amendment which would destroy all existing legislation for the protection of women."

In several of his speeches he has played upon the evil of the Franco dictatorship in Spain and what he says is this country's encouragement of it through trade and diplomatic relations. During the Spanish civil war, as I came to know well while trying to help Loyalist Ambassador de los Rios, Wallace was the least responsive of the cabinet members who were approached to exercise influence on specific problems in behalf of the Loyalist government, such as arranging the servicing of that government's funds in New York City and the campaign to have the arms embargo lifted. His attitude was in sharp contrast to that of Secretary Morgenthau and Secretary Ickes. Wallace apparently did not then see Franco as the menace he now considers him.

These and numerous other about-faces might be discounted as the ordinary inconsistencies of an ambitious politician. It might be said that when, for example, he bemoaned in one of his Middle West campaign speeches the difficulty of getting the United States Agricultural Extension Service to give attention to the needs of the small farmers, he was merely having a to-be-expected politician's black-out of memory regarding his own responsibility for the condition out of which he now seeks to make political capital. In the framework of political exigencies, according to this mode of interpretation, he should not now be held to account for having failed to make a single significant move, as Secretary of Agriculture, to put into effect his early promise that he would divorce the tax-supported Extension Service from actual control, in several major agricultural States, by the American Farm Bureau Federation, a private farm organization representing in those States the big, corporate, absentee-ownership type of farming, the so-called master farmers. Wallace flies back and forth across the country, however, as no ordinary politician but as a candidate fired solely by deep humanitarianism and the desire to spread ideas designed to bring about universal peace and prosperity.

The techniques of his mass meetings at Madison Square Garden and elsewhere are designed to play on people's emotions and cloud their judgment—the single spotlight in the darkened auditorium focused on the lone speaker (the holy leader) surrounded by a battery of microphones on a platform in the center of the vast essemblage rising tier on tier on all sides of it; the organized chants through a loud-speaker system proclaiming the urgency of the need and the self-sacrificing courage of the savior eager to lead humanity to salvation; the spotlight ceremony of lighting the path of the savior when he threads his way among the multitude to and from the platform amid the exulting cheers of his followers. These techniques are a far cry from the old torchlight parades and other traditional methods employed by Theodore Roosevelt in his 1912 Bull Moose effort to reach the White House and by senior Bob La Follette in his 1924 campaign. They are borrowed from the Sportpalast in Berlin and the Red Square in Moscow and are modern technology applied to make the individual sink his identity in the herd.

Wallace's speeches, furnished to him primarily by Lew Frank, Jr., a peace mobilizer till Hitler moved against Russia; the tautlarynxed manner in which Wallace utters them in his new incarnation as messiah; and the increasing anxiety of hordes of his listeners combine to make his audiences completely overlook Wallace's reckless distortions and frequent errors.

A typical example was his accusation of Laurence A. Steinhardt, United States Ambassador to Czechoslovakia, of having instigated a rightist plot against the Benes-Masaryk regime which, Wallace asserted, was one of the chief factors causing the Communist coup and Masaryk's death there. Faced with Steinhardt's denial and citation of the fact that he was absent from Czechoslovakia at the time, Wallace refused to retract his palpably false charge and retreated into the weak contention that Steinhardt's earlier expression of hope that Czechoslovakia would reconsider and participate in the Marshall plan (the ERP) was a deliberate incitation of the rightist revolt against Benes and Masaryk.

Illuminating the anguish-beclouded state of mind of Wallace's followers is the Gallup poll of April, which showed that 47 percent of those who professed an intention at that time to vote for Wallace were still supporting the ERP though he had long since denounced it as a scheme of Wall Street.

Wallace has been taking in large sums of money on his speaking trips. The New York Post on June 4 carried a report from a correspondent who had covered Wallace's Western trip, estimating that in collections and admissions to his meetings Wallace had brought into his campaign coffers about $390,000. This was a 25-day trip, starting with a Madison Square Garden meeting where he collected $100,000. In addition to these sources of funds Wallace's campaign has had large contributions ranging from $1,000 to $5,000 from wealthy individuals typified by Mrs. Elinor Gimble. Howard Norton in the Baltimore Sun of May 12 reported a contribution of $10,000 to the campaign from the Greek-American Committee for Wallace; a pledge of $25,000 from the Armenian-American Committee; and one of $10,000 from local 65 of the Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Union, CIO. I estimate that between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 will be spent in the Wallace crusade.

No newspaper reporter dealing with the Wallace campaign whom I was able to find in checking the facts for this article gainsays the validity of a considerable portion of Wallace's attack upon the Truman administration's foregn policy—which is Wallace's only significant appeal for support. Many of these reporters agree with him on his opposition to universal military training. Many of them agree with him on his opposition to reimposition of selective service. A sizable proportion of them sympathize with his opposition to the so-called Truman doctrine in Greece. And not one of them dissents from his shouting to high heaven about the Truman administration's side-stepping the United Nations. But not one of them is for him. They conversationally blast the rough stuff pulled on Baldwin and some of the other Wallace contingent at Evansville, Ind., the denial of hotel rooms to Wallace and his group because of the Negro singer, Paul Robeson, at Indianapolis, the dismissal of Wallace supporters at Evansville College and elsewhere, and all similarly stupid conduct of superpatriots.

But by the same token, they condemn the provocative exaggeration of Wallace's attacks, his avoidance of direct answers to their questions, and the framed-up stunts by people running his campaign. A little-known example of the latter was the meeting for him of Johns Hopkins University students. The PCA had rented Levering Hall on the campus for a noon meeting for Wallace. That morning posters appeared on trees on the campus proclaiming that the university authorities had withdrawn use of Levering Hall and that the meeting would accordingly be held in an adjoining street. A sound truck blared the same announcement as it cruised along the streets around the campus. The ennouncement was untrue but it created the type of martyrdom atmosphere Wallace and his promoters desire. In his speech Wallace said he expected to be denied facilities in the West but had not expected it in the East. He thus personally furthered the untruth.

Newspapermen naturally resent Wallace's charge, repeated over and over, that the newspapers print nothing but slander concerning him and his campaign. Almost daily he slurs the conscientious attempts of a majority of them to report the facts accurately and interpret them with sober reflection. Some of those with whom I talked think Wallace has become so habituated to belaboring devils that he now believes they actually exist.

VI

Over one aspect of his present manifestations there is sharp difference of opinion among reporters assigned to his campaign. That is his insistent assertion that he knows only one or two Communists in this country and doesn't know how to identify the American brand of non-card-displaying Communists in general. Some say this is palpably a pose on his part. They point out that he got a thorough education in the functioning of the Communist mind during his trip to Europe in the fall of 1947. They contend that he simply wants to keep his eyes closed to the nature of the people in large part manning the machinery of his new party.

Others believe he is so enveloped in what they think now amounts almost to a paranoic fog that he really doesn't recognize Communists or party-liners when he encounters them. Reporters entertaining this opinion credit him with an unstudied reaction when he said, some weeks after the appointment had been made, that he didn't know former CIO General Counsel Lee Pressman had been selected as secretary of the new party platform committee. His astonishment on that occasion was, according to this view, merely another piece of evidence proving Wallace has put himself so completely in the hands of others that he doesn't know from day to day what his party decisions and maneuvers are.

As this is written (June), estimates of the vote Wallace is likely to get range from three to ten million. James A. Farley sets the figure at 5,000,000. Wallace himself, in confidential discussions with his associates, expresses his hope to get at least 4,000,000—thus to equal Senior Bob La Follette's 1924 total. In these discussions he bluntly proclaims his wish that the Republicans take over the White House.

He expects and intends to make his greatest inroads in the Democratic fold. He was really not "playing make-believe" when he said in March that Senator ROBERT A. TAFT was his favorite candidate. He convinced himself that the Democratic Party is in literal fact under Truman a "war party." He really believes that the President is surrounded by advisers and Cabinet members who are collaborating with certain industrialists and financiers in a cold-blooded program of war matériel production for the sake of maintaining the lush profit level of the war years. He has come to the astounding conclusion that when the Republicans take over the White House they will be less eager to maintain lush profit levels and will consequently not be a "war party." The implication of his stand is that the Republicans will be able speedily to ease the strain between the Soviet Union and the United States and achieve peace. He hopes for a large Wallace vote partly to help insure a Republican victory and partly to give him and his following leverage with the victors.

Wallace's following includes no significant organization support other than the PCA, the Communist Party, and the Communist-led CIO unions. The Townsendites, for whose votes he has made a special play, failed at a recent convention in Washington, D. C., to adopt a resolution endorsing him. The bulk of his following is composed of tens of thousands of men and women whose consciences have been outraged by the postwar materialistic fixation in the United States. He is a symbol for these multitudes whose fears for their sons and daughters are deep and justified in a bitterly divided atomic (and bacterial warfare) world.

True, conditions are rotten-ripe for his use—with the tragic bungling of the Palestine problem and the appalling fiasco of the Soviet-United States exchange of notes in May as his made-to-order examples—and Wallace is trading on them in words and methods calculated to exacerbate the very conditions he professes to want to remedy. Many of these independent voters are so distressed at the performance of the Truman administration, especially in foreign policy, that they are even willing to swallow maneuvers of the new party which are quite likely to displace liberal Members of Congress with reactionary conservatives.

Wallace is apt to get his largest vote among the women, among church people—particularly in rural towns, "the river Baptists," as old-time politicians call them—and among college and university students. He himself thinks he will draw most heavily in the highly industrialized areas, but there are signs he is overoptimistic about this. The polls—typified by that of the Boston Globe for Massachusetts—show that Wallaces's probable vote has slumped from the 11 percent he was credited with after he announced his candidacy.

Whether or not the slump is recovered, it is certain he will receive enough of a vote to serve as a portent that Wallace has introduced into this country for the first time the European type of politics. He is not sanguine about a continuation of his New Party after the election. Despite the way in which his Communist-disciplined audiences have regularly emptied their pockets for him and the way in which his wealthy backers have drawn large checks for the cause, he sees little prospect of money after November to keep the New Party going. Moreover, he is sufficiently versed in the realities of political parties to recognize that patronage is essential to hold them together. What is more likely is the development of a genuine third-party movement out of the political wreckage Wallace is doing so much to create—a movement broadly based in the labor unions and not just in the Communist-led unions; a movement such as is envisioned in a resolution adopted at its spring meeting by the board of the United Automobile Workers under the guidance of Walter Reuther.

So, as many of the former associates and friends of Wallace sadly watch him immolate himself in the present crusade, they at least have the consolation of knowing that he is unwittingly preparing the ground for a political growth more in keeping with the bill-of-rights concept of democracy than the one he is so bitterly trying to nourish.

Worcester's One Hundredth Birthday

OF

HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, recently the people of my home city of Worcester, Mass., set aside the week of July 25 to August 1, 1948, as a period of celebration marking the one hundredth anniversary of its incorporation as a city. The theme of the festive functions was a combined grateful bow to the past and confident salute to the future, with the serious underlying note of profiting from revealed errors in a program for continued development.

As an international friendship gesture, the distinguished mayor and his gracious and charming wife, Mrs. Edwards, of Worcester, England, were the special guests of our own distinguished Mayor Sullivan and the citizens of Worcester, Mass, and because of their congeniality and democratic manner were truly ambassadors of good will.

The purpose and color of the opening day of centennial week celebration are graphically presented in two editorials, one, entitled "We of Today Build the Future," appearing in the Worcester Sunday Telegram of July 25, 1948, and the other entitled "Centennial Keynote Well Expressed," appearing in the Worcester Evening Gazette of July 26, 1948. I ask unanimous consent to include them in the RECORD. The editorials follow:

WE OF TODAY BUILD THE FUTURE

There is a gala and festive spirit in the city of Worcester today with the opening of its long-awaited Centennial Week. The ringing of the church bells, the colorful red, white, and blue decorations on downtown stores and a variety of first-day events give promise of a big week ahead.

It will indeed be a week of gay celebration, with something to appeal to every man, woman, and child in our city. Worcester should have a wonderful time attending the large industrial exposition, band concerts, sports events, plane flights, and the fireworks and other displays which have been arranged.

Worcester is properly celebrating its first hundred years as an incorporated city in the typical tradition that we Americans love. There is a thrill for our citizens in the thought that here they really belong and do have their place in the very heart of the Commonwealth. There will be few who will not feel a sense of pride in their city, and most of us will be tempted to boast a bit about the many virtues of Worcester.

Mayor Edwards, of Worcester, England, may be pardoned if he wonders at our youthful exuberance in marking a mere hundred years. His own city dates back to around 679. Worcester, Mass., is by comparison a mere youngster. The English mayor's presence serves, however, as a reminder that our Worcester has antecedents dating back to the same origins as the Worcester on the Severn. The really important thing, though, is not so much the relative ages of the cities, but the fact that each has had a glorious past that equips them so well to meet the challenge of the future.

For our celebration this week, gala as it is, will be nothing more than a passing good time if we do not take the opportunity to search the past and scan the present to guide us into a greater future. This must be the real meaning of the centennial slogan, "Honoring the Past—Greeting the Future." It is good to set aside an entire week when the citizens may look back at a century of achievement, feel pride in their accomplishments, and look ahead with confidence.

The recent centennial section of the Sunday Telegram chronicled in detail the amazing development of Worcester from a small city of 12,000 in 1848 to its present population of nearly 200,000. It was clearly no accident that Worcester became the third largest New England city, and the largest industrial city in the world not on a waterway.

Worcester grew because it had men of courage, vision, and ingenuity who, nurtured in the New England tradition of independence and self-sufficiency, did great things. Worcester is the industrial and cultural city it is today because there once lived here men who translated ideas into action. The dynamic personalities who lived and breathed during Worcester's early years were not building merely for themselves. The heritage of our present came directly because these men had an eye on a future.

Here is why we honor such names as Stephen Salisbury II, Stephen Salisbury, III, W. T. Merrifield, Ichabod Washburn, Benjamin Goddard, William Crompton, Lucius J. Knowles, William A. Wheeler, Samuel Flagg, Osgood Bradley, and many others who laid the foundations of our growth by a diversified industry. Too numerous to mention here are the scores of early men and women who labored in the past century to keep Worcester's civic and cultural development in pace with the economic strides.

These early pioneers did their job well. There is reason to be justly proud of the bustling city we of the year 1948 enjoy. The municipal auditorium is this generation's tribute to those who have served their city and country in war. The Worcester Art Museum and such educational centers as Worcester Polytechnic Institute, Clark University, Holy Cross, and Assumption Colleges show this generation is keeping aloft a cultural torch. The annual music festival is already a tradition.

It is a matter of pride and satisfaction that many nationalities and persons of all creeds and colors live in harmony in Worcester. The city, for the most part, must have been well-governed, for Mr. Chandler Bullock has pointed out there has been a noticeable lack of major scandals in its political history.

Yet, as we take pride in all this, and celebrate with festivities, it must be remembered that the Worcester of 2048 depends largely on how we of today solve our problems. Cities can disappear and bog down economically even more quickly than they can grow if self-satisfaction and smugness replace vision and initiative.

For it is not disloyal, even during a centennial, to suggest that Worcester is not a perfect city. It still has many problems to solve. It has a fine and well-managed airport, but it took a long time to get it while other cities seemed to show greater vision as to the meaning of the air age. Its library problem is still unsolved, although an important step forward on the site was taken last week. Many of its schools are antiquated and overcrowded. There are parks and playgrounds to be improved. A housing shortage must still be solved. And the traffic headache and parking problems demand action if the city is to maintain its growth. The city is spending a paltry sum on intelligent planning for the future.

There are big things ahead as Worcester now marks its first hundred years. The coming months will bring a national election, undoubted crises in world affairs, more draft uncertainties and a galaxy of problems to engage our attention. Worcester, as in the past, may be expected to take these things in stride. As it marks its centennial year, however, it must determine to hand on to posterity a better Worcester. For it must be remembered that in the bicentennial edition of the Telegram and Gazette the names of the 1948 pioneers will be our own. Each Worcester citizen today has a chance to help build that future.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Evening Gazette of July 26, 1948]

CENTENNIAL KEYNOTE WELL EXPRESSED

The impressive start given Worcester's centennial in yesterday's exercises struck a fine keynote for the rest of the week's celebration.

Worcester is being honored this week by the presence of distinguished visitors, and at the same time is recognizing the accomplishments of its own citizens in building the community to its present stature.

Governor Bradford, in his excellent address last night on city hall plaza, caught the spirit of the occasion when he pointed out that this city was built upon freedom and enterprise. Its beginnings were difficult and perilous. Yet the development has been steady and substantial. The Governor made a most significant comment on the fact that while in some other countries a community of many races and faiths would be a hotbed of strife, the contrary is true in Worcester.

George R. Stobbs, in his fine historical review at the centennial dinner, likewise emphasized the importance of the background. That background, he made clear, is chiefly in the determination, skill, integrity, and wisdom of the men and women who built the city's beginnings. The fruit of their devotion and ambition is seen now not only in the structure of our industry but in the wealth of culture and educational opportunity here.

Last night's exercises underlined, amid the natural atmosphere of gayety and celebration, the true note of seriousness in this centennial. Worcester is honoring the past, and the people and things which built that past. But, in greeting the future, it can seize the inspiration of this week's events to achieve new and greater things.

Worcester, as Governor Bradford and Mr. Stobbs both pointed out, has grown from its 12,000 population in 1848 to some 200,000 in 1948. That growth is a mark of accomplishment. But greatness lies more in character and purpose than in size, and the centennial opening made that important truth clear to all.

Petroleum Inquiry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that I am filing on behalf of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a report on the general petroleum outlook. I think that the Members will find this report of great interest to them, as we approach the fall harvesting and the winter fuel-oil seasons.

As the Members know, for many months the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been examining into the fuel situation, and the committee this last June was directed further by the House to study the picture with a view toward recommending a national fuel policy.

While the committee has continued in session straight through the recess and into these last 2 weeks, obviously it is not yet in position to make the carefully considered and vitally important recommendations concerning the over-all fuel situation which will follow the further deliberations of this fall.

I have felt, however, that a presentation of the outlook for this coming year as it now appears, of the extent to which the steel shortage may be responsible for any petroleum shortage, of the general matter of steel and export allocation controls, and of the petroleum industry price and profit position, would be of assistance to the Members at this time.

Facts on Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, too little has been said or reported about the causes of inflation and who is responsible for it. Mr. Truman was in a position to do something about it last January if he had followed the advice of Marriner Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board, but he chose to ignore it.

Mr. David Lawrence brings home the truth of the President's dereliction in this matter. Read his challenging article:

FACTS ON INFLATION COME TO LIGHT

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON.—The truth about the inflationary situation is slowly emerging, and it isn't a pleasant story.

The Federal Reserve Board last January warned the President—Marriner Eccles, former chairman, has now testified—that the boom could be and should be controlled and credit curbs applied but Mr. Truman deleted the recommendation from his message to Congress and demoted Mr. Eccles.

Many people in Washington suspected this at the time. Basically there was a substantial amount of agreement with Mr. Eccles' ideas but everyone knew also that a curb on credit would start a depression and perhaps a severe one.

This being a Presidential year, naturally the President and his administration didn't want to start deflation and bring on a depression.

Mr. Truman has ample powers now to set deflationary moves into operation. But he doesn't want to accept the responsibility for unemployment and bankruptcies that may ensue.

The Republicans are going to use their opportunities at the present session to bring out in public hearings the failure of Mr. Truman to use the control powers he already has.

Mr. Truman's anti-inflation proposals are going to be thoroughly riddled before Congress gets through with its 15-day session. The talk of credit controls is already making the financial markets somewhat uneasy. But the fact is that the bankers are strenuously opposed to an increase in the reserve requirements and favor instead a raising of the rediscount rate. This, in turn, might force commercial interest rates somewhat.

The bankers feel that to increase reserves may operate unevenly in impairing the Nation's lending system at a time when high inventories and pay rolls require most businesses to use more working capital than ever before.

The debate in Congress will bring out a good many things that have hitherto been more or less soft-pedaled about the credit situation. Also it will focus attention on the manner in which wage rises have forced prices upward. It is significant that Mr. Truman's recommendations on wage control are limited to a few items that would be placed under price ceilings. Obviously, unless there is comprehensive wage control, there cannot be much influence in keeping prices down. But again Mr. Truman doesn't want to appear as favoring wage controls because he is anxious to hold the labor-union vote. So it's just politics that is being played now as the economic problems of the Nation grow more and more complex.

Public Housing

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Oregon Daily Journal of August 4, 1948:

POLITICS, IT'S WONDERFUL

It's more or less inadvertent, apparently, but Representative ANGELL, of Oregon, in discussing the housing crisis, has put his finger on the fundamental fact concerning the current special session of the Congress.

It's a political session, all right, but that should not prevent the Congress from dealing with the critical issues which have already gone through the crucible of party leadership and committee action and have thus been cleared for action.

Mr. ANGELL mentions specifically the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill which passed the Senate, then was high-handedly held up by the House Rules Committee. An effort is being made to blast it out of committee by petition, but 218 signatures are required and prospects aren't too bright.

What Representative ANGELL did not say was that there are several other paramount issues which could be brought to a vote any day before adjournment.

One is the $65,000,000 United Nations building loan which passed the Senate BC (before the conventions) then got lost in the shuffle. The House Foreign Affairs Committee is reported ready to give it the green light, so it may get by. Another is the Federal aid-to-education bill which also passed the Senate and is pending in the House, where States'-righters and those opposed to helping private and parochial schools have it smothered.

Still another measure, the anti-poll-tax bill, passed the House before Congressmen dashed off for Philadelphia. It could come to a vote in the Senate immediately, but Dixiecrats have the whole Truman civil-rights program jammed up in a filibuster-type debate and there is no likelihood whatever that Republican leaders will do anything but sit back and chuckle.

With one minor exception action on inflation-control legislation—most important of all issues begging for congressional attention—is highly improbable. A bill tightening up on credit by boosting bank-reserve requirements is slated for introduction in the House and the Senate seems willing to go along. But as for the President's 11-point anti-inflation program, it's out the window. Out the window also are flood relief, additional reclamation and power appropriations, international wheat agreements, and other matters.

It seems advisable, therefore, not to hold your breath until the special session acts on any of these vital matters. The UN building loan and the bank credit bill may get by. But that's all.

Meanwhile, if your blood pressure will stand it, reflect upon these two things:

No. 1: Not all, but most of the items on which the Congress will not act are in the Republican as well as the Democratic platforms.

No. 2: If the Congress adjourns Saturday without acting on pending legislation, it will have to start all over again in January when the Eighty-first Congress meets. That's because lapsed bills have to be reintroduced, hearings held all over again, committee action obtained.

Politics is wonderful—and very expensive.

PUBLIC HOUSING

(By HOMER D. ANGELL, United States Representative, Oregon)

The difficult problem facing low-income groups to secure adequate and proper housing, food, and clothing in the inflationary period in which we find ourselves is one of the most acute with which we have to deal.

While it is generally admitted that the President's call for the special session was purely political, having been made in his acceptance speech at the political convention of his party, nevertheless I hope that the Congress will do everything possible to pass legislation which will help solve not only the housing problem but also high cost of living and other critical issues. In the few weeks that will be available it will not be possible to solve any long-range issues which have not already gone through the crucible of party leadership and committee action, and cleared for consideration.

In the brief space available to me, I will discuss only the housing situation. When World War II struck it was necessary to marshal all of our materials and manpower for the production of the war essentials, which required sidetracking dwelling construction with the exception of temporary structures needed for housing war workers. With the return of the GI's we found ourselves facing a critical shortage of housing, not only for the veterans and their new families, but for other low-income groups who, by reason of their homes having deteriorated, having been sold or destroyed, were in critical need of roofs over their heads.

The recent survey made by the United States Bureau of Census shows that housing needs were intensified in the Portland area by the misuse of the larger housing units, being occupied by only one or two people whereas the accommodations were adequate for many more.

The Congress has provided by legislation preferences for veterans, long-range low-interest loans, allocation and conservation of materials for house construction, with the result that considerable headway has been made in bridging the gap in housing. One difficulty facing us is that we are operating on an approximate 50-cent dollar, which means that a prewar $3,500 five-room cottage now costs in excess of $8,000. It is impossible to provide a similar structure at the old price unless the Government or other public agency takes the burden of subdizing the excess cost. That has been the hurdle which confronted advocates of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill providing for long-range housing.

Under the present program of private construction about 15 percent of the new dwellings, both houses and apartments, are built for rental, which means there are fewer than 150,000 new rental units yearly. A considerably larger number than that will be sold and will therefore no longer be available for rent. The backlog of old houses is about exhausted by sale or deterioration. Last year approximately 15,700,000 dwellings were being rented under the Federal control law and it is estimated now the number is less than 14,000,000. Part of the decrease is due to decontrols.

The best estimates reveal that there will be spent by the building industry this year $16,400,000,000 for all types of construction, including housing. This will be $2,500,000,000 in excess of last year. For residences alone the outlay is estimated to be $6,200,000,000, as compared with $5,300,000,000 for 1947. Unfortunately, during the closing days of the Congress, Senator Ellender objected to the consideration of the bill extending title VI of the housing act which under its operations would permit approximately 100-percent guarantees for veteran housing. The Congress should reenact this provision immediately.

There should be a meeting on common ground between the public housing advocates and those who plead for private construction so that legislation may be enacted which will permit low-cost housing on a favorable amortization plan which will enable veterans and others with low income to provide modest, modern five- or six-room homes within the range of our pocketbooks. I hope the Congress even at his special session may bring about such a solution.

During the closing days of the last session of the Congress I made vigorous pleas for the legislation which would have permitted 25-year loans with low interest and amortization to the flood victims of the Columbia River disaster. Unfortunately, the legislation bumped against the long-range housing program which had been held up, with the result that we were unable to get favorable action.

An Inspiring Deed

OF

HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, occasionally, while our well-meaning, learned lecturers are cannonading the walls of assembly halls in gusty explanation of the need for juvenile delinquency corrective programs, a purposeful, patriotic citizen devotes himself quietly and determinedly to an actual accomplishment on behalf of the children within his own community.

Such is the case with respect to a public-spirited citizen of my home city of Worcester, Mass., whose persistent efforts finally resulted in the availability of a playground for the children in a city area where it was vitally needed.

The Worcester Evening Gazette, of August 4, 1948, editorially recognized the humaneness and energy of this gentleman, Mr. Freeman M. Saltus, publisher of the Labor News.

I should like to include this editorial as an inspiration in the art of practical accomplishment. Mr. Saltus has been accorded well-deserved tribute. May many follow his example.

The editorial follows:

NAME FOR A PLAYGROUND ON SALEM STREET

For about a year now, a playground has occupied the site where the old Salem Street School used to stand. Today that playground is being formally dedicated, and its name now becames the Freeman M. Saltus Play Area. The name and a bronze plaque are, of course, a deserved tribute to the publisher of the Labor News, who was active in the successful effort to have the playground established.

Probably no section of the city was in greater need of a place for youngsters to play than was the Salem-Orange-Myrtle block. One great problem was to find the proper space. But even after it became evident that the abandoned school could be torn down to make room for the play area, time and energy had to be devoted to making the idea effective. Those who, with Mr. Saltus, kept after the proposition until it became a reality performed an excellent public service.

In its first year, the playground has demonstrated its value many times over. Upwards of a hundred children use its slides, ball courts and other facilities—children who previously had been forced to play in narrow streets and backyards or nowhere. To build and equip the playground cost the city in the neighborhood of $5,000. It is a fine investment.

Veterans' Legislation in the Eightieth Congress

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by me regarding veterans' legislation in the Eightieth Congress, together with a memorandum regarding veterans' legislation prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, early in the first session of the Eightieth Congress we had before us the statement of the President in his message of January 6, 1947, with reference to veterans' legislation.

In that message the President told Congress and the Nation that "except for minor adjustments, I believe our program of benefits for the veterans is now complete."

We had also for our guidance the Republican Statement of Principles, Policies, and Objectives. That statement included a pledge, as follows:

"A grateful Nation demands that those who fought in its defense, their widows and orphans, must never be forgotten. The best medical care and rehabilitation, education, and training for all desiring it, and efficient assistance in securing homes, farms, businesses, and real jobs must be provided for the veteran."

The Republican Congress in its first session, as well as the second session, fulfilled that pledge. It matched performance with its party promise. It did not sweep aside the Nation's obligation to its veterans with mere minor adjustments, as suggested by the President in his message.

I would like to review briefly some of the legislation enacted by the Eightieth Congress to aid the veteran and to enable him to take the rightful, normal place in civilian life to which he is so richly entitled by his service and sacrifice.

I want to refer first to the bill providing for the cashing of terminal-leave bonds held by the veterans. This was passed to correct an injustice under which enlisted men were required to wait 5 years to receive their pay for terminal leave while officers were paid in cash.

You will recall that when the Republican Congress proposed to pay off these bonds, there was vigorous opposition from the administration. The Treasury Department threw up a smoke screen of economic theories designed to prepare the way for a possible Presidential veto. But with the certainty that Congress would summarily override any veto of the bill, the President signed it.

The action of the Republican Congress not only enabled veterans to receive their leave pay in cash if they so desired, but it also made it possible to reduce the national debt by $1,800,000,000, the amount of the bonds issued. In addition, it made possible a saving to the Government of about $60,000,000 a year in interest charges.

In its first session alone the Republican Congress appropriated $9,000,000,000 for veterans benefits. This was done despite reports filed by the then Director of Veterans' Administration against scores of measures introduced into Congress affecting veterans. In these reports it was stated that the proposed legislation was not in accord with the President's program.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to recite the long list of measures passed for the benefit of veterans and their dependents at this time, but a brief summary of the highlights includes the following:

Increasing minimum monthly allowances for subsistence in cases of vocational rehabilitation of disabled veterans.

Increasing the revolving fund from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000 for the purpose of making loans to veterans of World War II undertaking vocational training.

Adding farm training to educational and training programs for which the Government will pay full tuition and subsistence allowances under the GI bill of rights.

Appropriation of $5,000,000 for automobiles for veteran amputees.

Increasing by 20 percent pensions payable to veterans of the Spanish-American and Civil Wars, Philippine Insurrection and Boxer Rebellion, and their dependents.

Appropriation of $35,500,000 to convert surplus military and other war housing to temporary re-use dwelling units for veterans.

Amending the Federal Home Loan Bank Act to permit banks to accept 25-year mortgages, thus making many GI home loans eligible as collateral.

Repealing the time limit for reinstatement of national service life insurance.

Extending for an additional 5-year period the privilege of renewing 5-year level premium term insurance for World War I veterans. Authorizing financial assistance to disabled veterans in the construction of specially designed homes required by the nature of their service-connected disabilities.

Raising the ceiling on wages and allowances payable to veterans in on-the-job training.

Increasing compensation for dependent survivors of war dead, covering widows, orphans and parents.

Providing additional compensation for veterans who have dependents and who are entitled to compensation for service-connected disabilities rated at not less than 60 percent.

Authorizing $1,000,000 annual appropriation for prosthetic appliance research.

Authorizing a secondary market for GI mortgage loans in the Federal National Mortgage Association, making it possible for veterans to obtain 100-percent guaranteed or insured financing in home purchases.

Making veterans' housing cooperatives and nonprofit housing corporations eligible for Government-insured financing up to 95 percent of the value of the project.

Before the present special session of Congress adjourns we will have passed a housing bill giving further recognition to the needs of the veteran. A provision of this bill expands the secondary market for guaranteed or insured mortgages made after April 30 of this year.

Mr. President, these are only a few of the 188 laws enacted by the Eightieth Congress benefiting the veterans and their dependents.

The list is most impressive because it provides for such a wide range of needs, particularly for the disabled and physically handicapped.

Mr. President, these enactments by the Eightieth Congress comprise a proud record. They are in line with the traditional policy of the Republican Party as the friend of the veteran. Throughout its history the Republican Party has recognized the care of the wounded and disabled, the widows, orphans, and their dependents as a sacred trust.

Through the years we have fulfilled that trust faithfully and generously.

Our pledge to the veterans has been reiterated and emphasized in the 1948 platform of the Republican Party which reads as follows:

"Recognizing the Nation's solemn obligation to all veterans, we propose a realistic and adequate adjustment of benefits on a cost-of-living basis for service-connected disabled veterans and their dependents, and for the widows, orphans, and dependents of veterans who died in the service of their country. All disabled veterans should have ample opportunity for suitable, self-sustaining employment.

"We demand good-faith compliance with veterans' preference in Federal service with simplification and codification of the hundreds of piecemal Federal laws affecting veterans, and efficient and businesslike management of the Veterans' Administration. We pledge the highest possible standards of medical care and hospitalization."

Mr. President, that pledge will be kept by the Republican Party with unwavering fidelity and in strict adherence to its historic policy of the past.

Mr. President, I attach hereto a compilation, prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, listing the legislation relating to veterans enacted by the Eightieth Congress.

Peace Assured by True World Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT CROSSER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, ever since the dawn of human history selfishness has been responsible for injustice and oppression.

Because of their failure to recognize and realize the oneness of all life, men have mistakenly tried to force other beings into submission and to subordinate them to what they believe to be their own limited, narrow and circumscribed personal selves.

It has been well said that the degree of real culture manifested by a person, a community, or the world is indicated or measured by the extent to which selfishness has been eliminated from consciousness. In fact unselfishness and true culture may be considered synonymous.

As people grow in understanding they begin to see more and more clearly that principle is the essence of all life and that the law of action of principle is universal in its application to all life, to all existence. The action of principle is always universally right, just. It is, therefore, the supreme power of and in the universe.

The true purpose of mankind, then, is to discover and act in accord with universal law, or in other words in harmony with the certain action of principle.

Primitive man ignorantly believed himself to be a being limited, separate and apart from other beings.

Because of this erroneous belief in the separateness of their existence, many people conduct themselves in accordance with whatever whim may possess them for the time being. Unavoidably, then, because such people do not believe in a unifying, universal law affecting all alike, there is conflict and distress among them.

One phase of the belief in separate personal selves is conceit or egotism, which is responsible for much of the delay in the progress of civilization. Because the error and foolishness of the belief in manlike gods and other superstitions has finally become apparent to some people who have a sense of mental superiority and self-importance, they next mistakenly assert that there exists no all-sufficient power in the universe. Such people, then, failing to recognize that real creation is eternal and perfect, nevertheless imagine themselves to be creators. They fail to realize that all man can do is to discover, that is, become conscious of principle and its law. To the extent that men manifest, that is to say, individualize all-inclusive principle and its uniform law, to that extent does the reign of justice, the rule of right, prevail.

It is important then, in human affairs, that all persons should have equal opportunity to take part in deciding what is to be considered the right, the law in regard to matters affecting the general welfare.

In other words, all persons have equal rights in deciding what laws shall control the people. That is to say that democracy must prevail. Now, certain laws immediately affect only the local community, and such laws should express the will of the people of the community and therefore be binding on all persons in such community. There are, on the other hand, certain problems which affect all the people of a nation, and to meet and deal with such problems laws should be enacted in accordance with the will of all of the people of the nation. This would not mean a surrender of sovereignty by the community government to the National Government as is sometimes erroneously claimed, but on the contrary such national government is necessary to promote the welfare of all the people of the Nation. Likewise if we are to put an end to world anarchy then we must also have a world government to promote the welfare of all the people of the world by assuring peace among the nations of the world. The establishment of such a government would not constitute a surrender of sovereignty by the United States Government nor by any other nation.

Such a world government must be established as an independent organization, and, being world-wide in its jurisdiction, its decisions must be absolutely supreme and final in all cases in which it exercises its constitutional authority.

All the doubts and fears now expressed in regard to the establishment of such a world government were urged likewise in regard to the establishment of our National Government, under the name of the United States of America. The 13 independent governments which helped to prepare the Constitution of the United States did not all approve the new Government when its Constitution was finally submitted to them by the Constitutional Convention. Time and experience have shown, however, that the doubters were wrong. So it will be in regard to a world government when it is firmly established. That government, like all governments, regardless of the extent of their jurisdiction, should be established upon the principles of democracy. The word "democracy" is derived from the two Greek words, demos, meaning "the people," and kratein, "to rule," and therefore means the rule of the people. Only by democracy can men's rights and welfare be assured.

The world government should have a constitution which would strictly limit its authority to the preservation and maintenance of peace among all the nations of the world. It should not be allowed to interfere with the domestic policies of any nation. The world government should have a governing body consisting of a number of representatives from each country of the world, bearing the same proportion to the total membership of such body as the population of such country bears to the population of the whole world, just as the United States House of Representatives is constituted.

The world government should be furnished with a force sufficient to overcome and defeat any nation or combination of nations which might refuse obedience to the constitutional decisions of the world government.

All of the nations of the world should be prohibited from having military, naval, or any other kinds of force, except a police force large enough to preserve domestic order within the boundaries of such country. A force sufficient to preserve domestic order is all that should be tolerated in the possession of any nation.

It should also be made an offense against the constitution and laws of the World Government for any nation to provide for the conscription of men for military service. The persons constituting the World Government's military force, provided to compel complete obedience to the World Government's decisions, should consist of volunteers. Such volunteers should be paid a salary or wage sufficiently large to attract men of high quality to service in the military or police force of the World Government.

In order to avoid, as much as possible, all jealousies and rivalries, the persons constituting the military force should be selected from each nation in numbers bearing the same proportion to the World Government's total military force as the nation's population bears to the total population of the world.

To assure prompt action for the purpose of preventing trouble from arising, the World Government should have the right to send investigators into any country in the world where it has reason to believe that a violation of its regulations or decisions is occurring or is about to occur. Any invasion or violation of the territory of one nation by another should require immediate corrective action by the World Government. The offending nation should be ordered to stop, whether or not it might feel justified in its action, just as in our municipal affairs the police prevent the use of force by one person against another, whether or not the person with whom the police interferes feels that he is right in regard to the matter in controversy. So it must be with groups of individuals called nations. Their disputes must be settled in accordance with the same principle upon which disputes between persons are settled, in other words, by the rule of reason and not by force.

It is urged, by those who, for political advantage, appeal to the vanity of their countrymen, that the proposal I have explained constitutes a surrender of sovereignty on the part of all nations, including our own. Those urging this objection, in dramatic indignation, argue that we must exercise absolute control in the settlement of all disputes in which our country may be involved.

The fact is, that according to the principles of the most scientific form of government, namely, democracy, there is no surrender of sovereignty at all. The basic and ultimate unit of democracy, whether in community governments, in nations, or finally in the world, is the individual. The individual's rights are inborn in him. Governments cannot create rights. They can only recognize existing rights, rights existing according to the laws of nature.

Thomas Jefferson said:

> The God that gave us life, gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them.

That certainly supports the contention I have just been making, that the rights of the individual exist and did exist before human governments were ever established. It is proper, therefore, that the individual should regard himself as having important rights, not only as a member of the smallest kind of government, namely the municipal government, but also that he has rights as a member of the proposed largest government; that is, the world government.

The rights and obligations of persons residing within the small unit of government, called the municipality, are of importance generally only to the people residing therein. Next we have, in the order of importance, the State or province, and the individual has certain specific rights and obligations in common with all other individuals residing within the boundaries of such State or province. Finally, the individual has rights in common with all individuals in the world, which can only be assured and upheld by a world government receiving its authority directly from all of the people of the world, acting as citizens of the world.

The exercise of his individual rights, by one of the world's population, in regard to matters within the constitutional authority of the world government, would have as much authority as would have the exercise of his rights as a citizen of a small community. His rights and obligations as a citizen of the world have not been exercised by the individual heretofore, but it is now wrongly called a proposed surrender of national sovereignty because it is planned to assert rights which have existed eternally but which heretofore have not been exercised.

All of the individuals in the world have the common right to prevent strife between nations. That right has not been exercised heretofore. It has been unused but it is now proposed to create the world government as an agency of all the people of the world, in order to enforce their right to prevent strife between nations and to so prevent suffering throughout the world.

Let us hear no more, then, about the surrender of sovereignty. The people of the world have never granted away, nor have ever vested in any nation their sovereign common right to prevent the mass slaughter of human beings in senseless wars between nations. The universal cry of all mankind is for the dethronement of brute force as the controlling power in the world and for the establishment, in its stead, of the reign of reason and justice as supreme authority in human affairs.

With the banishment from the earth of the horrible specter, brute force, with its misrule and with the establishment, in its stead, of the rule of reason and right, mankind will then realize the joys and blessings foretold by the poets and seers who have gone before.

Away then with the prattle about our surrender of sovereignty. Let us banish from the earth the notion that any one nation, on any pretext, must have the power to boss the rest of the world. Let us have the vision and courage to brush aside such baseless contentions and objections and proceed at once to establish a real world government, such as we have just explained.

When there will have been established the world government, unhampered by illogical reservations, such as that permitting a single nation, by its vote, to block proper action by the world government to prevent war, then will become realities—the joys, the bliss, and happiness foretold for mankind by the philosophers and sages of days gone by.

When the war drum beats no longer,
And the battle flags are furled.

Then will be realized by mankind the undiscovered grandeur of creation and the unimagined splendor of true civilization.

When there shall have been established the world government, which we have just briefly discussed, then will be answered the prayer expressed by Robert Burns in the last stanza of his immortal poem, entitled "A Man's a Man For A' That," which I quote as follows:

Then let us pray that come it may,
As come it will for a' that,
That sense and worth, o'er a' the earth,
Will bear the gree an' a' that.
For a' that an' a' that,
It's comin' yet, for a' that,—
That man to man, the warl' o'er,
Shall brithers be for a' that.

De Luxe Vancouver Trailer Units Vacant Despite Purported Housing Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I include as part of these remarks the following article from the Oregonian of August 1:

DE LUXE VANCOUVER TRAILER UNITS VACANT DESPITE PURPORTED HOUSING EMERGENCY

(By Wilma Morrison)

Vancouver housing authority is wondering what has happened to the flood housing emergency and where are the families, desperate for temporary shelter.

The city across the Columbia has set up what comparison will show is the most de luxe and beautifully located trailer project in the area, and so far only 31 families have moved into what is designed ultimately to be a 488-trailer village. What is more, there are at present 29 vacant apartments of row-house type located at the Fruit Valley project between Vancouver and the Columbia.

Twenty-five more of these apartments of one, two, or three bedroom size will be reconditioned and available this week. Remainder of the 140 which the authority had planned to turn over to flood evacuees will be reconditioned only if there is evidence of demand, it was said.

DEMAND EVIDENCE WAITED

The same goes for the trailer project at the east end of the McLoughlin Heights project. If there are no takers soon for these new four- and six-person capacity units, the authority will not finish the elaborate installations now in progress.

Vancouver housing officials did not say what will become of the shiny new trailers not already placed, if greater demand does not materialize. Assumption can only be that they will be offered to Portland.

Why Vancouver's housing authority got all new trailers while Portland, for the most part, got badly worn ones, is also a question unanswered.

A visit to the McLoughlin Heights project will convince observers that there are trailer camps—and trailer towns. This one, in spite of the toilet and washroom handicap it shares with all trailer installations, has every sign of becoming an attractive and well-run community.

In the first place, all 488 trailers are brand new, just off the assembly lines of 15 of the country's top trailer manufacturers. Coming from various plants, they have various interior plans, but all have essential conveniences and artistically planned interiors. Most have good-sized electric refrigerators, gas stoves, latest spring-filled upholstery, chrome and bright plastic in kitchen section.

Cost of many of the large units at retail would be more than $3,000 each.

Rentals are $26 a month for two-bed size and $28 for four-bed units. Rentals at the Fruit Valley apartments are $32.75 and $35.50. Trailer rentals include water and garbage disposal, leave lights and gas to be paid by tenant.

Important to prospective renters is the announcement made Saturday by Mrs. Katherine Walker, tenant selection supervisor at the Vancouver Housing Authority, that they are not insisting at this point on fitting trailers to the size of families. If a couple and baby want one of the large three-bed units for $28 they can have it.

TWO TRAILERS ALLOWED

If a larger family wants to rent two adjoining trailers, the second one goes for an additional $8 a month.

Inspection of a typical three-bed trailer in which a Portland automobile mechanic, his wife, and three small children are living shows across one end a davenport of best construction. Next to it, the dining part consists of a fold-down table of Chinese-red plastic and chrome with overstuffed seats on either side covered in same material as davenport. (These seats slide downward to make the second bed.)

Next to this is the kitchen with half partition. White, three-foot electric refrigerator is built into one wall with stainless steel sink opposite and wall above of Chinese-red plastic. The gas stove is at right angles to the sink and refrigerator, against the wall which shuts the front end of trailer off into separate bedroom. Cupboard space is as much as in many small apartments. Four good-sized closets constitute more space than in many two-room apartments. This unit also has air conditioning.

TEMPORARY HOME IDEAL

Vancouver housing officials who have prided themselves on what they call a realistic attitude toward their temporary housing; the attitude that it must be kept up and all community services maintained as long as there is need for it—think it is a mistake to generalize about trailer housing.

No family would choose to live indefinitely in a trailer house, said Mrs. Walker, but as a temporary measure it can be made pretty attractive.

The Vancouver project meets very well standards of any householder as far as environment goes. It is backed by tall fir trees and a natural park area. A good grade school is less than one-half mile away, across one street. Back of the grade school is a recreation building with staff. One mile away is the big McLoughlin Heights recreation center, considered outstanding of its kind in the country.

A sizable food center is a few blocks away from the south side of the project. Bus service is every 15 minutes.

Layout of the trailers is as convenient and unregimented as is possible, with lavatory units for men and women, one to each 25 trailers. Laundry units with meter washing machines are 1 to 50 trailers and each has a large fenced yard with metal clothes poles and lines.

PLAYGROUND SCHEDULED

When the authority finds out how many children can be expected, the trailer project will have its own playground with play equipment.

Gravel walks are going in around the utility buildings, and each trailer has its barred and padlocked storage box at the back, along with large new garbage can.

Boon to housekeepers, especially those with children, is the fact many smaller trailers are placed one on either end of a red-cement foundation which gives patio effect and play place in dry weather. (These foundations formerly held row houses, torn down since the war.)

BUS SERVICE LISTED

Another important item is the fact the trailer project is at the edge and a part of the well-kept and policed McLoughlin Heights project whose homes, though temporary buildings, are anything but slum housing.

Why applications for the trailers and the apartments at Fruit Valley have been so few, the authority does not know, although transportation seems a likely major reason. Vancouver and the Heights sound a long way from downtown Portland. Actually it is 45 minutes by busses, which run every 15 minutes, and hundreds of Vancouver people are commuting each day. The Heights bus takes 15 minutes to the Vancouver-Portland terminal and the intercity bus takes 30 minutes to Portland's bus station at SW. Sixth Avenue and Yamhill Street.

For those persons who have to be at work by 7 a. m. the situation is not so easy, for Vancouver busses do not run frequently before 7.

Still a Bankrupt Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I include an article by Mr. Walter Lippmann on the subject of the Berlin fiasco. Our foreign policy is still a bankrupt one.

The article is as follows:

IN ORDER TO REPAIR THE DAMAGE

(By Walter Lippmann)

Even though, as now it seems possible, we manage to stay in Berlin without having to fight a war about it, we still have suffered a serious diplomatic set-back. The price of peace with honor is to recede from a position to which we were spectacularly committed—from the German policy which Mr. Bevin and Mr. Marshall adopted, and imposed on M. Bidault, at the London conference which ended early in June. The London agreements called for a provisional government for western Germany in Frankfurt, operating under a constitution drafted by a German constituent assembly, and approved by the three western military governors.

Though the London agreements did not preclude an eventual four-power agreement about the whole of Germany, they did assume that the three powers alone could and would be able to present the Russians with an accomplished fact, namely, a western German state which was self-supporting within the European recovery program and politically alined with the West against the East.

This German policy would have collapsed even if the Russians had not put the squeeze on us in Berlin. For the Germans themselves refused to carry it out. The French Government, which we pushed into approving it, was undermined and the French Foreign Minister, M. Bidault, who was made to feel he had to defend it, has been overthrown. Now, with Mr. Bevin leading the retreat, we are going to do the very thing which the London agreements assumed we would not do: We are conceding the main point, which is that four-power negotiations about the whole of Germany may be resumed before we have created a western German state.

The Russians have won a cheap and easy diplomatic victory by seizing and exploiting the opportunity which we so unwisely and so unnecessarily provided for them. They have been enabled to force us out of a theoretical position which we held only on paper, in the London agreements, but had never established and consolidated in western Germany and in Europe.

So in June and July we have suffered a damaging, though not necessarily an irreparable, diplomatic reverse. From the announcement of the Marshall plan in June 1947, until after the Italian election, the Soviets were fighting a rear-guard action in western Europe, and there were many impressive signs that their grip on eastern Europe was weakening, and that they knew it. But about a month ago they recovered the diplomatic initiative. At least temporarily there was a sudden and sharp reversal, and the western powers were thrown back on the defensive.

The sequence of events shows plainly that it was the London agreements about Germany which placed us in an untenable position, which gave the Russians not only the pretext but the opportunity and the means for a powerful and effective diplomatic counter-offensive. In the London agreements we had, with a good deal of fanfare, committed ourselves to a German policy which we could not carry out because it had no genuine support anywhere on the European continent, which would not have worked if it had been carried out because it is an economic impossibility, which, if the Germans were willing to carry it out, would have ended inexorably either in a world war or in a German-Russian deal at the expense of the rest of Europe.

We must, of course, regret that we have had to retreat under Soviet pressure, and in the midst of the spectacular crisis in Berlin. But we need have no regrets that we must revise the policy. It has never reflected the real views and the true judgment of the Americans who are supposed to make our foreign policy. Nor is it consistent with the ideals, principles, and plans of our bipartisan policy for European revival, security, and settlement.

The prime mover of this German policy, though it was negotiated by the American Ambassador in London, was General Clay, seconded by his advisers in Berlin, his immediate superiors in the Pentagon, notably Mr. Draper and Mr. Royall, and by British officials in Germany and in the foreign office. The basic conception of the policy is in direct contradiction with the understanding reached by Mr. Marshall, Mr. Dulles, and Mr. Bidault when they were together in Moscow in the early spring of 1947.

The understanding was that a German settlement must be fitted into a European settlement, and that restoration of German government must follow, not precede the construction of a framework of European unity.

Mr. Marshall's foreign policy—not only the recovery program but his sponsorship of western union—meant that there would be no German government before western Europe was sufficiently organized, united, and rehabilitated to collaborate with a loose confederation of the German states. But Mr. Marshall never succeeded in making himself the master of our German policy. General Clay, like General MacArthur, has been a proconsul, as respects the State Department very nearly an independent sovereign with whom the department could now and then negotiate, to whom it has never been able to issue orders. This situation developed under Secretary Byrnes, who, partly because of his preoccupation with the satellite treaties, partly because of his admiration for General Clay, was never able or willing to bring German policy under the control of the State Department.

It was supposed that Mr. Marshall—being himself a general of enormous prestige—would not fail to assert his authority over all the generals. But Mr. Marshall has not done that, and as a result our German policy, which is crucial to the success of our foreign policy, has never as yet been made in the State Department. Perhaps it will now be made there. Perhaps our predicament in Berlin, and the hair-raising measures needed to bail ourselves out of it, will at long last have convinced Mr. Marshall, who passed over the public admonitions of Mr. Dewey and Mr. Dulles on this very point, that he cannot have a European policy and let the military authorities in Berlin make their own German policy.

If so, something good may yet come out of the Berlin affair. For if once we can extricate ourselves from the Berlin predicament, and find our way out of the blind alley of the London agreements, the basic trend of events in Europe, which is in our favor, may help us to repair most of the damage of the past few years.

There is litle doubt, it seems to me, that the Communist power is unable to expand into western Europe, and it is highly probable that the Soviet power in eastern Europe is no longer at high tide, and is receding. In Bulgaria, in Yugoslavia, in North Greece, in Finland, in Trieste, in Czechoslovakia, the sgns of recession are many. They are confirmed by the softening of the Russian demands on Austria, and unmistakably, I think by the immensely significant, though it has been generally ignored, modification of the Soviet position on Germany which was announced at Warsaw on June 24. The underlying trend is favorable, but only if we know how to favor it by a diplomatic policy which makes us in fact, not the Russians only and by default, the advocates of a general European settlement which restores Europe to the Europeans.

Program of Aeronautical Training for the Youth of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT TRIPP ROSS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill to provide for a program of aviation training for the youth of our Nation. The introduction of this bill is in line with my speech entitled "Youth Flight Training," delivered in the House on May 19.

From the viewpoint of national interest and security the progressive development of aviation is extremely desirable as a means of building up a large reservoir of young people with technical knowledge and flying experience who will assist in the healthy expansion and growth of an essential aviation industry in its numerous commercial and military ramifications.

It is undeniable that the striking aviation advancement of recent years has reoriented our national thinking to new conceptions of global geography, domestic and international trade, and political relations. With the obvious prospect for a substantial individual use of aircraft, there is a growing need for more general preparatory training for flying. Possible future military needs also make it mandatory that the youth of America be given an opportunity for practical study in the fundamentals of the science of aeronautics, not only for the protection of the principles of democracy, but for the continued leadership of our Nation in air commerce.

The sudden and tremendous expansion of aviation training made necessary during the recent war was inevitably expensive in every way. Such high emergency expenditures by the Government can be tempered by meeting the future aviation needs of the Nation through an orderly and progressive system of aviation training beginning at the grade-school level in every State. It is in these schools that the intelligent appreciation and understanding of the international, social, and political implications of airpower and its vital contribution to better relationship by the peoples of the world can and should commence. With congressional foresight today, the future of American aviation can be fostered and developed to a new and almost limitless economic frontier for tomorrow.

A bill to provide for a program of aeronautical training for the youth of America to insure a better understanding of the international, social, and political implications of airpower and its vital place in the future of world developments and to provide a trained backlog of pilots and technically qualified young manpower to meet the requirements of a national emergency

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Youth Flight Training Act of 1948."

SEC. 2. The Civil Aeronautics Administration (hereinafter referred to as the Administration) is authorized to inaugurate and conduct a program of assistance and guidance to elementary and secondary schools of the Nation in conducting courses in aviation subjects and flight training for youths from 16 to 20 years of age.

SEC. 3. Such program or training shall be conducted pursuant to such standards and regulations prescribed by the Administration from time to time: Provided, That in the administration of the act, such program or training may be conducted either through the use of the personnel and facilities of the Administration or by contracts with approved ground- and flight-training schools, educational institutions and other persons cooperating with the Administration in the conduct of such program and training (as defined in section 1 (27) of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, as amended).

SEC. 4. For the purpose of carrying out its functions under this act, the Administration is authorized to exercise all powers conferred upon it by the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, as amended, and to appoint and fix a fair and reasonable compensation for experienced ground and flight instructors, airmen, medical, and other professional experts and examiners in training without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States.

SEC. 5. The Administration shall consult with any executive department or independent establishment of the Federal Government or State government in carrying out the purposes of this act and such agencies are hereby requested to cooperate with the Administration and may lend or transfer to the Administration, by contract or otherwise, or by request of the Administration may lend to ground and flight-training schools and educational institutions or other persons cooperating with the Administration in the conduct of such program and training, technical advisors, aircraft and other property or equipment, lands, facilities, and equipment under its control or in excess of its own requirements.

SEC. 6. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time such sums as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act. This act shall expire on July 1, 1953, and all contracts, leases, or other obligations entered into under this act shall expire on or prior to such date: Provided, That no alien shall receive training under the provisions of this act.

Jersey Standard's Infamy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article that appeared in the New York Post of August 5, 1948:

JERSEY STANDARD'S INFAMY

Mighty Standard Oil of New Jersey, the world's largest corporation, has been virtually convicted of treason in the United States courts.

It might not read that way in the news stories, but consider the implications of the recent Federal district court's ruling that while Standard could retain patents purchased from I. G. Farben in 1929, it would have to forfeit its claim to the patents allegedly taken over from the gangster German cartel in 1939.

This decision was tantamount to saying that Jersey Standard collaborated with the enemy during the war when it claimed to own certain patents which were really the property of Farben.

The story goes something like this:

Back in 1939, wily Farben executives realized that the day was fast approaching when the United States Government would seize their patents in America as enemy property unless precautionary measures were taken to conceal their German ownership.

Farben hastily called in its American junior partner, Jersey Standard, and went through various motions on paper which seemed to make Standard the owner of United States Farben property.

Dr. August von Knieriem, chief counsel for Farben, annoted his copy of the sham transaction with the words "Nachkriegs Camouflage" (postwar camouflage)—added evidence that Jersey Standard was obediently engaging in a colossal attempt to deceive its native country.

The United States was not easily deceived. During the war, it seized all of Jersey Standard's patents which it had reason to believe were the faintly disguised property of Farben.

Patents acted on by the Government included not only those which had ostensibly become Standard's in 1939 but some oil-refining patents which Standard had bought from Farben in 1929. The Government charged that these were being used in violation of the antitrust act. Standard relinquished them without necessarily admitting the Government's accusations.

After the war, Jersey Standard sued to regain the German patents from the Government, including those which it had nefariously plotted in 1939 to hold for Farben.

Using words like "sham," "furtiveness," and "deceit," the courts have supported the Government's contention that Jersey Standard has no claim to the patents covered by the '39 deal.

But the ruling which returns to Standard, under certain conditions, many of the patents purchased from Farben in 1929 illustrates that our antitrust laws must be strengthened.

Although it seems apparent that Standard bought these patents with clear intent to restrict the production of synthetic oil at home and thus assure its own dominance in the oil industry, existing laws apparently are not tough enough to take the patents away from Jersey Standard.

It would seem that if any corporation uses its exclusive control of a vital processing secret to limit competition, our laws should require the Government to take over the patent and offer it to all comers. Surely, a monopolistic wielding of a patent right should disqualify the corporation from its possession.

But it seems more than obvious that if we are to prevent foreign, and perhaps potentially hostile, firms from exerting undue control over our economy by entering into restrictive agreements with domestic corporations, we should require that the rights to any foreign patent purchased in this country must be made available to all United States industries.

The Government would probably have to set up a free-enterprise corporation to make sure that overseas patents contribute to maximum and unrestricted United States production.

This is the lesson of Jersey Standard's infamy.

He Has Given America Far More Than He Has Taken

OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege on many occasions, both on the floor of this Chamber and elsewhere, to pay tribute to a great American and distinguished statesman, the Honorable EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, of Illinois, and to express the regret that we all feel on his retirement from this body.

The loss which we will sustain on his leaving is well summed up in the following editorial which appeared August 4 in the Herald-News of Passaic, N. J., under the heading, "Congress Losing a Great Statesman":

CONGRESS LOSING A GREAT STATESMAN

A distinguished and very capable legislator from Illinois delivered last week what may go into the RECORD as his last address to Congress.

Representative EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN, at 52, is living refutation of the too-often-repeated and groundless charge that the average Member of Congress is a pompous fuddyduddy.

Some Members, certainly, are misfits in Congress. They legislate with one eye on their districts and the other on the rest of the country. Cold terror grips them when the time comes to vote and be recorded. They are of little real value either to themselves or their constituents.

But they are the exceptions, not the rule.

EVERETT DIRKSEN, a Republican with as many friends on the Democratic side of the House aisle as he has on his own, is leaving Congress at the end of this, his eighth, term because of failing eyesight, brought on by overwork.

Everyone in Congress knows that to be true. Democrats who in New Deal days tried to unseat him and failed, know that he could be reelected without campaigning, if he consented to accept renomination.

Mr. DIRKSEN came to Congress in 1933, and within two or three terms emerged as one of the truly strong men of the House. In recent years he has been an authoritative spokesman for the Republican leadership. More importantly, he has been a great legislator.

He is one of the best informed members of the appropriations and District of Columbia Committees, on which he serves, and his advice is sought by both Republicans and Democrats serving on other committees.

His Communism in Action, one of the most dispassionate, scholarly and at once devastating studies of its kind ever written, is a monumental piece of work. Congress thought it should be read by every American and appropriated money for printing and distributing hundreds of thousands of copies of it at Government expense.

Nearly every important measure that has passed the House in the last decade bears his imprimatur in the form of a Dirksen amendment.

The Dirksen amendment is always a clarifying, perfecting change, written by a keen student of the bill under discussion, and aimed successfully at having it accomplish precisely what it is supposed to accomplish.

The Republican Party can ill afford to lose EVERETT DIRKSEN at this time. The Democrats will miss him too, but the Nation will be the biggest loser.

He has given America far more than he has taken.

President Truman's Special-Session Call

OF
HON. HOMER A. RAMEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George E. Sokolsky:

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

The powers of the President of the United States are enormous. Although the authors of the Constitution sought to limit those powers by various checks and balances, the authority of the President has, in 161 years, expanded until he can, if he desires, be the most powerful ruler in the world.

This expansion has been accelerated by two wars and a series of emergencies between.

Heretofore, Presidents have restrained themselves in the use of their powers, recognizing the spirit of our system, which is basically that the policy of government is determined by the Congress, while the administration is in the hands of the President.

Not one of them, not even Franklin D. Roosevelt, ever used all his powers to promote his personal political fortunes. Roosevelt ran four times, but during his campaigns he only occasionally forgot that at such a time he was a candidate as well as a President.

Harry Truman has called the present special session of Congress only for the purpose of embarrassing his opponent, Thomas E. Dewey. Obviously, Dewey cannot control the Eightieth Congress, which is only adequately Republican in the House of Representatives. In the Senate, the Republicans have only a nominal majority for organization purposes.

Actually, that majority often sank to so low a figure that Republican leadership had to depend on Democrats to put their program through.

Until Governor Dewey is elected President, his influence over even the Republican Members of Congress must be indirect.

As a matter of practice, no party ever controls either House of Congress unless it can pass measures over the President's veto. Every bill that was passed over Harry Truman's veto was passed by a large quota of Democratic votes.

Harry Truman knows that, just as Herbert Hoover knew how weak the Presidency can be with a President of one party and a Congress of another.

Yet, Truman has devoted himself to the denunciation of the Eightieth Congress as the worst in American history, which is silly to anyone who has ever read any American history, which Harry Truman may never have done.

At any rate, he has reconvoked this "worst Congress" to do what it has refused to do for 2 years, namely, to carry through Harry Truman's omnibus program, which can wreck the economy of the United States.

In a word, he convokes the "worst Congress" to carry out his worst program.

Neither Truman nor any of his advisers want Congress to pass his program. They would not know what to do with such a program or where to get the money to carry it through or how to administer it.

It is simply a public relations program, designed to satisfy every pressure group but not to serve America.

Yet it has tremendous nuisance value. Neither the Democratic nor the Republican Party is prepared to tell the pressure groups to be damned. They, therefore, play on the fringes of the impossible. So Harry Truman throws the book at them and demands that they go ahead full steam.

If they don't he will accuse them of betraying the interests of each special group—Negroes, veterans, farmers, labor leaders, Zionists, anti-Zionists, anyone you can think of.

If they do, conditions will become unstable and he will accuse the Eightieth Congress of ruining the United States. Either way, he will put the responsibility on Tom Dewey, who, having no direct power until he is elected, cannot lawfully do anything either legislatively or administratively.

So that is the trick, and a cheap, snide one it is. Nothing beneficial for the country will be accomplished by it. In fact, in the face of a world crisis, a general election places heavy spiritual burdens upon the country and makes the conduct of administration difficult.

Truman at such a time divides the country, angers large segments of its people, creates emotional disturbances, and all for the purpose of partisan politics. No other President has heretofore made the abuse of Congress his principal weapon.

Truman is driven to this course by his fear of Henry Wallace, who has become a ghastly complex in his life. If Wallace has done this country no other harm, he has wrought havoc in his psychological effect upon its President.

Comparison of Programs for the Special Session of the President and Philip Murray, President of the CIO

OF
HON. WILLIAM J. CROW
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. CROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

CONGRESS MUST ACT ON DAY'S PROBLEMS

HERE IS THE TEXT OF A PROGRAM FOR CONGRESS PRESENTED TO PRESIDENT TRUMAN LAST WEEK BY CIO PRESIDENT PHILIP MURRAY

The special session of Congress must act upon the pressing problems of the day. Legislation on these problems has been formulated in most cases and, in all cases, can be passed without delay. The Congress of Industrial Organizations suggests that the President request legislation of this session on the following subjects:

1. Control of the cost of living by legislation which (a) freezes prices at recent levels, and (b) curbs by taxation the lust of huge corporations for exorbitant profits. The drive against monopolies must be intensified.

2. A comprehensive housing program, including public housing, slum clearance, low rent and rural projects, as set forth in the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill now before the House Rules Committee.

3. Repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act which experience shows as a promoter of industrial discord.

4. A wage bill providing for an immediate minimum of 75 cents, with increases by industry committee action up to $1 per hour, as provided in the Thomas-McCormack bill.

5. Federal aid to education, as provided in S. 472 now pending before the House Labor Committee.

6. Civil-rights legislation, including FEPC, antipoll tax, and antilynching and antisegregation in the military, as proposed in the platforms of the two parties.

7. Improvement of our social-security program by the extension and increase by 50 percent of the benefits, as provided in the McGrath bill.

8. A national-health program on social insurance principles.

9. Adjustment of veterans' benefits to meet the price increases which imperil their living standards and opportunities.

10. Amendment to the Displaced Persons Act to remove discrimination against religious groups.

11. A farm program, geared to a full economy, including price support, farm credit, soil conservation, and improvement of rural-living standards.

12. Approval of the United Nations building loan, now before the House of Representatives.

HOW CLOSELY PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S STATEMENTS IN HIS MESSAGE TO CONGRESS PARALLEL PHILIP MURRAY'S CIO DEMANDS UPON HIM

1 (a). I recommend that price control be authorized for scarce commodities which basically affect essential industrial production or the cost of living.

1 (b). I recommend that an excess profits tax be reestablished.

2. I have recommended time and time again that the Congress pass a comprehensive housing bill. This Congress can complete action on this comprehensive housing bill in a few days. And I strongly urge that it do so.

3. The next Congress should take * * * up immediately * * * a fair and sound labor-management relations law—in place of the Taft-Hartley law, which has proved to be unfair and unsound and which should be repealed.

4. I urgently recommend that the minimum wage be raised to at least 75 cents an hour.

5. The Congress should provide Federal assistance to the States in meeting the present crisis in education.

6. I again urge upon the Congress the measures I recommended last February to protect and extend basic civil rights of citizenship and human liberty.

7. I urge also that action be taken by the Congress to relieve * * * the people who depend upon the benefits being paid under the old-age and survivors-insurance system. * * * I urge that (benefits) be increased by at least 50 percent (and) that the protection of this system * * * be extended to the millions who are not now covered.

8. The next Congress should take * * * up immediately a comprehensive health program, based on health insurance.

10. The Displaced Persons Act * * * should be promptly amended to wipe out * * * discriminations.

11. The next Congress should take * * * up immediately * * * a real long-range farm program.

12. Legislation can and should be passed at once to authorize a loan by the United States Government to the United Nations, for the construction of its headquarters buildings in New York City.

General Pershing—Soldier of Liberty

OF
HON. SOL BLOOM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to insert an editorial entitled "General Pershing—Soldier of Liberty." This editorial appeared in all Hearst newspapers from coast to coast, and was written by my friend, Harry H. Schlacht.

The editorial follows:

GENERAL PERSHING—SOLDIER OF LIBERTY

(By Harry H. Schlacht)

As he died to make men holy
So he fought to make men free.

Our Nation mourns the death of Gen. John J. Pershing, our supreme commander of World War I.

To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die.

None of the beautiful eulogies, none of the tender tributes spoken or written by man, can add one leaf to his laurel wreath, one star to his crown of glory, one inch to his lofty eminence.

He was a soldier of human liberty.

The historian who is to come after us to record the events of this age will linger in reverent admiration over the career of this great American.

He was a product of our democracy.

No nobler example of the rise and progress of a humble citizen to greatness and a nation's gratitude, is anywhere presented to us than that of Gen. John J. Pershing.

The glory of his achievements is an epic. The epic of his gallantry will live in the patriotic literature of civilization.

He fulfilled our promises. He sustained our traditions. He added to the majesty of our country.

General Pershing was a great American He was a soldier's soldier. He was a symbol of American courage. He was a representative of a great race.

He was a man of whom any civilization could be justly proud.

Beyond the sea where men enjoy liberty, beyond the ages where men will live as free men, there will descend upon his memory the benediction of their heartfelt prayers.

Today his spirit mingles with those who died that this Nation might be born, with those who felt that this Nation might be saved, with those who made the supreme sacrifice, that our flag might float in the sunlight of liberty.

He is lifted aloft amidst the chanting music of the angels to the land of eternal day.

General Pershing's body will rest in Arlington Cemetery, near the grave of the Unknown Soldier who fought under him.

Kissed by the sun of the day, watched by the stars of the night, will float the Stars and Stripes in salute to him who fought for it.

May his spirit ever guide us with a truer and nobler courage, to stand as soldiers should stand, in the battle for the preservation of our liberties.

In the sublime words of Vergil, in his Aeneid, let us say: "While the rivers run into the sea, while the mountain's shadows move over the slopes, while heaven feeds the stars, ever shall thy honor, thy name, and thy praises endure."

Broadcast of George E. Reedy

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, the Arrowhead radio network services a large part of Wisconsin and Minnesota. Its Washington manager and news commentator is George E. Reedy, one of the foremost newspaper and radio newsmen in the Nation's Capital. Mr. Reedy is objective, factual, honest, and fair and his comments have never been challenged as purely partisan. Recently Mr. Reedy interviewed Hon. JOSEPH MARTIN in the Speaker's office in the Capitol. This interview was recorded and forms part of a broadcast by Mr. Reedy over the Arrowhead network. I include it as part of these remarks.

Good evening, this is George Reedy, your Arrowhead network reporter in Washington—the Nation's and news Capitol of the world.

I have a little success story for you tonight, folks. It's about a guy named Joe. The son of a village blacksmith, a newsboy at 5 years of age, owner and publisher of a small-town newspaper at 24. He's 63 years old today—and a bachelor—and administers one of the most important posts in the Congress of the United States. But I'd like to start at the beginning.

About all that "little" Joe ever did, was brush the flies off the horses while his old man did the shoeing. Little Joe never actually worked at his father's trade. But he grew up to have his old man's squat build.

And in the politician business which Joe took up, he has always worked in the manner of a blacksmith—a nail here, a nail there, working most of the time close to the ground.

It was as good a method as any. The voters in his district began sending him to Congress in 1924, and they've kept it up without a break ever since. His Republican Party was beaten to a whisper by Franklin Roosevelt, but his people kept on sending Joe back.

In 1938 he took over the leadership of his defeated GOP in the House. The New Dealers foiled—and jeered—him, but Joe kept in there pitching. Hard and consistent work, plus ability to make friends, as well as to lead, had put the totally unpretentious JOE MARTIN in an office frequently described as second only to the Presidency.

Mr. MARTIN—JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., that is—has a host of friends. He is a friendly man. Politically he is astute, and he knows the game from the ground up. He was chosen Speaker of the House, without opposition on the Republican side, in 1947, when the Republicans took over the House.

This meant he became a principal leader, in a Congress which had to make a constructive and satisfactory record, a record on which the Republican Party could go to the people in the national election this year.

Before adjournment this summer, a remarkable record had been set up. A new labor-management law—the Taft-Hartley—had been passed over a Presidential veto. An income-tax-reduction bill had been put through, and the portal-to-portal pay bill was enacted into law, too.

Speaker MARTIN has held the Republicans well into line. Where they have needed Democratic assistance to pass some of their measures over a veto, Mr. MARTIN has been able to get it.

After the 1946 congressional elections, in which the Republicans were land-slided into control of both House and Senate, President Truman announced he would cooperate with the Republican Congress, and expressed hope it would cooperate with him.

Mr. MARTIN, speaking for the Republicans of the House, promptly said the Republicans would cooperate too. It all sounded very pleasant, and in the interest of good government. But it hasn't worked out that way.

Mr. Truman would have none of the Republican labor and tax laws; and he opposed reductions of appropriations beyond the budget he sent to Capitol Hill. The Republican Congress, for its part, turned thumbs down on the many New Deal social bills and proposals which Mr. Truman recommended be passed.

Mr. MARTIN, however, has kept his feet on the ground. He has been able to get things done on the domestic side, despite the opposition of Mr. Truman. And he has accomplished a lot, too, on the side of foreign policy, lining up Republicans for the European recovery program; for the aid to Greece, and Turkey, and Italy, when many of them were ready to balk.

JOE MARTIN is of Scotch-Irish blood, and his home—has been all his life—in North Attleboro, Mass., where he still owns and operates the Evening Chronicle. In Washington, JOE MARTIN lives at the famed Hay-Adams House, across Lafayette Park from the White House.

He never shuts off his phone at night, with the result that he is frequently awakened early in the morning by correspondents and others seeking news, or just in need of conversation. He doesn't mind. "I go right back to sleep," he says.

JOE MARTIN is casual, genial, and he wears well.

I am talking to you folks from the Speaker's office, the office of Speaker JOE MARTIN—he is "Joe" to his friends and constituents, he is "Mr. Speaker" to the correspondents in the Nation's Capitol—and they are his friends too. The Speaker's office has a high, vaulted ceiling, and elaborate crystal chandelier; thick red rug, and pictures of staring, bearded, long-dead Congressmen.

Sitting across the spacious desk from me at another microphone, is the Speaker himself—Mr. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

Mr. Speaker, I know the many thousands of listeners in the audiences of the stations of the Arrowhead Network would appreciate hearing from you, the answers to several questions I've prepared. For instance:

There is a general impression that the President called this session of Congress, to gain "political" advantage for the Democratic Party. Do you think he has succeeded?

Mr. MARTIN. No, George. I don't believe the President will make any political hay from the special session. In the first instance, the call was so obviously a political move that it has been accepted on that basis by the general public.

And, incidentally, it has been universally condemned. We do see several things beneficial to the country relative to inflation and housing—these things we will do before we adjourn.

Mr. REEDY. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Republicans, of course, already have a working majority in the House. Do you believe that that majority will be increased—or decreased—to any great extent in the coming elections?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, George. We are going to make gains in this coming election. Some people think the gains will run as high as 20 to 25 notwithstanding the fact that we already have a substantial majority.

Mr. REEDY. Mr. Speaker, President Truman has indicated his intention of making the Taft-Hartley Labor Act a major issue in the campaign. Do you think that he will be able to pick up large blocs of labor votes on that issue?

Mr. MARTIN. No; the labor vote cannot be delivered by any group of individuals. Labor is more independent in its voting than many people believe.

Mr. REEDY. Mr. Speaker, do you think the Wallace third party will be able to show much strength in the November elections—and establish itself as a permanent political party?

Mr. MARTIN. Well, George, of course the campaign developments will determine in large measure what will be the strength of the third party. At the moment, I think it will run much larger than most people anticipate. Whether they become a permanent third party, will, in a large measure, depend not only on the vote in November—but on other developments which come within the Democratic Party.

Mr. REEDY. Mr. Speaker, assuming that Mr. Dewey is elected in November, and the Republicans maintain control of the House and Senate, what do you believe is the major task facing your party at the next session?

Mr. MARTIN. Well, George, we are going to inherit, of course, a good many difficulties, a good many problems very serious in nature both at home and abroad. I think that the first thing we have got to do, is put the country on a sound, solid basis both at home and abroad. We must have economic policies that will keep America financially strong; true American ideals so that we can bring more prosperity and happiness to the people of America, and that we may—through that healthy condition—be able to do our full part toward the people in other countries of the world.

America has got tremendous responsibilities ahead, and we have got to be strong and solvent in order to accomplish what we should do for the world. Wisely led, America, in my judgment, can look forward to years of greater happiness and a more glorious future than this country has ever had.

Mr. REEDY. Mr. Speaker, to switch to the international field. Do you think there are any prospects of this country coming to some sort of an understanding with Russia—at least some kind of an understanding that will maintain peace for a long time to come?

Mr. MARTIN. That, of course, George, is a difficult question to answer. But I say we must devote every effort to reach an understanding. Another war would be disastrous to everybody—America, and everybody in the world. It must be avoided if humanly possible. The best statesmanship of America must be directed to that end.

Mr. REEDY. The press, Mr. Speaker, has recently been filled with statements by public officials that this country is headed for a major bust. In other words, a depression. Do you think that is a real danger? And if so, what do you think we should do about it?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, George. Of course there is a real danger. After many years of great prosperity a bust is always generally anticipated, but it need not come. Wise, fair, and honest economic policies can prevent a major crash, and that is, too, one of our greatest tasks in the next administration.

Mr. REEDY. There are two things that just occurred to me, Mr. Speaker. One of them was with reference to the current exposé or spy investigations being conducted by two congressional committees on Capitol Hill. I wonder if you would care to comment on that?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, George. I don't mind commenting on that at all. You, yourself, can well remember that for the last 10 or 12 years, I have seen this danger. I have pointed it out frequently in many of my talks and tried to arouse the American people to these dangers.

As a matter of fact, in those days, many of the commentators and columnists and many of the newspapers that are now decrying the situation, brushed us off and thought we were seeing things.

Now, obviously, it is a real danger and a real menace to the country. People have got to awaken to the fact that their liberty can be threatened by this menace here in America. We are not so much afraid of them coming from abroad, but we are afraid of those boring from within the United States in leading Government positions where they can influence our positions both in the economic field at home, and our foreign relations.

These hearings have been very illuminating, and indicate the American people have got to wake up to the fact that they have got to clean these Reds and fellow-travelers out of the Government and make this country a real American country.

Mr. REEDY. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. And now, folks, until this very same time next week, this is George Reedy, your Arrowhead network reporter in the Nation's and the news Capital of the world, saying good night from Washington.

Still Time To Act on Margarine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AIME J. FORAND

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of August 5, 1948:

STILL TIME TO ACT ON MARGARINE

The Republican leadership in Congress has decided to hurry action on a limited bill to restrict credit and on a modified housing program, and try to adjourn this week-end or early next week.

This is just a reminder that the margarine-tax repeal bill is on the calendar of the Senate and can be called up at any time. This was a session called for the purpose of trying to combat the high cost of living. Everybody wants something done about that. Here, then, the Senate has within its grasp the power to relieve 40,000,000 households from the burden of paying discriminatory and excessive taxes on a wholesome and much-needed substitute for high-priced butter.

There's still time for the Senators to quit paying lip service to a worthy measure and act on it.

Truman and Barkley Both Voted Against Abolishing the Poll Tax

OF

HON. ALBERT L. REEVES, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, it came as a surprise to read that both Mr. Truman and Senator BARKLEY voted to retain the poll tax, and not abolish it, on the only occasion on which the subject was considered by the Senate. John O'Donnell tells the story in his column in the Washington Times-Herald for August 6, 1948. As a part of my remarks I include a portion of his article as follows:

CAPITOL STUFF

(By John O'Donnell)

Some of our solicitous and helpful readers are writing in to suggest that this Washington weather must be getting us down, that we're becoming a sourpuss, a bilious old meanie and reveal a surly temper when we look with a sour eye on Harry Truman's current breast beating for civil rights and abolition of the poll tax.

Well, we'll break down and admit the worst. We think Truman's so-called civil-rights program is strictly political, that he's beating the drums for it now merely to lure the radical fringe of the New Deal away from Wallace and back into the Roosevelt-Truman fold and that under his hide Harry Truman of Missouri feels the same today on these issues as he did when he was in the Senate.

And on this point we suggest that political minds be improved by getting down the back volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and rereading the proceedings in the Senate on the hot afternoon of August 25, 1942.

We had millions of men in uniform at that time and the big question was in providing methods by which the service men and women could vote in the coming general elections in November.

That afternoon Republican Senator C. WAYLAND BROOKS, of Illinois, called up his amendment to the soldiers' vote bill.

The Brooks amendment read:

"No person in military service in time of war shall be required as a condition of voting in any election for President, Vice President, elector for President or Vice President, or for Senators or Members of the House of Representatives to pay any poll tax or other tax or make any other payment to any State or political subdivision thereof."

The Brooks amendment passed, 33 to 20.

But how do you think the then Senator from Missouri voted? A lusty, booming "No."

And how do you think his present running mate of the Democratic Presidential ticket, the Honorable "Dear ALBEN" BARKLEY, of Kentucky, voted? A rich, sonorous "Nay."

The liberal Democrats that afternoon went along with a solid Republican front to put the anti-poll-tax measure across. Democrats such as Senator (now United States Judge) Bone, of Washington; the late David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts; McCarran, of Nevada; Jim Mead, of New York; Bob Reynolds, of North Carolina, joined up with GOP Senators Taft, Bridges, Brooks, Lodge, Vandenberg, Wiley, and the rest to kill the poll-tax restrictions on soldier voting.

But not Truman and BARKLEY. They stuck with Georgia's DICK RUSSELL (the Dixiecrat favorite at the Philadelphia convention) and the rest of the poll-tax supporters—TOM CONNALLY, of Texas; MCKELLAR, of Tennessee; ANDREWS, of Florida; GEORGE, of Georgia, and the others.

Now this flip-flop by Truman on the poll-tax issue doesn't mean that High Tax Harry, the Democratic Presidential candidate of 1948, has changed his fundamental view since the days when he was Harry the Pendergast boy from Missouri up in the United States Senate. It means that Harry, the politician, has got a bad case of the jitters, is dismayed (as well he should be) at the utter collapse and confusion of his administration and can't even remember today his stand on important issues only a few years back.

Civil-Rights Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. ABERNETHY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I would like to include a statement on the civil-rights issue by George E. Sokolsky which appeared in the New York Sun. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, this article was called to my attention by one of my most valuable constituents, Mr. J. T. Rone, of Ethel, Miss. I commend the same to the serious consideration of those who advocate the so-called civil-rights bill.

The statement of Mr. Sokolsky, as it appeared in the New York Sun, is as follows:

CIVIL-RIGHTS CRY SCORED AS PHONY

(By George E. Sokolsky)

By what is euphemistically called civil rights in this campaign is meant the Negro question. And let us call it that from here on. Since the Civil War the Negro question has been a major American problem inadequately discussed and considered except by southerners who had to live with it and in recent years by the Communists and their fellow-travelers and competing liberals who hope to garner votes out of it.

Under our Constitution and within the sanctions of moral law, the legal equality of Negroes and whites cannot be questioned. Historically and traditionally the question is not so simple either in the North or South. Those northern Democrats who make such a terrific to-do about racial discrimination in the South will not live in Negro areas in their cities; they do not entertain Negroes in their homes; they do not hire Negro secretaries or clerks, except political ones which is a part of the vote-getting technique; they do not encourage association between their children and Negro children.

In a word, none of them practice in their private lives what they preach for others.

It is a simple matter for a resident of Minnesota or Wisconsin to grow powerfully indignant about a problem that does not face him but that does face a citizen of Alabama or Mississippi. Minnesota's Negro population, according to the 1940 census, was 9,928; Wisconsin's, 12,158; Alabama's, 983,290; Mississippi's, 1,074,578.

If the Civil War had not ended in the reconstruction era, during which Thaddeus Stevens created an unassimilable minority for political advantage, we should perhaps today not be facing this problem as the principal campaign issue of 1948. Perhaps, had Abraham Lincoln not been assassinated, the emancipated Negro slave would have been brought into American life without malice, with charity for all.

But that did not happen. Instead, the northern carpetbagger and his Negro associates left in the South a heritage of bitterness which has continued to the present time. Franklin D. Roosevelt tried to solve this problem by exporting Negroes from the South to the North, placing them on relief rolls, and forcing them into industrial enterprises on a quota basis. Thus, in many northern and western areas the Negro population increased startlingly.

The northerners met the problem by segregating Negroes into ghettoes. Make no mistake about that: In the North the Negro is as segregated as in the South. Harlem is a Negro ghetto; the Bedford district of Brooklyn is a Negro ghetto; the South Side of Chicago is a Negro ghetto. The technique employed in New York is for the whites to clear out as soon as the Negro moves in. If you want to see that process at work, you can study it, if you are so inclined, in the east Bronx of New York.

I am not justifying these conditions either on moral or legal grounds; I am only describing conditions as they exist, and I am protesting against lies and liars. The politicians who are shrieking civil rights are seeking Negro votes in the northern cities. They are appealing to prejudice and indignation and they are fanning the flames of race antagonisms not because they want to improve the condition of the Negro in Mississippi but because they want the votes of the Negro in Harlem and south Chicago.

The anxiety of the northern Democrats to be recorded as voting for the civil-rights plank of the Democratic platform, after a voice vote had passed it, their insistence upon Senator BARKLEY'S announcement of how they voted was for the consumption of the northern Negro voter. They fear that if they do not get that vote, Wallace, who represents Soviet racial concepts, will.

Were that the entire story, it would be little more than an appeal for the Irish, the Jewish, or the Italian vote. But this Negro question is pitched on a high emotional level and can result in riots and death. It requires thoughtful and considerate handling. It requires sympathy and understanding. It comes upon us acutely when we dare not have internal disturbances. Those who have gambled upon it may also have gambled upon the domestic peace of the United States.

The Consumer's Pocketbook

OF

HON. GEORGE P. MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Hugh B. Mitchell, of Bremerton, Wash., on July 29, 1948:

It's good to be here in Bremerton. It's good to be home in Puget Sound country. I say that with feeling, for I have just recently returned from Philadelphia and the Democratic National Convention, and the heat and humidity of a climate that doesn't compare with ours.

At the Democratic National Convention we adopted a platform with specific recommendations for action.

It was my privilege to serve with Senator Myers, of Pennsylvania; Senator Green, of Rhode Island; Senator Lucas, of Illinois; Mayor Humphrey, of Minneapolis; and other national leaders who were fellow members of the preliminary platform drafting committee. As we worked on platform wording all day, and often all night, we were conscious of a responsibility to the American people. We believed we were not merely compiling words, but drafting a program of action.

The Republicans have a platform, too—now being tested in the special session of Congress.

The American people in 1948 have the chance to see how the political platform system works. They will be able to rebuke the political party which makes empty promises.

That is why the eyes and ears of the Nation are turned toward the special session of Congress.

President Truman has made a reasoned and forthright demand for legislative action—action to deal with the most urgent problems before the Nation.

I believe the great majority of citizens here and elsewhere throughout the country endorse the President's stand. His was an act of the highest courage and statesmanship.

Of course there are cries of "politics." But no cry of "politics" can dispel the hard fact that these problems are here—that they must be dealt with promptly. To linger and delay is to court economic hardship and disaster.

The President placed inflation control first on the list of legislative tasks to be done. Specific measures to curb high living costs are first in the order of urgency. The American people today are caught in a terrific high-price squeeze. This price squeeze threatens to become tighter and tighter until it may choke the whole economy.

The facts and figures tell a dreary, discouraging tale. The consumers' price index of the Department of Labor has climbed 72 percent above the 1935–39 average. Since price control was discarded in 1946, prices for consumer goods have risen almost 30 percent.

These figures are conservative. Taken as a national average, they do not reflect local differences. In the Seattle-Bremerton area the cost of living shows up substantially higher than for the Nation at large. And food costs, a major item in the family budget, run far ahead of the price average for all consumer items.

Nor do statistics tell the actual story of the day-to-day problem of the average family—the alarming drain on family resources, the extra work to make ends meet, the lagging wages of the family breadwinner in the face of rising household costs. The pitifully small wage increases for Government workers, for example, do not even begin to meet the high-price demands on family living. The pay raises granted by Congress to Federal workers are only token increases but the families of these Federal workers cannot live on tokens.

The Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress, shamed by the results of its earlier indiscretion in letting prices run wild, has clamped down on the statistical services of the Department of Labor—services which constitute a barometer of our economic condition. The Congress apparently hopes to conceal from the American people the economic facts of life. Funds for the important services of the Department of Labor have been cut to the bone, and the Department has been ripped to pieces.

Smashing the price barometer does not change the economic weather. Every housewife, every wage earner, every salaried worker, knows what the Republicans in Congress would like the Nation to forget—that prices are moving steadily up and up toward the danger zone. The cost of living is the highest in history, and there is no relief in sight unless the Congress acts and acts promptly.

High prices have flattened the pocketbooks of American consumers. High prices have cut the pay envelopes of wage earners and eaten up family savings. Many household essentials are now bought on credit. The startling increase in consumer credit means that as high prices cut into the family pocketbook, the wages of tomorrow must be pledged to buy the necessities of today.

The responsibility for action lies with the present Republican Congress. It has an opportunity to act in the special session called by the President. The Congress may refuse to act but it cannot dodge the responsibility for inaction. If it does not act, it must face the consequences. This Republican Congress will have to answer to the American people in November.

Judging from the responses to date, the Republican leadership will not heed the President's recommendations. Republican leaders whine and wail that the President plays politics. They simply cannot grasp the size of the problem and the magnitude of the danger confronting the Nation.

Some of these Republicans want to adjourn the session at once. Others say they will consider the Executive request for legislative action.

Consideration is not enough. Consideration without action is useless. The Eightieth Congress has had 2 years to consider the problems of inflation. The studies have been made. Needed only is the will to act—to act promptly—to act for the welfare of the whole Nation.

The stark ugly truth reflected in the antics of the Republican leadership is this: Rather than establish the minimum and necessary inflation controls proposed by the President, the Republicans prefer to take a desperate gamble with economic depression.

The Republicans have been gambling for the past two years. But now time is running out for the American people. We can gamble no more.

When the Republicans took control of the Congress in 1946, they knew that if price controls could be junked overnight, prices would shoot up and billions would be transferred at one stroke from the pockets of American consumers to the pockets of those for whom the Republican Party was working.

Of course this terrific inflationary gamble threatened to bring economic ruin in its wake. But why expect the Republican majority to put human need before dollars?

Before the American people had time to turn around from the toil and struggle of war, and readjust their ways of living to peace, their modest savings were eaten up and their wages were cut in half because prices were allowed to run riot. By discarding price control the Republican Party started a wild scramble to cash in on the need and hunger for peacetime goods before production could be reorganized to meet the pilled-up demand.

Time and again as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate I tried to reason with the opponents of price control. They said blandly that the end of controls would bring a splurge of goods, and prices would soon settle down through the normal processes of competition.

Today we have the goods, the shelves are full, but prices have not settled down. Prices are high and going higher. This means that less and less goods will move from the store shelves into the home, and the pipe lines of industry will be clogged all the way back to the producer. The end result of growing inflation is economic disaster.

American consumers and wage earners carry more than the burden of high prices thrust onto them by the Republicans.

They carry the burden of the Taft-Hartley Act which was framed by the Republican Party and its big-business advisers to harass and hinder unions, to weaken the bargaining power of organized labor.

They carry the burden of higher rents and slums and overcrowded housing because the majority in Congress heeded the persuasions of the real-estate lobby and refused to budge on housing legislation.

They carry the burdens of power shortages and loss of new farms and industries because the majority in Congress heeded the persuasions of the private power lobby and put all manner of obstacles in the path of western development.

They carry the burdens of unfair tax laws which favor the well-to-do and give no real relief to the tax bill of the average family.

On the subject of taxation, let me say that the Republican Party drove down the tax rates for the wealthy to achieve a deliberate and coldblooded aim—added campaign contributions. A fund-raising pamphlet issued by the Republican National Committee bluntly states:

"Don't count on winning this year by throwing peanuts to the elephant. The Republican Congress did more than provide a few peanuts for the harassed taxpayer. Many of our friends feel that, entirely apart from other considerations, the least they can do is to contribute a substantial part of their tax savings for this year."

As our esteemed Senator BARKLEY commented, this was "a bill for services rendered." These were services rendered by the Republican Party for its wealthy friends. The people at large got from the Republican Party only a bill of pains and penalties.

The American people deserve a better destiny than the Republicans hold in store for them. After the sacrifice and suffering of war our people are entitled to a decent share of the fruits of peace. We should be able to look ahead with confidence and work toward a prosperous and happy future for ourselves and our children.

The limited inflation controls sought by the President and the Democratic Party are necessary today only because the Republican Party failed to permit an orderly adjustment of prices in the transition from war to peace. The Republican Party refused to see that the end of battle did not spell the end of all problems. It refused to see that we could not produce for peace overnight any more than we could prepare for war overnight.

But the Republican Party let prices go suddenly free and now we face the difficult and unpleasant task of rectifying their errors and making up for their failures. If you want a hard job, just try to make up for Republican Party failures.

In the light of the past record, it looks like the Republican congressional leaders will sit on their hands and do nothing about inflation and the high cost of living. Their only activity will be to hurl the old complaints they made in fighting price control 2 years ago. They will try to shift the blame to President Truman for their own ill-advised handiwork.

The American people know now what the issues are and where the responsibility lies. Time is running out, as I have said, while the fires of inflation burn more strongly than ever. Republican refusal to act in the special session leaves us only the records of the ballot box in November.

Then, the American people will have something very definite to say about their own future. They will give a mandate that will not be misinterpreted and betrayed, as the Republican Party has done with the mandate of 1946. For this time the voters of America will place their mandate in the trust of those upon whom they can rely to carry it out. They will return a Democratic President and elect a Democratic majority in Congress.

A "Yes" or "No" Answer Was Called for Here

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. DAVIS
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Elizabeth T. Bentley, a self-confessed former member of the Communist Party and former Soviet spy, in her testimony before a congressional committee last week referred to one Mary Watkins Price, now of Greensboro, N. C., as one of those implicated by the amazing and startling testimony of Miss Bentley.

A Greensboro newspaper, the Greensboro Record, undertook to find out if this Miss Price is a member of the Communist Party. Their representative was unable to get this information, according to the Greensboro Record. The Atlanta Journal published an editorial in a recent issue carrying some very pertinent remarks concerning Miss Price's evasion of the two simple questions: "Are you a Communist?" and "Have you ever been a Communist?" Under leave previously granted, I insert this editorial from the Atlanta Journal herewith.

A "yes" or "no" answer is becoming increasingly difficult for some people to give, these days. Latest among those unable to answer simple questions with a straightforward monosyllabic answer is Miss Mary Watkins Price, chairman of the Progressive (Henry Wallace) Party in North Carolina, who was implicated last week in Communist espionage activities by Elizabeth T. Bentley, a self-confessed former Soviet spy.

Miss Bentley charged that Miss Price, while the latter was serving as confidential secretary to Columnist Walter Lippman, took information from Mr. Lippmann's private files and turned it over to Communist leaders in this country. Miss Price, from her home in Greensboro, N. C., first shunted aside the charge by describing it as "the most fantastic thing I've ever heard." Later in a formal statement she contended that Miss Bentley's charge was "an obvious effort to discredit the great new Progressive Party," and added gratuitously that big business had long controlled the state and its political life and that it would "apparently go to any lengths to try to maintain that control."

The Greensboro Record then asked Miss Price two simple questions and requested a "yes" or "no" answer. The questions: "Are you a Communist?" and "Have you ever been a Communist? A "yes" or "no" answer to those questions should require no great degree of intelligence. But here is Miss Price's answer: "Let's not get into all that. I have contacted my lawyer. He will say anything further that needs to be said."

We have no knowledge of whether Miss Bentley's story is true in its entirety, partly true, or a fabric of the whole cloth. But we do know that Miss Price had an opportunity to state frankly and promptly whether or not she was a Communist and that she did not so state. She further had an opportunity to deny Miss Bentley's charges but chose instead merely to brush them aside as "fantastic" while, at the same time, taking a verbal swing at "big business" which, apparently, she wants to charge with discrediting the Progressive Party.

It is not big business that discredits the Progressive Party; it is the Progressive Party's intimates—the Communists—who are performing that favor with no need of assistance. Miss Price may be no more a Communist, or a former Communist, than Henry Wallace, but, like Henry, she is letting the Communists use her, wittingly or unwittingly. And, in the last analysis, if it can achieve that result, the Communist Party probably doesn't care whether her name is on the party rolls or not.

Communist Taint Will Hurt the Progressive Party Chances

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Ernest Lindley that appeared in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle of August 5, 1948:

NEWS BEHIND THE NEWS—COMMUNIST TAINT WILL HURT PROGRESSIVE PARTY CHANCES

(By Ernest Lindley)

As was expected, the Communist Party of the United States has formally endorsed the Wallace-Taylor ticket. Two or three months ago there were rumors in left-wing circles that the Communists might throw Wallace overboard. If these had any real basis, it might have been in passing doubt among the Communists about their ability to dominate completely the third party.

The general Communist trend in recent months has been away from united or "people's" front tactics. In eastern Europe the political leaders of other parties who joined with the Communists after the war have gradually been liquidated. And the Comintern is on the warpath against outright Communists of long standing if they betray nationalistic tendencies not to accept the full dictation of Moscow.

It is quite probable that if the American Communists had not been able to shape the Wallace movement to their satisfaction they would have withdrawn from it. Their grip on it was clearly demonstrated, however, at the third-party convention in Philadelphia. The efforts of a few unconsoled delegates to indicate that the Soviet Union's behavior since the war was not above criticism were speedily crushed. A set of rules was put through which materially help the Communists in maintaining the control of the third party in the future.

It is hard to believe that the Wallace movement contains anyone so blind as not to recognize Communist domination of the third party convention and machinery as a fact. Undoubtedly it does contain some who regard this as a passing phase, who were willing to accept the aid of the Communists in launching the third party this year in the belief or hope that by 1952 non-Communists can control it.

Nevertheless, the Progressive Party carries the now obvious and unmistakable Communist taint. It moves into the campaign with a foreign policy plank which might have been written by Molotov. These will drive back to the major parties many citizens who might otherwise be inclined to cast protest votes.

For additional reasons, it is unlikely that the Wallace-Taylor ticket will get as much of the vote of two minority groups as was deemed probable only a short time ago. The strong stand on civil rights taken by both major parties in their platforms, and by President Truman and Governor Dewey individually, will tend to hold the Negro vote. The stronger stand with respect to Palestine taken by the administration and advocated generally by Governor Dewey will tend to hold the Zionist vote away from the third party.

The latest Gallup poll gives Wallace 5 percent of the total popular vote. This would be between 2,500,000 and 3,000,000 votes. In the light of the factors listed above, Wallace's anticipated vote is more likely to shrink than to grow between now and election time.

Excess Profits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELLSWORTH B. BUCK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of August 7, 1948:

EXCESS PROFITS

Although there is not the slightest chance that Congress will pass the administration's excess-profits-tax bill, its introducion focuses attention on the question of the effectiveness of this kind of tax as a means of curing inflation. The Washington Post believes that the arguments for prompt repeal of the wartime excess-profits tax are as valid today as they were in 1945 when the Secretary of the Treasury, who was then Fred M. Vinson, declared that it was too erratic a tax engine to turn loose for even one full year of the postwar period.

It was true then and it is true today that a tax of this nature discourages new investment and thus retards industrial expansion. During the war, with efforts concentrated on production for war, the inhibiting effect of the excess-profits tax was welcomed as a means of holding down production of goods not essential to the war effort. After the war ended, the necessity of speeding up reconversion called for removal of a tax of this kind. And that removal has contributed importantly to the present high state of industrial activity.

The Washington Post recently pointed out that reimposition of excess-profits taxes might—indeed, almost certainly would—result in a reversion to the wartime practice of distributing a greater share of earnings in the form of salaries and other emoluments to officers and workers. Resistance to demands for further wage increases would be weakened, incentives to increase productive efficiency, stimulated by hope of profits, would be impaired, and the end result might well be higher rather than lower prices for a reduced volume of goods.

If there were convincing evidence that current profits point to unscrupulous profiteering, reimposition of excess profits taxes would be justified, despite the dangerous potentialities of such a method of control. But there is no such evidence; on the contrary, the Department of Commerce states that after allowance for inventory-valuation adjustments 1947 corporate profits before taxes represented about the same proportion of total income originating in corporate business as they did in 1929 and were below the comparable wartime peak. Moreover, profits after taxes either before or after inventory-valuation adjustment represented a lower percentage of income originating in corporate business in 1947 than in 1929. For the present year to date, profit levels are slightly above the average of 1947 but below the level of the last quarter of 1947. It is also worth noting that profits after Federal taxes per dollar of sales were lower in the first quarter of 1948 than they were in 1947 in case of all but very large corporations that presumably benefit from the economies of large-scale production.

The next Congress might well undertake an analysis of the profits statements of large corporations whose price policies set the standards for competitors and whose prices are to some extent subject to managerial control. But this is not the time for launching such an inquiry, which, incidentally, should percede (not follow) comprehensive adjustments of the corporation tax system that are unquestionably needed. Even Marriner Eccles, who was one of the few public men to oppose abolition of excess profits taxation when the administration proposed it in 1945, objects to reimposition of the tax at the present time. He concludes that it is too difficult an undertaking during a short congressional session. Moreover, he favors a general revision of the tax structure instead of piecemeal changes.

It must also be kept in mind that a large proportion of profits from corporate enterprise has been used to build up inventories and to finance improvements and extensions. As the report of the Council of Economic Advisers states: "It is significant that the major source of corporate funds has continued to be those sums retained from current receipts as offsets to depreciation and depletion charges and as undistributed earnings. Indications are that this source will be even more important in 1948 as a whole than during last year." In other words, the funds required to keep our industries operating at high and increasing capacity are being provided to a large extent from company profits. If any considerable proportion of those funds were to be taken over by the Treasury, many concerns would be severely handicapped and the public would suffer accordingly from the resultant decrease of production.

The proposed excess-profits-tax measure to be sure, recognizes the danger. For it proposes to charge off the cost of emergency facilities through tax reductions within a 5-year period, but only after a special committee appointed by the President had approved the undertaking.

The Facts About Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, the people of the congressional district which I have the honor to represent are gravely concerned about high prices. They are disturbed by the dwindling purchasing power of their dollars and perplexed about the causes of this situation. They are rightfully demanding that something be done about it.

It is not difficult to understand why they are bewildered. One needs only to read the newspapers or listen to the radio commentators to get a dozen conflicting answers to the question of what caused high prices and what should be done to lower them.

Certainly, the President contributed nothing to clarify this complex picture when, at Philadelphia, he attempted to make the Republican Congress the whipping boy for the current economic ills of the Nation.

The President has had ample opportunity to inform the American people as to the real causes of inflation.

If he wanted to be honest about it, he would have explained that we are now paying for the economic policies the New Deal employed as a cure for the depression of the 1930's.

He would have told the people truthfully and frankly that there is no honorable way to escape payment for the most costly war in all history.

He would have said we cannot feed the people of the world without paying the price for this generosity.

He would have said that we must pay, and pay dearly, for having lost the peace at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam.

He would have said that payment must be made in the form of high taxes to keep the hordes of New Deal bureaucrats on the public pay rolls.

He would have admitted that his own actions back in 1945 broke the price-control dam and released the flood of inflation that now threatens to engulf the Nation.

Instead he has misused the high office of the Presidency in a desperate effort to bolster his sinking political fortunes. He has endeavored to mislead and confuse the people by falsely blaming Congress for high prices. He has attempted to make the people believe that the Republicans killed price control.

Just for the record, let us examine the facts.

In his Executive order of October 30, 1945, the President predicted vast unemployment would follow cessation of the war effort and asserted that it was imperative that employers grant immediate wage increases to maintain wartime take-home pay and thereby sustain purchasing power. To accomplish this he ordered the War Labor Board to immediately approve wage increases generally throughout industry and instructed the Office of Price Administration to give prompt consideration to all applications for price increases that would be necessitated by reason of these wage increases.

The impact of this order upon the price and ration-control program was, of course, disastrous. The program was in bad shape when the Congress was asked in June of 1946 to extend the Price Control Act for another year. The Congress responded on June 28 with H. R. 6042, a measure designed to decontrol prices gradually and cushion the shock of the transition period.

June 29, 1946, the President vetoed H. R. 6042 and the then Democratic-controlled Congress sustained the veto.

The President's rash action threw the Nation suddenly into a period of uncontrolled prices at a time when this was bound to have ill effects.

Belatedly, the Democratic Congress produced a second OPA bill on July 24 which the President signed July 25, extending price control to June 30, 1947.

The President has tried to spread the impression to the country that the Republicans scuttled OPA by giving him an unsatisfactory price-control bill. The facts are that he himself torpedoed the program with his wage increase order in 1945 and got the final OPA bill, which he says was a bad bill, from the Democratic-controlled Seventy-ninth Congress, not the Republican Eightieth Congress.

Without wage stabilization the price control and rationing program simply went from bad to worse, and just before the 1946 fall elections the President addressed the Nation by radio announcing the immediate decontrol of meat and ordering the lifting of all controls at an accelerated pace.

It was the President, who on November 9, 1946, personally ended price control on everything but sugar, rice and rent.

In his statement directing abandonment of controls, he said:

I am convinced that the time has come when these controls can serve no useful purpose. I am, indeed, convinced that their further continuance would do the Nation's economy more harm than good.

He also stated:

The law of supply and demand, operating in the market place, will from now on, serve the people better than would continued regulation of prices by the Government.

Candidate Truman apparently forgot that statement when in his address to the special session of Congress, July 27, 1948, he said:

There are still some people who repeat the old argument which was used by those who killed price control 2 years ago. They said that if we would only take controls off production would increase, prices would go down, and there would be more for everybody at a lower cost.

He said further:

The record shows unmistakably that this argument was false.

Well, let us look at the record and see if we can ascertain where the President was mistaken when he himself used this argument in November of 1946.

To do this we must turn back to the New Deal year of 1934, when the Brain Trust recklessly tried to repeal the economic law of supply and demand and came up with the fantastic theory of economy of scarcity. You will remember when little pigs were slaughtered, crops were plowed under, and drastic restrictions were placed upon acreage which could be planted in corn and wheat. The object was to force prices up. To further this upward pressure the Democratic administration diluted the money supply by reducing the gold content of the dollar and by artificially pumping billions of dollars into our available supply of currency.

Currency in circulation amounted to $5,500,000,000 in 1933, $7,600,000,000 in 1939—before we became involved in war—and has increased to around $27,000,000,000 today. For the same period bank deposits and currency outside of banks increased from $42,500,000,000 in 1933 and $64,000,000,000 in 1939 to $166,000,000,000 in 1947.

The administration did this by deficit spending—spending billions of dollars more than it received in revenue. The additional money was raised by selling bonds, which, in turn, became the basis of additional currency and additional bank credits. Thus, the Democratic administration produced high prices by two methods—cutting down production and increasing the supply of dollars. When we became involved in the war we were compelled to borrow hundreds of billions of dollars more to finance our military operations all over the world. The war expenditures were, of course, necessary. More than 352 billions were poured out from 1941 to 1945 for war materials alone.

The American Federation of Labor in its monthly survey for January 1948 points out how this vast increase of money supply affects our economy. Let me quote:

The root cause of today's continuing price rise is the inflation of money. Money supply in the United States of America was enormously expanded to finance the war; but even after the war it has gone on increasing at a rate out of all proportion to production of goods. This is the main reason why prices keep rising now, 2 years after VJ-day. From 1939 to 1941, the supply of money and the supply of goods (production) were increasing at about the same rate. This balance between money and goods is essential to keep prices stable; in these prewar years prices changed relatively little. But in wartime, the banks created huge new supplies of money to finance war production, and the munitions made with this money were blown up on battlefields. So today the total supply of money is three times that of 1939 (up 200 percent), while the supply of goods to be bought with the money is only 71 percent higher.

When there is an oversupply of money in relation to goods, it takes more money (that is, a higher price) to buy the same amount of goods. The economic laws of supply and demand operate for money just as they do for anything else. The way this works out in industry is easy to understand; if a man has twice as much money to spend for something he wants badly, the person who sells it can get a higher price—and does. After reconversion from war work, businessmen wanted scarce raw materials badly—cotton, metals, lumber, wheat, etc., to keep their plants in operation. Hundreds of firms were trying to buy them. Banks had plenty of money to lend at low interest rates. Business borrowed. Bank loans to business rose 70 percent in the 17 months ending November 1947; total private credit rose faster than at any time since 1920. With this easy money plus their own funds from war profits, businesses bid higher and higher prices for scarce materials; each trying to get enough for capacity operation. Prices went up and up. Soaring cotton prices raised the price of cloth and clothing; high-cost metals meant high-priced autos, washing machines, metal products; high lumber meant high cost homes. High wheat raised the price of bread, etc. Workers and other consumers had to pay 28 percent more for living expenses; they could not make ends meet. Unions demanded enough wage increases to meet the price rise. Companies used wage demands as an excuse for larger price increases. More money in consumers' pockets made it easy for business to sell goods at higher prices to the final consumer. The world food shortage and the foreign-relief program increased the demand for scarce goods. All these factors contributed to the upward price spiral. Its root cause was inflated money supply resulting from wartime fiscal policies.

The upward pressure of the huge money supply has been so great that prices were breaking through ceilings and black markets were appearing long before OPA expired. This was to be expected. Price control cannot dam an ever-growing flood of money inflation. This has been proved again and again, in country after country. We must attack the root cause of inflation, the excess money supply.

The President has access to these facts and knows the real cause of high prices. He also knows that since the end of the war he has asked the Congress to appropriate billions of dollars for foreign aid. He knows that this foreign aid program is contributing to the inflationary pressures here at home.

He is also well aware of the fact that the Government policy of supporting farm prices is helping to keep food costs at the high level they have reached since the end of the war.

His Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Brannan, told the Senate Banking Committee on August 4 of this year that the Government paid out $170,169,000 during the 1943–47 crop years to keep potato prices high. Mr. Brannan said the Government is now losing $4,000,000 a week to keep surplus potatoes off the market, thus continuing the New Deal theory of the economy of scarcity and high prices.

The President knows this program is an important factor in today's high food price level.

At Philadelphia, during the Democratic convention, he boasted that the Democrats were responsible for high farm prices. He also claimed credit for high wages and then tries to blame Republicans for high prices, which must inevitably result from high wages and high farm prices.

Candidate Truman could also explain from personal knowledge of the facts why it is necessary for America to rearm today at a cost to the taxpayers of $20,000,000,000 a year. His party gave away victory at Tehran and Yalta for which this Nation had paid such a terrible price in human life and wealth. He was personally in charge at Potsdam, appeasing good old Joe.

At a staggering cost, our soldiers and war workers won the shooting war, but the Democratic administration, through secret diplomacy, lost the peace. Today, Russia, truculent and imperialistic, threatens the peace of the world. How much more this Democratic blundering will cost us only the future can tell.

In all his attempts to shift the blame for inflation, Mr. Truman has said nothing about one of the most important steps that the Federal Government could take to curb inflation, and that is reduce the excessively high cost of Government. Upon taking control of the Congress in 1947, the Republicans put forth every effort to carry out the mandate of the people to trim Government costs. In this effort the Congress was blocked and thwarted at every turn by a hostile President and a carping and sniping Democratic minority in the House and Senate. In spite of all the obstacles, the Republican majority succeeded during the last 2 years in balancing the budget, trimmed at least $5,000,000,000 from President's budget requests, reduced the public debt, and made a start on the necessary task of reducing costly bureaucracy in Washington.

I think the facts show conclusively that the Democratic Party and President Truman must accept a large share of the responsibility for the inflation we are experiencing today. However, the suffering that the people of the Nation are experiencing as a result cannot be restricted and is being shared by all of us. It will require the cooperation of everyone, Republicans and Democrats alike, if we are to save this Nation from the economic collapse for which Joe Stalin is said to be waiting.

Instead of trying to put the blame for the Nation's troubles exclusively upon the Republicans it would be of greater benefit to the people if the President and his party would acknowledge some mistakes were made and join forces to solve our problems in a statesmanlike way.

I am frank to acknowledge that I do not know of any magic cure-all for this complex situation. I do think that we should move as promptly as possible to revitalize our currency; as a nation we should live within our income; we should do all in our power to increase the production of useful goods; we should do everything we can to help foreign countries but be realistic enough to give thought to the welfare of America and Americans as well.

Price Increases and Wage Increases in the Steel Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, within recent weeks, several important American periodicals, many Republican politicians, and practically every company raising prices have asserted that the increases were made necessary by union demands for higher wages, and that, save for this pressure by organized workers, there would be very little of the inflation now raging across our land.

There is no necessity for me to defend the policies or practices of the labor movement; it is fully capable of presenting its own case. Nor do I wish simply to turn the finger in the other direction and accuse management of full responsibility for our economic ills. I am concerned with the more practical aspect of the problem. We were called back into this special session to do something to check inflation. Before we can stop a disease, particularly a self-nurturing one like the wage-price spiral, it is indispensable that we learn something about what caused it to start in the first place, and what is keeping it going. A brief look at the record will be helpful.

The steel industry is basic to our entire economy. It gives direct employment to more than 600,000 workers, and indirect employment to millions. Changes in steel wages have an immediate effect throughout the land. I will therefore concentrate my observations on the problem with reference to the basic steel industry.

Steel prices and wages remained relatively stable during hostilities. Base steel prices scarcely changed at all from 1939 to the end of 1945. This, however, did not mean that the steel industry was not prospering during these years. Far from it. Sales rose from 34,955,175 tons in 1939 to 46,602,322 tons in 1945, and corporate income rose more than proportionately.

Steelworkers' earnings also rose during this period. Only a small part of the increase, however, was due to increased wages. The basic wage rate for the steel industry in 1939 was 62.5 cents per hour and in 1941, 72.5 cents, and in 1945, 78 cents. The major part of the additional income received by steelworkers resulted from increased hours at overtime pay.

The first general increase in the price of finished steel in 7 years took place in February of 1946. The steel industry at that time stated that this price increase was made necessary by reason of labor's demand for higher wages, and indeed it was because of the wage hike at that time that the still-existing OPA granted a price increase. So on the surface, at least, it looks as if labor started the game of leapfrog. First, there came the 18½-cent-per-hour wage increase and this was accompanied by what was announced as a $5-a-ton price increase but what actually was an increase of $6.18 according to Steel magazine. And it should be remembered that OPA was considering a price increase before labor asked for a wage increase. Let us look a little deeper into the matter. Was labor simply trying to get more of the corporate income pie in 1946, and did that set off the rat race which followed?

Here is the record. In April of 1945, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, average hourly earnings in the steel industry were $1.99 per hour, average hours worked per week 47, and average weekly take-home pay $56.32. By December of 1945, because of down grading and the ending of overtime, the average hourly earnings dropped to $1.155, average hours worked per week dropped to 41 and average weekly take-home pay to $47.33. Weekly wages then fell $8.99 or 15.96 percent, from a month before VE-day to a few months after VJ-day. And it is important to remember that it is the weekly take-home pay that buys the meat and milk and pays for the rent.

Labor's demand for wage increase was not based on greediness or a desire to improve its position with reference to the other elements in our society. Labor simply wanted to make up for lost ground. In fact, it had to, for without a wage increase in the early part of 1946, labor could have survived only by accepting a drastic lowering of its living standards. For while take-home pay was being reduced, prices representing the cost of living were rising. In April 1945, the Consumers' Price Index stood at 127.1. It rose to 129.9 in December of that year, and to 130.9 by April of 1946.

The 18½-cent-an-hour rise simply restored part of the balance. Weekly worker income still was considerably below wartime levels.

The steel industry was not content to plod along at the wartime earnings, particularly since the excess profits tax had been repealed. It, therefore, used the 18½-cent-an-hour increase granted in February of 1946 as an excuse to lift prices to an extent which more than made up for higher labor and other costs. This steel price rise, in turn, immediately was compounded throughout all American industry. Each subsequent processor raised the prices of his finished articles by an amount far greater than necessary to make up for his increased costs. And, of course, during this period, the OPA died.

By March of 1947 the cost of living had risen to 156.3. In that month, steelworkers' average hourly earnings were $1.33 per hour, average hours per week 38.9, and average weekly take-home pay, $51.77. The weekly take-home pay, and I must emphasize again, this is what counts, was still substantially below the April 1945 figure of $56.32. Real wages or purchasing power, therefore, in March of 1947 were 31.05 percent below real wages of April 1945.

What had happened to the steel prices during this period? Why, they went up again, of course. In February of 1946, there was a price rise of $6.18. This was intended to make up for the 18½-cent-per-hour price increase. By December of 1946 it became obvious that the wage earners' economic position had worsened to such an extent that a wage increase must be granted when the existing contracts expired the following spring. The steel industry, therefore, having no OPA to oppose its will, decided to make an anticipatory price increase. It did this to the extent of $5.37 per ton of finished steel. This was imposed in driblets over the period from December 1946 to March 1947. In late April of 1947, the steel industry concluded contracts with the steelworkers' union resulting in an increase of 12½ cents per hour, plus provisions for the elimination of inequities, increased vacation allowances for certain employees, and other fringe issues. This raised steelworkers' earnings to an average of $1.436 per hour, or $56.26 per week of 39.2 hours in May 1947.

This increase was immediately seized upon by the industry as an excuse for a further price increase. Of course, it had already increased its prices in the anticipation of a wage increase, but now that the wage increase was granted, the industry succumbed to the temptation to start the inflation spiral all over again. In August of 1947, therefore, it raised prices by $5.59 per ton. This again spread through our entire economy, helping to bring about an increase in the cost of living. And it soon became evident that labor again was on the short end of the stick and that unless prices stopped rising, it would have to ask for another wage increase. Labor at this time was like Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland who had to run as fast as her legs could carry her just to stay in the same place.

The steel companies were well aware of the plight into which they had driven their employees. I must back-track a moment here. The steelworkers' union realized that what this country needed above all else was stability. It was anxious to stop the wage-price spiral. It tried to do this by writing a contract on April 30, 1947, that was to run for 2 years instead of the customary 1. The wage clause could be opened at the expiration of 12 months, but failure to agree upon a change would mean that the old wage rates would remain in effect, together with all the other sections of the contract for the full 2 years. It was hoped that by this means a brake would be put upon inflation. Nothing of the kind occurred. Instead, the steel companies decided once more to anticipate increased costs. And beginning in October 1947, and continuing to February 1948, they raised prices by another $5.73 a ton, bringing the increases in base prices since the beginning of 1946 to a total of $22.87, or 39.25 percent. This, of course, again was immediately reflected throughout our economy and by April of 1947 the cost of living rose to 169.3, a rise of 13 points in 13 months.

Steel labor asked for, but did not receive, a wage increase in the spring of 1948. Instead, the steel companies announced that they would fight inflation by reducing prices. Unlike another experiment of recent memory, this was not noble in motive. Most of the companies stated that they were cutting prices by $1.25 a ton. Actually the industry cut prices, as reported in Steel magazine, by an average of 87 cents a ton. Look at the picture then. There had been a 2-year price increase of $22.87, or 39.25 percent per ton, which boosted the inflationary pressure. Compared with this was an anti-inflation price cut of 87 cents.

Of course, it did not work. The 87-cent reduction did not even appreciably mitigate the onerous effects of the $5.73 per ton increase exacted only a few months earlier.

It soon became obvious that something again had to be done about steelworkers' wages. Other industries were raising the rates of their employees and steelworkers were being put more and more at a disadvantage with respect to the wage-price picture. In July, therefore, the steel industry granted its employees, through the steelworkers' union, a 13-cent-an-hour wage boost. This amounts to an increase of about 9 percent. A few days later, the industry announced price rises of 9.6 percent plus a restoration of the so-called $1.25 cut made a few months earlier. All of this, according to the companies' announcements, aggregated $9.34 a ton.

Corporate figures, however, are sometimes tricky. The April 1948 reduction was actually 87 cents a ton, not $1.25. Nevertheless, the companies took back the full $1.25. Furthermore, $9.34 equals 11.64 percent of the then obtaining composite steel price. A couple of days later, the individual companies reported the new prices item by item. And this shows a much greater increase. For example, hot-rolled bars—of which 8,000,000 tons were produced in 1947—were increased by $10 a ton or 14.1 percent to 17.5 percent. Hot-rolled sheets with a 7,500,000-ton production in 1947 were also increased $10 a ton, or 11 percent to 18.2 percent. Cold-rolled sheets with 5,500,000-ton production in 1944 were increased $11 a ton or 15.9 percent. Structural shapes with a 4,500,000-ton production in 1947 were increased $10 a ton or 14.9 percent to 18.2 percent. And, oh yes, on a couple insignificant items productionwise the increase was 1.3 percent and 2.15 percent. Iron Age and the New York Times reported that the total increase was really 16.2 percent or $10.53 a ton on the average for finished steel.

Look at that. Wages increased 9 percent, prices increased 16.2 percent. Yet all of the steel industry's employment costs including social-security taxes and pensions and everything else attributable to labor equals only 40 cents on the dollar. The compensatory increase, even granting that labor was to blame, should have been only at a rate of 40 percent of the wage price. Instead, the steel companies made it 180 percent.

The surplus, of course, simply meant more profits for the companies, even if the increased cost of coal and freight is taken into effect. From April 1945, or February 1946, when the first price rise took place, to July 1948, the steel industry raised base prices a total of $31.34 a ton which is equal to a rise of 53.78 percent. There had been even greater increases since extras were substantially upped during this period. At the present time wages are only 164.3 cents per hour or $63.42 per week—giving full effect to the 13-cent-an-hour increase which has not yet been reported by BLS. The weekly take-home pay in April 1945 was $56.32—for a 47-hour week. Weekly wages, therefore, had risen a net of $7.10 or 12.61 percent, compared with a price rise of 53.78 percent.

It is easy enough to see how inflation started and what is keeping it going. The record of the steel industry is pretty much the record of the industry as a whole. Business Week magazine for July 31 said:

> A sampling of the second-quarter income statements that have come in makes it plain that most companies have just wound up the most profitable half year in their history and most of them expect to do just as well in the second half.

Business Week also says:

> Unless something goes seriously wrong in the next 5 months, United States corporations will probably clear a cool $20,000,000,000 net profit this year. That will be about $2,500,000,000 above the 1947 record, and it will be about four times 1939.

I might point out how that in reporting the steel companies' earnings Business Week missed a statistical trick employed by some companies to conceal earnings. For example, United States Steel's net for the June quarter was given as $32,586,000. Actually the real net profit for this 3-month period is $39,485,677. The difference is accounted for by a special depreciation charge to cover replacement cost of facilities. These extra charges cannot be listed as costs under Federal income-tax laws, and are really profits.

After all the pulling and hauling of the last 3 years, the real income of labor is still far below that of the war years, while the net profits of industry are far above. Even if the net-profits figures are weighted by the decreased purchasing power of the dollar, industrial profits are still enormously higher than they ever were before.

There is no denying that some inflation would have been inevitable regardless of management or labor policies. But the record is clear that inflation was accelerated and intensified by the desire of American business to reap enormous profits as quickly as possible with no regard whatsoever for the consequences.

Labor, as the record shows, has been the victim and not the perpetrator of inflation. Labor, as the record shows, was willing to take its loss provided there was no further spread of this economic disease. Management's refusal to cooperate made impossible the success of this plan.

The way to fight inflation is to get to the causes. An excess-profits tax and price control will not bring back to the dollar its former value, but these measures will put an end to the extension of inflation. They will not remove the first cause, but they will stop the self-nurturing phase. On the basis of these facts, the present Congress cannot go home without at least enacting excess-profits and price-control legislation.

One Million Half-Sick Veterans Indicated by Tropical Disease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. DEANE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, through the courtesy of the Winston-Salem Journal and Sentinel I am today given the opportunity to extend my remarks and include an outstanding newspaper article by Chester S. Davis, a member of the staff of the Winston-Salem Journal-Sentinel concerning the serious implications of undiagnosed amebic dysentery. This news article discusses the outstanding research work being carried on by Dr. Thomas T. Mackie, professor of preventive medicine at the Bowman Gray Medical School of Wake Forest College in Winston-Salem.

The Members are invited to carefully read this article. The findings of Dr. Mackie and his associates might seem to indicate that 1,000,000 of our veterans are suffering from amebic dysentery. Indeed, it may be true that many millions of Americans may have the same disease.

This article by Mr. Davis presents a challenging undertaking and it behooves the Congress and the Federal Government to take greater interest in what is considered by Dr. Mackie, one of the outstanding medical experts on tropical diseases in the world, as a serious national problem.

The article follows:

ONE MILLION HALF-SICK VETERANS INDICATED BY TROPICAL CLINIC—UNDIAGNOSED AMOEBIC DYSENTERY BECOMES A NATIONAL PROBLEM—HAMPERED BY LACK OF TRAINED MEN, VA PLANS "PILOT PLANT" HERE

(By Chester S. Davis)

One million veterans on the streets of America today are walking casualties because of a single tropical disease—the dread, intestine-riddling amoebic dysentery.

Behind these veterans stands a vague mass of humanity—perhaps as many as 15,000,000 men and women—who are half whipped mentally and physically by this same chronic, debilitating, parasitic infection.

The fact that amoebic dysentery already is deep in the bowels of our people is important. But the appalling fact is that these former servicemen (and at least 1 out of 10 of the rest of us) do not stand even a gambler's chance of obtaining a correct diagnosis and proper treatment.

Our doctors, untrained in tropical medicine, are failing to diagnose amoebic dysentery in 9 cases out of 10. Our medical schools, apparently unaware that amoebic dysentery and one or two other tropical-type diseases constitute a national health problem, are not training their graduates to meet this challenge. As a result the Veterans' Administration—the agency responsible for treating service-connected sickness—has been hamstrung by the lack of available medical know-how.

These conclusions are shaped from evidence drawn out of the files of the Veterans' Administration's tropical-disease clinic in Winston-Salem, N. C. Over the past 18 months this clinic has found a 40-percent incidence of amoebic dysentery among the 330 veterans examined. This is a frightening rate of infection, particularly since amoebic dysentery has been listed as one of our rarer diseases. The fact that such an infection rate does exist in North Carolina points obviously to a national medical problem of tremendous proportions.

The tropical diseases have been a problem in the United States for generations. Malaria, amœbic and bacillary dysentery and the hookworm still are endemic in large sections of the South. And there have been years when the plague, cholera, typhus and yellow fever blasted through this country in flaming epidemics. Even such exotics as the yaws, leprosy and filariasis were something more than medical curiosities 50 years ago.

But good plumbing, sound methods of treating drinking water and a generous share of that unknown factor best described as luck permitted us either to bring these diseases under control or to drive them back into the hot and humid countries whence they came.

By 1940 there were no more than 25 doctors in the United States who were specially trained to deal with the diseases of the tropics. In 1940 only the medical school of Tulane University offered a graduate curriculum in tropical medicine.

THE WAR EXPERIENCE

By quick and skillful use of the few qualified men available the Army and Navy fashioned a medical program which enabled an estimated 8,000,000 men to fight World War II in areas which were murderous because of disease.

Some 1,500 doctors and technicians were schooled in tropical medicine during the frantic early months of the war and then sent overseas to guard the troops from infection and to treat them once they were stricken. These "tropical Johnnies" did a magnificent job.

Still, in World War II disease was far more dangerous than the shooting enemy. Malaria alone hospitalized 10 men for every 1 man killed or wounded in action.

The Army medical records themselves are misleading since they record only the hospital cases. Statistically their errors are on the conservative side. According to these inadequate records, the top 10 tropical-type diseases for the period 1942-45 were:

	Cases
1. Dysentery and diarrhea (the soldier's occupational diseases)	756, 849
2. Malaria (many types; some mild, some deadly)	572, 950
3. Infectious hepatitis (a vague classification referring to inflamation of the liver; frequently caused by a sewage-borne virus but can result from factors as diverse as amoebic dysentery and acute alcoholism)	191, 574
4. Dengue (an acute, relatively common though rarely fatal mosquito-borne disease)	121, 608
5. Hookworm (Old World type)	19, 943
6. Filariasis (a chronic, mosquito-borne disease which, in aggravated cases, produces grotesque swellings aptly described as elephantiasis)	13, 009
7. Sandfly fever (a fly-spread fever resembling influenza)	12, 634
8. Scrub typhus (a typhus fever spread by mites not unlike our chiggers)	7, 421
9. Amoebic dysentery (more about this later)	4, 504
10. Schistosomiasis (a parasitic infection carried by fresh water snails, a common disease in Puerto Rico)	1, 672

It is not surprising that such a massive infection as this should send whispers of panic rustling through the United States late in 1945. A casual leafing through back newspaper and magazine files will turn up a dozen stories analyzing the risk of secondary infections being brought to this country by the returning troops.

But when no epidemics occurred the early fears were forgotten and, so far as tropical medicine was concerned, we drifted back into a state of near hibernation.

Today there probably are no more than 12 fully trained men actively practicing tropical medicine in the United States. Most of these specialists are in the Army, Navy, Public Health Service, or in the universities. The several thousand doctors and technicians schooled in parasitology by the war have drifted out of the field.

THE NORTH CAROLINA FINDINGS

That brings us to the present and it also takes us to the door of the Tropical Disease Clinic operated by Dr. Thomas T. Mackie, professor of preventive medicine at the Bowman Gray Medical School of Wake Forest College. Before we pass through that door and start rummaging in the laboratory files we might pause a moment to consider Dr. Mackie's credentials.

This smooth-spoken New Englander is a man of youthful enthusiasm and he belts a long golf ball. He is distinguished both in appearance and reputation. He studied at Harvard (A. B.), Columbia (M. D.), and did graduate work at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine (where he met and married Dr. Janet Welch Mackie, a "tropical Janie" whose formal training has been sharpened by some 15 years' field work in Africa and in South and Central America).

During the 1930's Dr. Tom Mackie taught at Columbia University and conducted clinical investigation in the fields of parasitology and nutrition. Since 1940, when the American Foundation of Tropical Medicine was created as an advisory group to help prepare for a war in the tropics, Dr. Mackie has acted either as the foundation's executive director or president.

During the four war years Col. Tom Mackie was one of the top officers in the Army's tropical-medicine program, serving as Chief of the Division of Parasitology at the Army Medical School. Moreover, he headed the United States Typhus Commission sent to the China-Burma-India theater to study the dangerous problem of scrub typhus in 1944.

In July 1946, Dr. Mackie joined the staff of the Bowman Gray School of Medicine. At about this time he took on additional responsibilities as one of the very few consultants of the Veterans' Administration on tropical diseases.

The tropical disease clinic was founded in Winston-Salem in April 1947, to serve the Fourth Region (North Carolina, West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland and the District of Columbia) of the Veterans' Administration.

So much for the credentials. Now let's turn to the facts found in Dr. Mackie's files and consider the dismal story they tell.

In the past 18 months 330 veterans have been examined in this clinic—veterans who for the most part simply had vague, undiagnosed complaints that refused to respond to treatment elsewhere. Of these men 134 (40.6 percent) had amebic dysentery. A smaller group, 39 men (11.8 percent), were infested with Old World hookworm. Four cases of filariasis and three cases of schistosomiasis were spotted and treated. In less than 1 percent of the cases had these diseases previously been diagnosed although most of the infestations already were 4 and 5 years old.

The New World hookworm (necator americanus) is endemic in large sections of the southern United States. The Old World type (ancylostoma) is not a native (though a few specimens have been found deep in coal mines) and it is a more dangerous parasite, fewer worms accomplishing greater intestinal damage.

Not so long ago Dr. Mackie examined a young veteran who had served with the 126th Infantry Regiment of the Thirty-second Division on New Guinea, Goodenough Island, Morotai, Leyte, and Luzon. This boy—like so many others infested with amebae or worms—had been in and out of hospitals, both before and after his discharge from the Army. The standard diagnosis was "relapsing malaria and war neurosis."

Several months ago the boy drifted into the tropical disease clinic. He was anemic and tired and his mental attitude was that of a whipped man. Hookworms were discovered after proper laboratory examination and he was treated and cured.

The VA rating board refused to grant this veteran disability on the ground the infestation was not service-connected. The board pointed out that the boy lived on a farm in the heart of a section of North Carolina where the native hookworm is endemic. The board subsequently changed its decision when Dr. Mackie proved that the worm was of the Old World type and not a native of this country. Since the end of the war every single adult hookworm examined at the tropical disease clinic has been of the Old World type.

Entirely apart from the health problem of veterans infested with these worms (and they may number well over 100,000) there is the danger that this pathogenic parasite will establish itself in areas as yet not equipped with plumbing and proceed to fatten on the blood of the technologically retarded, of whom there are a gracious plenty in the Southern States.

Amebic dysentery is a more dangerous problem. Here the trouble maker is the endamoeba histolytica, a single-celled protozoa (a rudimentary sort of microscopic animal life), which thrives in the colon of man, favoring, oddly enough, the right-hand side.

The amoebas somehow are able to damage the intestinal wall and they ooze into breaches in the cells, repeating the process until, in aggravated cases, the intestine is riddled with small buttonlike ulcers. At this stage the painful bloody flux is a common symptom.

In some instances the amoebae bore into intestinal blood vessels and are swept on to the liver, where they cause inflammation, abscessing and, not infrequently, death. This condition—amebic hepatitis or abscess—sometimes is mistakenly diagnosed as cancer of the colon.

Most often the body is able to defend itself against the amoebae and certain of the invaders, by no means licked, but somewhat tamed on the basis of mutual tolerance, curl up and surround themselves with hard shells. These cysts are passed in the feces in nature's constant effort to spread life and—in this case—to find another host.

(It might be inserted here, parenthetically, that carriers of typhoid—the "Typhoid Marys"—are subject to stringent regulation. Yet nothing whatever has been said, or done, about the millions of unaware "Amoebic Alberts"—the medical twin of "Typhoid Mary.")

Ordinarily, the disease progresses slowly, at least in the initial stages. Dr. Mackie recalls a patient who apparently picked up amoebic dysentery in 1917 while in a German prison camp. This man, a sea captain, held the disease in check for many years, but during the mid 1930's he began to suffer cramps. The first diagnosis was a diseased gall bladder and that organ was removed. The cramps continued. The captain was then told that he had cirrhosis of the liver; too much alcohol, the doctor said, which was not a bad guess, considering that the patient was a sea captain. In this case the doctor apologized to a teetotaling seafarer.

The third diagnosis, made a year or two later, was cancer of the colon. Fortunately, the captain's large intestine escaped the knife, when a laboratory examination determined that the endamoeba histolytica was the cause of the trouble.

At the other extreme are the cases of amoebic dysentery which flare up with dramatic and fatal suddenness. In August of 1933 two dangerously acute cases were diagnosed in Chicago. Before the year was out 1,409 widely scattered cases had been traced to two of Chicago's better hotels. In this epidemic there were 98 deaths.

Subsequent investigation determined that these cases resulted from faulty plumbing which permitted hotel guests to drink house sewage. It might be noted that 42 members of the hotels' staffs—most of them preparing or serving food—were found to be cyst passers.

Amoebic dysentery is not a newcomer to the United States. The treatises on tropical infection estimate that even before World War II something under 10 percent of our people were infected. The difference today is one of degree, and Dr. Mackie's records indicate that it is an important difference.

The only diagnosis is to find the amoeba in the stool of the victim. This requires that the doctor in charge of the case order the examination and also that his technician be competent to handle that difficult job.

The unpleasant fact seems to be that most doctors are not ordering this laboratory test. And in the relatively rare instances where a stool examination is done, Dr. Mackie is finding that the technicians, either because of inadequate specimens or inability to master the technique, are returning negative reports in 90 percent of the cases.

The case histories in the files of the tropical disease clinic tell the same story over and over again with a deadly repetitiousness. Here is a typical example:

Jonathan Worth (a fictitious name) entered the Army in December 1942, and, after a brief training period, was shipped to the Pacific theater. He served in Australia, New Guinea, the Admiralty Islands, Leyte, Luzon, and Japan. He was discharged in November 1945.

During his stretch in service Jonathan believed that he escaped malaria and he did not recall any bouts with dysentery or diarrhea. However, he was bothered by something he vaguely described as "stomach trouble."

Not long after his separation, Jonathan began to lose weight. He tired quickly and was easily irritated and his coloring faded and became sallow.

In January 1946 he visited a VA hospital for a thorough physical check. A blood smear was taken and the parasite of vivax malaria was spotted. Jonathan also had an infection of roundworms. He was treated on both scores and dismissed.

In the autumn of 1946 he returned to college but it was a wasted effort. He simply did not have the strength to carry the work.

In December 1946 Jonathan Worth visited one of this Nation's most renowned private clinics for a physical examination. He was put through the mill and released with the diagnosis, "relapsing malaria and war neurosis."

Months later, still convinced that something besides nerves and malaria was troubling him, Jonathan Worth appeared at the tropical disease clinic. A stool examination established that he had an active case of amebic dysentery. He was treated and he promptly began to gain weight. His hangdog outlook, general fatigue, irritability, and his anemia and sallow complexion vanished.

A STAGGERING UNITED STATES PROBLEM

Most of the men examined by Dr. Mackie and found to have amebic dysentery fall into this same pattern. The majority of them have had malaria and their symptoms have been similar to those of Jonathan Worth. Their records are studded with the same pat diagnosis: "relapsing malaria and nerves," "malaria and neuropsychiatric," "relapsing malaria and neurasthenia."

The fact that this diagnosis is repeated time and again as these men are shunted from hospital to hospital is proof that our doctors do not understand even the fundamentals of tropical medicine.

The malaria being found today, 4 years since most of these men first came down with the disease, is the simple vivax malaria which is persistent but which, according to Dr. Mackie, is no more dangerous than the common cold. The virulent malarias kill or are cured quickly. They do not keep returning. Except for the lazy doctors, malaria is no answer in these cases.

Neither is psychoneurosis an answer. It again is the last resort of the untrained doctor who uses "war nerves" to explain symptoms for which he cannot otherwise account.

Amebic dysentery, like many another tropical disease, produces symptoms—lassitude, irritability, lack of interest—which are found among certain classes of mental cases.

Until the doctors learn that the combination of relapsing malaria and war nerves is a red flag signaling a stool examination, those busy men will continue to fill our mental clinics with patients who are physically sick and who need a physician's care, not formal psychiatric treatment.

These cases examined in the tropical-disease clinic thus far are limited in number. Most of the men examined have been residents of North Carolina. But when the record indicates a 40-percent incidence of amebic dysentery and a 12-percent incidence of hookworm among the unhealthy and undiagnosed servicemen of a single State, you wonder: What about the veterans in Nebraska and in New York and California? What about the infection rates to be found in the general population since the end of the war?

Three years ago, when our armies began to break up, the troops flowed back into the United States from some of the worst pest holes in the Tropics, the Army and Navy did not have the medical machinery necessary to check each man thoroughly before he was released to civilian life.

Top medical men of the Veterans' Administration recognized the possibility that a large percentage of returning veterans later would seek hospital treatment because of tropical infections. In setting up a program to handle such cases the VA attempted to obtain the services of specially trained men to serve as consultants in the field of tropical disease. They could not provide even one consultant for each of the 13 VA branch offices in this country. Qualified men were not to be had.

Dr. Paul Magnuson, chief medical officer of the VA, would like to conduct some large-scale clinical investigations and determine exactly the incidence of amebiasis and hookworm among veterans nationally. Such a survey is essential. But once again you come against the hard fact that trained men necessary to carry out the investigation are all but impossible to find.

Dr. Tom Mackie on his own volition has begun a large-scale investigation of amebic infection among the civilian population of Winston-Salem, which will supplement the data being collected at the tropical disease clinic. It is too early to report the results. The early indications are that when the results are published they will curl the hair of those men who look on amebiasis as an unusual disease.

PROBLEM IS NOT BEING MET

At the present time the tropical disease clinic is the only unit in the entire medical machine of the Veterans' Administration which specializes in the parasitic infections. This clinic—capable of processing 10 to 12 men a week—is hopelessly inadequate in the face of a patient load which probably exceeds 1,000,000 former servicemen.

Dr. Magnuson and his staff recognize that the tropical-disease problem is not being met. The VA is considering using the tropical disease clinic in Winston-Salem as a major pilot plant operation. If such a pilot plant is set up on a relatively large scale it would be an invaluable place to train doctors and technicians in the practice of tropical medicine. These men later could staff regional clinics spotted throughout the country.

This autumn the Bowman Gray School of Medicine will open the doors of its spanking new tropical disease institute. This will be the second medical school in the United States offering a graduate curriculum in tropical medicine. The VA hopes to send a few (about 12) of its doctors and technicians to this institute for training.

Hospital space provides another problem. The VA has found the money to build hospitals for the mental cases, but there is no evidence that the more numerous tropical disease victims are receiving similar attention.

The routine treatment for amebic dysentery calls for 9 to 10 days in a hospital bed while a series of drugs are administered. In the past few months the tropical disease clinic has diagnosed at least 50 new cases of amebiasis. Those men still are standing in line waiting for a hospital bed.

The fact that men suffering from undiagnosed parasitic infections can find beds in existing veterans hospitals is not an answer. You need only examine the records of the tropical disease clinic to learn that most of the amebic dysentery cases diagnosed in the clinic previously had visited these hospitals.

This is not an indictment of the medical profession. You scarcely can expect men with little or no training in tropical medicine to diagnose and treat diseases which they have been taught, at least by implication, are rare and seldom encountered in routine practice.

But these facts do indict our medical schools. The evidence indicates that 1 out of every 10 patients now visiting our doctors have amebic dysentery. Yet only a small fraction (about 1 percent) of these cases are being diagnosed. In the past the medical schools have not trained their graduates to cope with diseases of this type and they are not doing so today.

A HUGE UNNECESSARY COST

The price of this failure can be totted up in something more than terms of health. We undoubtedly are paying out huge sums in pensions to men stricken with undiagnosed infections of amebiasis and hookworm. As the years pass this toll will mount and it will be accompanied by a high-climbing price paid to hospitalize the aggravated cases.

There are the indirect costs, too. The price paid in time lost from the job and in the on-the-job inefficiency which is a byproduct of an energy-sapping disease. These indirect costs also are mounting as the infection spreads to more of our people.

In the United States we have been taught that a failure in education can be a costly failure. That infamous protozoa, the endamoeba histolytica, provides a vivid case in point.

Address of Hon. Hugh D. Scott, Jr., of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Honorable HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., chairman of the Republican National Committee, at the Hartford Club, Hartford, Conn., Thursday, August 5, 1948, on the occasion of a testimonial dinner given in honor of Harold E. Mitchell, Republican National Committeeman:

I am delighted to be with the good Republicans of Connecticut tonight, to report on the progress of America's great crusade to elect Thomas E. Dewey as President and Earl Warren as Vice President of the United States.

This is a decisive campaign in the history of the United States. The forces of freedom and of orderly constitutional government are aroused, united, and determined. We believe in our cause and together we shall gain for the American people, this November, one of their most important victories.

In the busy weeks that have passed since our great convention in Philadelphia (the only really free convention held this year), we have made notable progress at headquarters in Washington, and throughout the States. Our national organization is functioning at steadily increasing tempo; and at the Washington headquarters we are organized and staffed for a campaign in tune with the times, in harmony with the great issues at stake, and in coordination with all groups devoted to the restoration of good government to this good land of ours.

This is a crusade of fundamental Americanism. We are out to redeem American constitutional government from the hands of reckless, spendthrift bureaucrats.

We are pledged that Federal finances shall be established on a sound, businesslike basis to give the American people the kind of government they want—not the kind the bureaucrats want—at a cost the people can afford to pay.

In this historic effort, we are counting surely on Connecticut to be overwhelmingly in the Republican column when the votes are counted next November 2. You of Connecticut, "the land of steady habits," will help us to end spendthrift government in Washington, "the land of steady debits."

We have given much thought to the basic policies of our national campaign.

We are determined to carry to the entire Nation an affirmative campaign—a campaign based on the fundamentals of our time-tested constitutional order.

We shall have no time for mud slinging or name calling.

We are looking not backward to the disgraceful era of New Dealism, but forward to constructive achievement through restoration of the republican form of government.

The progress of this mighty America is not advanced by invective or billingsgate, but by work in a common purpose.

We have a great work before us—to reclaim the government of 144,000,000 people from the hands of an entrenched clique of power-grasping bureaucrats, who appear bent upon applying the methods and systems of European collectivism to our American Government.

Our platform at Philadelphia began with a pledge to "uphold as a beacon light for mankind everywhere the inspiring American tradition of liberty, opportunity, and justice for all."

That is the essence of our platform, and that is the ultimate meaning of this great crusade in which we are all now engaged.

The American people know well enough what an indescribable mess these last 15 years of experimental statism have left, not only in Washington, but in every community in these United States.

We have had 15 long years of government by guess, of rule at random, of distress through directives.

The biggest reality before us today is the Federal debt of $253,000,000,000—a tinder box of inflation—which only sound policies and conscientious administration could manage over the coming years in a way to insure a strong and prosperous America in a peaceful world.

Governor Dewey is sound. You here in Connecticut know his record in Albany. He is conscientious, a faithful public servant, young, able, vigorous, truly devoted to the America which gave him such great opportunities for public service. He is a man of these times. He and Governor Warren are what I have before described as "a dream-boat of a ticket."

Our party came into being nearly a century ago to promote the cause of human freedom. It has never failed those fundamental principles of freedom which called it into being.

Today we are threatened by a new form of human slavery; slavery to government debt, to inflation, to all the ills which flow from imprudent management of a God-given wealth and plenty.

A nation, no less than an individual or a family, is subject to the immutable laws of thrift and prudence. There are moral forces in this world which no man, nor no nation, can escape. When a nation squanders its substance through weak or ineffective governmental policies, it is guilty of misconduct, if not of actual misfeasance in office.

The penalty for us is a burdensome national debt, a debt which today calls for more interest every year than we needed before the New Deal to carry the entire Federal budget, including the Army and the Navy. To say that "we owe it to ourselves" doesn't help as you dish it out to the tax collector.

High prices are an inescapable consequence of Government-made inflation. In June 1948, for example, Mr. Truman's new additions to the public pay roll increased by 26,004. This means that 866 tax-supported employees were taken on each day in June by the gentleman who grieves about the high cost of everything, including government.

We have been traveling the broad, easy inflation highway for 15 long years. It is a distinct betrayal of public responsibility; more, it is an act of deliberate deceit to suggest that the evil work of 15 spendthrift years may be undone now by a special session of Congress in 15 days. The President knows the causes lie deep and will not use the remedies already in his hands.

Our platform pledged an honest and sincere effort to curb inflation. Our party today is engaged in that effort. We pledged—

1. "Progressive reduction of the cost of government through elimination of waste."

That is why the Republican Congress, now in special session at the call of the Democratic National Convention, will not enact the new spending proposals urged upon it. We do not expect to add to your high cost of living by increasing your tax burden on the President's political say-so.

If all the new programs suggested last week were enacted, we soon should have a Federal budget of considerably more than $60,000,000,000 a year, instead of the forty-three billions authorized for the current fiscal year. We will block these loose spending proposals in Washington.

2. Our second pledge against inflation was this: "Stimulation of production as the surest way to lower prices."

That means simply that when we take over the Administrative arm of Government, we are going to take the bureaucrats off the necks of our farmers, businessmen, and workers.

It is not in the American tradition for citizens to spend half their time filling out Government forms in triplicate, or to stand around for days on end waiting for permission to buy a carload of lumber or steel with which to build a new home, factory, or barn. With less Government forms will come more building forms for more and more increased construction.

Our third pledge to fight inflation was this: A pledge which has been in every Republican platform since the formation of our party. It is only three short words, "a sound currency."

Until we can make our money stand steady we cannot expect to restore an equilibrium between money and goods.

Our fourth pledge against inflation was about equally brief and pointed—"Reduction of the public debt."

Can we do these things in 15 days with a hostile veto-happy President in the White House? You know that we cannot.

These are honest, American measures of Federal policy. They could be put into operation tomorrow by an Administration really intent upon checking high prices.

We do not propose to set up a dozen new control agencies and hundreds of new job holders to regulate, supervise, ration and regiment every aspect of American life.

At the present rate of Federal operations, with more than 2,000,000 people on the civil rolls of the Government, the average civil service payroller represents a Government expenditure of $21,500 a year.

But during the last 12 years of our Republican Administration in Washington, when we carried only about 560,000 people on the Federal rolls, each Government worker represented an average expenditure of only $8,036 a year.

That's a thumb-nail picture of what the spendthrift bureaucrats have been doing to the American people for the last 15 years. That's the stuff that inflation is made of.

Not only have the bureaucrats saddled us with four payrollers for every one employed by the Republicans; they have almost tripled the average Government expenditure per payroller each year.

Such, then is the task before us, fellow Republicans. During the last 3 years the Washington bureaucrats have developed a new theory of Government spending.

They tell us that if you spend one of your own hard-earned dollars, that's inflationary.

But if the same dollar is taxed away from you, before you ever get your pay envelope, and the Government then spends it, that's not inflationary.

That curious economic doctrine is far removed from the principles of plain speaking and honest dealing with the people. We are determined to give no quarter to such deceitful double-talk in this great campaign of 1948.

We do not look upon the American people as children to be guided, managed and deceivd by government.

Our Philadelphia platform pledges, on the other hand—"Maximum voluntary cooperation between citizens, and minimum dependence upon law."

The American people have behind them a tradition of more than 300 years of freedom and self-government.

The duty of the Republican Party today is to give expression to the inborn yearning of our people for a government which will maintain peace and order, with a minimum of interference and meddling in the intimate daily concerns of the citizen.

Our people are mature and self-reliant. They can plan better for themselves than the Government can plan for them. They know what they want in government. They want less government, better government, sound government; they want efficient government, administered by prudent men who have faith and confidence in the American way of life. Above all, they want honest government, and at less cost, with less confusion, less bureaucracy and less red tape.

The Republican Congress Makes Good

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, in November of 1946, the American people, disturbed by the disastrous results of 14 years of New Deal maladministration in Washington, discharged the Democratic Congress and called upon the Republican Party to rescue the Nation from ruin.

With full appreciation of the terrific task before it, the Republican Party accepted the mandate of the people and took charge of the Congress in January of 1947.

During the period which has elapsed since the 1946 elections, the Republican Congress has been thwarted and blocked at every turn by a hostile President, who remained in charge of the executive branch only by the grace of the constitutional provision for the selection of a Chief Executive on a quadrennial instead of a biennial basis.

Despite this handicap the Republican Congress discharged its responsibilities to the American people with courage, foresight, and understanding.

For the record, here are some of the major accomplishments of the Eightieth Congress:

Freed competitive enterprise: Liberated the people from 76,000 rules, regulations, directives, and orders, thereby releasing the energy and the capacity of the people with resulting all-time highs in employment, production, profits, and wages, and a record $200,000,000,000 annual national income.

BUDGET IS BALANCED

Balanced Federal budget: The Federal Treasury for the first time in 16 years is using black ink instead of red and is no longer resorting to inflationary deficit spending. Fiscal 1948 ended with the biggest Treasury surplus in all history—$8,419,469,843, seven times the previous high established 21 years ago.

Cut national debt: Prudently shaved $7,000,000,000 off the public debt.

Pruned spendthrift budgets: Cut President Truman's padded budgets more than $6,000,000,000 and lopped off more billions in hold-over war-time appropriations in the greatest, most complex government financial conversion from war to peace in all time.

Cut taxes: Reduced taxes $4,800,000,000 despite three Presidential vetoes, with 71 percent of the tax relief going to those with incomes under $5,000, 7,400,000 wage earners in the lowest brackets removed from the tax roll, married couples allowed to divide their income for tax purposes and special relief for persons over 65, and the blind.

Improved labor-management relations: Passed over Presidential veto the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Act providing fair and just procedures for peaceful settlement of labor-management disputes; protecting the rights of workers to unionize and control their unions, to bargain collectively and to strike; restoring constitutional rights of employers, and safeguarding all the people against widespread work and production stoppages that imperil the national welfare.

Exposed Communists: Battled for elimination of Communists, Fascists, and other subversives from the Federal Government; exposed Communists' infiltration in a minority of labor unions and in the Hollywood film industry; caused jailing of Communists for contempt of Congress; landed top Soviet Russia agents in jail and advanced legislation for public registration of alien-controlled Communists.

FOREIGN-AID PROGRAM

Aided foreign nations: Appropriated $9,579,657,128—$2,377,573,900 in first session and $7,202,083,228 in second session including $1,000,000,000 for reconstruction loans—for relief to impoverished humanity in foreign countries, to help reestablish their national economies and to restrain Communists' aggression; created an economic cooperation administration to administer foreign aid; kept all Congressional commitments to United Nations.

Joined International Refugee Organization and gave it $71,073,900 to carry on.

Enacted a bill to admit 205,000 displaced persons in next 2 years and permit 15,000 refugees already in the United States to remain.

Strengthened national defense: Rescued our disintegrating national Military Establishment by unifying the armed services, by forcing adoption of a plan of action, by increasing appropriations to a total of $20,500,000,000, plus contract authorizations, with special emphasis upon air power, and by adopting a temporary selective-service act; provided for development of better weapons, including atomic bombs; authorized $178,000,000 for merchant marine expansion, and revised army justice in an effort to assure completely fair treatment under army law for officers and enlisted men.

HELP FOR VETERANS

Cared for veterans: Passed 188 bills meeting needs of war veterans, including increased compensation for disabled veterans with and without dependents; increased compensation for dependent survivors of war dead; increased subsistence payments to World War II veterans in institutional training; increased allowances for student GI's; increased proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training, and cashing of GI terminal-leave bonds; higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans, and aids for veterans' housing.

Generated building boom: Took housing problem from the bungling New Deal administration; freed the building industry of stifling rules, regulations, and directives; stimulated construction through Government guarantees of building loans; had Government assume large part of responsibility for veterans' loans and gave war veterans priority in home building and rental of new homes. In 1946, under New Deal regimentation and confusion 437,800 dwelling units were completed; in 1947, under Republican free enterprise and sound Government aid, 835,100 units were completed, and in 1948 a million dwelling units will be completed in the biggest building boom of all time.

Helped farmers: Adopted long-range agriculture program pledging price support for maximum production of food; provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress; appropriated more than $500,000,000 for soil conservation; launched greatest rural road-building program in history; fostered stability of agriculture through a new, workable crop insurance act; chartered Commodity Credit Corporation, and greatly expanded Government aid in campaigns against livestock foot-and-mouth disease and crop deterrents such as weeds, insects, and other pests.

Forwarded reclamation, river and harbor improvements, flood control; rescued the vitally needed, Republican-inaugurated reclamation program for the West from President Truman's disastrous money-freeze order of August 1946, and appropriated more money for reclamation ($389,804,000) than any previous Congress; likewise made record-breaking appropriations for river and harbor improvements ($285,500,000) and flood control ($712,063,000) all being essential to expansion and protection of our national economy.

SOCIAL SECURITY EXPANDED

Expanded social security: Passed over Presidential veto a bill increasing payments by $5 per month for the needy aged and the blind, and increasing payments by $3 per month for each dependent child, thereby adding $184,000,000 annually to social-security payments received by 3,500,000 needy dependent children, the aged, and the blind; and exempting from social-security insurance payments newspaper and magazine vendors and other independent contractors over whom no employer exercises direct control, thereby preventing an impairment of the old-age and survivors insurance trust fund built up by those who had paid taxes over the years.

Established a National Heart Institute within the United States Public Health Service to fight America's No. 1 killer, diseases of the heart and circulation; provided $500,000 for the research institute to combat these diseases, which affect 1 person in 16, cause 1 out of every 3 deaths, and result in a loss of 152,000,000 workdays a year.

Provided $28,400,000 for the National Cancer Institute to study the disease of cancer and to disseminate knowledge on how to reduce its terrible toll in lives.

Provided a cost-of-living pay increase for postal and other Federal employees. Despite President Truman's opposition as expressed in a budget message to Congress, we gave 478,000 postal workers a pay increase of $450 a year each and 840,000 civil-service employees a boost of $330 each; increased some postal rates as a partial offset to the $600,000,000 cost of the pay rise.

Facilitated the making of equitable and nondiscriminatory transportation rates. Passed over Presidential veto the Reed-Bulwinkle bill, exempting railroads from antitrust suits for rate agreements, provided the rates are approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission as being in the public interest.

IMPROVED EMPLOYMENT SERVICES

Improved United States Employment Service: Enacted over Presidential veto a bill transferring and improving the United States Employment Service from the Department of Labor to the Federal Security Agency.

Created Government Reorganization Commission: Established a bipartisan commission, headed by former President Herbert Hoover, which is preparing for submission to the next Congress a comprehensive plan for reorganization of the administrative branch of the Government in the interests of efficiency and economy—a major operation on the sprawling, tax-eating bureaucracy.

Acted to limit President's terms: Submitted to the States for ratification a constitutional amendment limiting Presidents to two terms.

Authorized voluntary trade agreements: Empowered the President, upon advice of the Attorney General, to approve voluntary agreements among business firms to ration and channel commodities in short supply to the most essential purposes domestically and to meet foreign commitments.

Extended export controls: Temporarily extended and strengthened the President's authority to control exports in line with United States policy to favor cooperating nations and withhold sinews of war from noncooperating countries.

Aided small businesses: Created special committees of the Senate and House of Representatives which are seeing that small businesses, the backbone of American industry, get a fair break, especially in the awarding of Government contracts for national defense and aid to foreign nations.

Extended Reciprocal Trade Act with reasonable safeguards: Extended for 1 year the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, with amendments requiring the President to report to Congress and the people when, in secretly making a trade agreement with a foreign country, he exceeds recommendations made by the United States Tariff Commission pursuant to standards prescribed by Congress for protection of American industries and agriculture.

LEGISLATION BENEFITS ALL

The Republican Congress passed hundreds of other measures that are benefiting every segment of our population and creating wholesome conditions for prosperity and happiness; measures buttressing industries, agriculture, and mining; supplying long-needed banking legislation; strengthening the Federal Reserve banks' operation; reorganizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and in other ways making for sound national progress.

Scores of investigations of charges of fraud, corruption, and weary incompetence by the tired, warring, quarreling, bolt-ridden Democrat administration were made. Scandalous situations were exposed, including:

Gambling in the grain and other commodity markets by persons in positions to know when the Government was buying for shipment abroad—gambling that helped raise the cost of living for all our people;

Irregularities in negotiation of war contracts;

Attempts by the administration high-ups, including the President, to pervert the nonpartisan Republican-created vast reclamation program that is so vital to the West into a political football.

And, worst of all, a stubborn resistance by administration officials to a purging of Communists, pinkoes, and other subversives from the Government household was revealed.

We reorganized the congressional legislative machinery, telescoped many committees into a few and staffed them with specialists in their responsibilities.

We created a joint congressional committee which is keeping constant watch on all factors entering into the cost of living and making recommendations.

We sent our own committees across the country and thus gathered first-hand information, and we sent special committees to Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East for study and report on conditions that required action by Congress.

Fumbling and bungling by the New Dealers in our foreign relations, with their parade of Secretaries of State, have produced confusion in foreign policies that has delayed durable peace and is having an expensive impact upon our domestic economy.

CAUSE OF HIGH PRICES

Many of the ills confronting the United States and the world, root causes for high prices, about $30,000,000,000 in aid given to foreign countries since the cessation of hostilities and rebuilding of our national defenses, stem from the betrayals at Quebec, Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam.

The Republican Party had no part in making those blunders. Our leaders in Congress were not consulted when the tottering structure for peace was being built. On many of the foreign policies the so-called bipartisan policy, has been a myth because our Republican leaders were not consulted.

Responsibility for the bankrupt diplomacy cannot be escaped by the Truman administration on the ground that it is the product of bipartisan policy.

It is obvious that an administration which harbors so many who see in the Russian way of doing things a better system than our own could not be expected to follow a consistent and firm position in dealing with communism at home or abroad.

Loan to the State of Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend my remarks regarding the resolution which my very good friend and colleague, ANDREW L. SOMERS, of New York, has just submitted today, calling upon the President to direct the Export-Import Bank to extend a loan of $150,000,000 to the state of Israel.

I know that I speak for an overwhelming majority of the American people, reflected in the attitude of many Members of Congress, when I say that America's interests are deeply involved in the independence and security of the state of Israel. It is vitally essential that we make this money available at once because of the great strategic stake which we have in the Middle East, a stake which is being eyed closely today by the eastern powers.

It is a well-known fact that the most modern and most effective military power in the whole Middle East today is the new state of Israel. This is a fact which most of our so-called military experts in the State Department are rather foolishly realizing at this late date; for it is no secret that they were the very men who advised that the Arabs were the favorites in this struggle and, therefore, openly condoned the arms embargo on Palestine and the withdrawal of any and all support for the beleaguered and fighting Hebrews in Palestine. But today they will admit that they were betting on the wrong horse and they find themselves in the ticklish situation of completely reversing their policy and trying to convince the people of Israel that in all good faith we want them as our partners in the Middle East. This loan, which Mr. SOMERS has asked for today, coming at this moment, when the people of Israel are in dire need of economic capital and are burdened with the great problem of repatriation of their people from the camps of Europe, is a good way to begin to show our good faith.

One of the very few men who has for years understood and believed in the success and effectiveness of the Hebrew fighting for his homeland on his home ground, has been my good friend, the distinguished Representative from New York [Mr. SOMERS]. His vision and foresight in backing the cause of the Hebrew people is clearly seen by his long record in Congress on their behalf. And his backing has not been mere sentiment. As far back as 1940, Mr. SOMERS introduced the first bill asking for concrete legislation that was ever asked for in Congress for the Hebrew nation. At that time it was a resolution asking for the creation of a Hebrew military force in Palestine to fight against the common enemy. Even at that time Mr. SOMERS realized that the Hebrew population of Palestine and its prospective citizens scattered in Europe had to obtain military training and be accorded the right to fight against Hitler, knowing full well that the day would soon come when they would have to defend their own national freedom in Palestine. At that time Mr. SOMERS was in touch with Palestine patriots who, during those crucial and fateful years, came to talk with Members of Congress and with leaders in the American Government and asked them to believe that there would be a free Hebrew republic one day and that it would be able to defend itself and eventually become our most valuable ally in Asia Minor. Mr. SOMERS not only took Peter Bergson seriously, but he became the leader of a group of Americans who fought for aid to the Hebrew nation in their struggle for independence and freedom.

Today, of course, America is convinced that the state of Israel is a nation to be reckoned with because of their impressive defense of their state since its inception in May of 1948, against the aggressions of seven Arab League states. But, in the years prior to 1948, Mr. SOMERS was among those who realized that the underground fighters who resisted the British tyranny in their country were not terrorists but rather patriots and future citizens of a free country. The heroic war of Hebrew liberation, forced the British to relinquish their occupation of the Holy Land and give it over to the United Nations.

The people of America have always been deeply moved by the rightness and justice of the Hebrew cause, but they have been mostly impressed by the fact that any society which loves freedom so earnestly must be courted as an ally, not only for its contributions to humanity but also because of its effectiveness in defending and maintaining those contributions which are a part of our way of life.

In closing I want to say that it is particularly fitting that the United States was the first to recognize the State of Israel and it naturally follows that we will not allow this new born nation to suffer unncessarily at this crucial point in their history. At the same time, the United States has embarked on a policy of rehabilitation for all of Europe and it seems logical to ask that this small loan, which can be the beginning of a new phase in our relationship with the democratic state of Israel, be granted immediately.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter I have received from Morgan Strong, executive secretary of the Conference of Mayors and Other Municipal Officials of the State of New York, in which is set forth a resolution adopted at the annual meeting of that organization:

CONFERENCE OF MAYORS AND OTHER MUNICIPAL OFFICIALS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, N. Y., August 4, 1948.

Hon. ABRAHAM J. MULTER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The New York State Conference of Mayors passed the following resolution at its annual meeting in June urging the passage of adequate housing and urban redevelopment legislation by Congress:

"Whereas housing is a critical problem in the cities and villages in New York State; and

"Whereas these cities and villages require financial aid for the construction of public housing accommodations and for slum clearance and urban redevelopment: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the Conference of Mayors of New York State, petition the Federal Congress to enact without delay an adequate and comprehensive housing bill."

The meeting was attended by 510 city and village officials representing most of the cities and villages in the State. The resolution was adopted unanimously.

In 1947 the mayors' conference passed a similar resolution.

May we urge you to press for the passage of this legislation at the present session of Congress?

Very sincerely yours,
MORGAN STRONG,
Executive Secretary.

Why No Lighter-Than-Air Craft?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, for many years there has been an effort to have study, research, and development of lighter-than-air ships. While there has been some study by the armed forces, yet there has been no peacetime study, research, or development with reference to use of lighter-than-air craft for commercial purposes or use in time of war. It seems that every suggestion as to such study has met with opposition by the executive side of the Government.

The Congressional Aviation Policy Board believe that study should be given to lighter-than-air craft for the benefit of the people of the United States. The Senate and House passed such legislation suggested by the Congressional Aviation Policy Board, yet the President of the United States says there should be no study and I am including his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, it is a pity that because of some secret maneuvers, there is no study, operation, or development of lighter-than-air craft that might possibly benefit the people of America as well as be of assistance in time of war. Who are the secret advisers that have been able to stop the study, experiment, and development of lighter-than-air craft for the United States, especially when it has been testified that Russia has great supplies of helium, and further when the Secretary of Defense says:

The Departments of the Army and Air Force do not feel that the subject matter of the bill comes within the purview of their operations, and the Department of the Navy has informed this office that they have no plans, at the present time, for the development of lighter-than-air rigid airships for either commercial or war use.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 31, 1948.

Hon. ALVIN F. WEICHEL,
Chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This will acknowledge your letter of July 14 to Mr. Ross with respect to the President's veto of H. R. 6628, a bill to authorize the Maritime Commission to study the commercial possibility of rigid airships.

In announcing the President's veto of this measure Mr. Ross explained that among the factors which the President took into consideration was the negative conclusion concerning Government financing of this type of research reached by the Air Coordinating Committee in its survey of the problem 2 years ago. The committee concluded that a practical test of commercial possibilities would cost at least $40,000,000 and that the military and commercial possibilities appeared too limited to justify any such expenditure at that time. This conclusion was considered to be equally relevant at the present time, particularly in view of the current size of the Federal budget and the need for economy wherever possible.

In addition the President took into consideration the fact that the bill placed in the Maritime Commission responsibility for a survey which was properly the concern of the aviation agencies of the Government. The economic, engineering, and safety problems of lighter-than-air rigid aircraft are obviously more closely related to other methods of air transport than to surface vessels. As Mr. Ross indicated at the time, the President found no sound reason for placing in a nonaviation agency, which was not equipped for the purpose, the responsibility for development of a special and experimental type of air transport.

With respect to your request for copies of the recommendations received from the various departments and agencies, you are aware, I am sure, that this correspondence constitutes a privileged communication between the departments and the President. As a matter of policy, it is not believed appropriate that such agency recommendations to the President be made available.

Sincerely yours,
MATTHEW J. CONNELLY,
Secretary to the President.

The President and the Civil-Rights Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER A. RAMEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD, I include the following article by John O'Donnell:

CAPITOL STUFF

(By John O'Donnell)

Some of our solicitous and helpful readers are writing in to suggest that this Washington weather must be getting us down, that we're becoming a sourpuss, a bilious old meanie and reveal a surly temper when we look with a sour eye on Harry Truman's current breastbeating for civil rights and abolition of the poll tax.

Well, we'll break down and admit the worst. We think Truman's so-called civil-rights program is strictly poltical, that he's beating the drums for it now merely to lure the radical fringe of the New Deal away from Wallace and back into the Roosevelt-Truman fold and that under his hide Harry Truman of Missouri feels the same today on these issues as he did when he was in the Senate.

And on this point we suggest that political minds be improved by getting down the back volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and rereading the proceedings in the Senate on the hot afternoon of August 25, 1942.

We had millions of men in uniform at that time and the big question was in providing methods by which the service men and women could vote in the coming general elections in November.

That afternoon, Republican Senator C. WAYLAND BROOKS, of Illinois, called up his amendment to the soldiers vote bill.

The Brooks amendment read:

"No person in military service in time of war shall be required as a condition of voting in any election for President, Vice President, elector for President or Vice President or for Senators or Members of the House of Representatives to pay any poll tax or other tax or make any other payment to any State or political subdivision thereof."

The Brooks amendment passed, 33 to 20.

But how do you think the then Senator from Missouri voted? A lusty, booming "No."

And, how do you think his present running mate on the Democratic Presidential ticket, the Honorable "Dear ALBEN" BARKLEY, of Kentucky, voted? A rich, sonorous "nay."

The liberal Democrats that afternoon went along with a solid Republican front to put the anti-poll-tax measure across. Democrats such as Senator (now United States judge) Bone, of Washington, the late David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts, McCarran, of Nevada, Jim Mead, of New York, Bob Reynolds, of North Carolina, joined up with GOP Senators Taft, Bridges, Brooks, Lodge, Vandenberg, Wiley and the rest to kill the poll-tax restrictions in soldier voting.

But not Truman and BARKLEY. They stuck with Georgia's DICK RUSSELL (the Dixiecrat favorite at the Philadelphia convention) and the rest of the poll-tax supporters—TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, ANDREWS, of Florida, GEORGE of Georgia, and the others.

Now this flip-flop by Truman on the poll-tax issue doesn't mean that High Tax Harry, the Democratic Presidential candidate of 1948, has changed his fundamental view since the days when he was Harry the Pendergast boy from Missouri up in the United States Senate. It means that Harry, the politician, has got a bad case of the jitters, is dismayed (as well he should be) at the utter collapse and confusion of his administration, and can't even remember today his stand on important issues only a few years back.

It's of a piece with that letter we printed Monday—the letter to the St. Louis Star-Times, March 6, 1944, in which then Senator Truman angrily (and properly) resented the attempt by the late President Roosevelt to browbeat Congress into adopting his particular tax plan and scolded the legislative branch—just as President Truman is scolding the Congress today.

On Capitol Hill, the boys just give Truman a scornful brush-off. But Truman as Senator, took pen in hand and wrote—

"A little more common sense in the administration approach to things that have to be done and a little less demagogery for the purpose of appealing to the ignorant and uninformed."

But Truman the President remembers nothing of Truman the Senator and has learned nothing since he moved from Capitol Hill to 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. At this White House conference, blasting away at the congressional revelations of Red infiltration high in the Democratic administration, he gets off this crack at the co-equal legislative branch of the Government:

"The public hearings underway are serving no useful purpose. On the contrary, they are doing irreparable harm to certain persons, seriously impairing the morale of Federal employees, and undermining public confidence in Government."

In the first place it's none of a Chief Executive's business how the Congress of the United States goes about its business of collecting information on which to base legislative action. Truman is right when he says that the hearings "are doing irreparable harm" to certain persons. Among those certain persons are Presidential candidate Truman and the traitors, pinkos, fellow travelers, dupes, and lunatics brought to Washington since March 1933. When Truman says the hearings are undermining public confidence in the Government he's wrong or, more probably doesn't know the difference between the Government of the United States and the political administration which at the moment happens to be running it.

No one has lost any confidence in the Government, Mr. President. But if you say that the citizens have lost all confidence and respect for the administration which F. D. R. and you have controlled—then, brother, you said a mouthful.

Aid to China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me and correspondence relating thereto.

There being no objection, the statement and correspondence were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, as the Congress well knows, the Government of China has been engaged since the war's end in a struggle for its very existence against Chinese Communists who have been supplied with arms, ammunition, and technical advice by the Soviet Union. The Nationalist Government, which was our ally during the war, has lost to the Communists the northern half of its territories. During the long period of this fateful struggle the United States has been lax in filling its moral commitments to the Chinese Nation. It is the feeling of many of us that our Nation has lost a tremendous advantage through our laxness because we have allowed the Soviet Union to gain by default so strong a position in the East.

To remedy the deplorable trend of events in China, this Congress has taken action to provide military supplies to the Nationalist Government. The action of the Congress was taken to correct the long policy of inaction in China which the administration has espoused.

I would like at this time to present a series of letters which I ask be printed in the RECORD following these remarks. These letters, Mr. Fresident, are documentation of the fact that the administration has continued its policy of inaction and delay in China over the months since the Congress expressed in unmistakable terms its desire that $125,000,000 be made available to the Chinese Government for sorely needed military equipment.

Briefly, the record is this: By extraordinary action the Congress made available to the President on April 3 funds for the assistance of the Chinese armies. It was not until July 23 that the first dollar grant was extended to the Chinese.

The Chinese military aid was authorized in the Foreign Assistance Act which was signed into law on April 3, 1948. Under the terms of that act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was authorized and instructed to advance money both for China and for the European recovery program. The urgency of the China situation had been stressed throughout the congressional discussion of the bill and there can have been no doubt on the part of the administration that Congress intended immediate action to make available military supplies which the Chinese might request.

The record shows, however, that the administration acted with great dispatch on the European recovery program while it delayed for months to make funds available to China. To illustrate, by June 30, 1948, procurement and authorizations for OEEC countries and Trieste totaled $738,000,000. By June 30, 1948, no aid at all had been extended to China. No aid was extended to China until July 23 and the amount of grants certified to date stands under $9,000,000, which is roughly one-fourteenth spent in the first 4 months of the $125,000,000 appropriated for a year.

The letters which I have asked to be inserted in the RECORD indicate the following chronology of delay on the part of the administration:

1. On April 3, 1948, I addressed a letter to Secretary of Defense Forrestal asking that he furnish the Appropriations Committee for its hearings a statement of the amount and character of military assistance which the Nationalist Government of China needs at this time. The Secretary replied that such a study was being carried out.

2. On April 3, $13,500,000 was made available by law for assistance to the Chinese on such terms as they might request. It was intended that this assistance should be of a military nature.

3. The first action on the part of the President occurred on June 2, nearly 2 months later, when he allocated the Reconstruction Finance Corporation advance to the Secretary of the Treasury. At the same time he informed the Secretary of State of the terms under which the grants would be made available to the Chinese.

4. On June 28 I wrote a letter to the Secretary of State calling for a full explanation of the fact that the Chinese Government had not even been informed at that time of the terms under which they could apply for the military assistance provided in congressional action 3 months previously. On that same date the Department of State dispatched a note to the Chinese Ambassador informing him of the terms under which the grants would be made. Three days later, on July 1, the Chinese Ambassador acknowledged receipt of the note. My letter to the Secretary was answered July 1 in a highly unsatisfactory manner by the Department counselor.

5. On July 1, following the conference of the Appropriations Committee on the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act, Congressman JOHN

TABER, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, and I, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, wrote a letter to the President informing him that the conference expressed a clear desire that the $125,000,000 appropriated "should be matched to the military requirements of China in accordance with the general proposals" made by the Army when its spokesmen appeared before the Appropriations Committees. The President replied on July 28 that he had "directed the Secretary of Defense to render appropriate assistance to the Chinese Government in the acquisition of such military supplies as the Chinese Government may request."

6. On July 28, the President sent directives to the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Defense which made it possible for Army, Navy, and other Government departments and agencies to participate in the program of shipping military supplies to the Chinese. Without this aid it would have been enormously expensive and inefficient for private Chinese procurement agents to buy arms and ammunitions from American suppliers.

Mr. President, no one in the Congress is more gratified than I am that the program of aiding the Chinese Government to withstand Communist military forces is finally under way. Our policy of inaction during the years since the war's end has had disastrous consequences in the Far East. The advantage which the Soviet Union has gained might well spell the difference between survival and defeat if the forces of totalitarianism and democratic government are ever thrown into open conflict. It is, however, inexcusable that this delay of nearly 4 months should have occurred between the time when the Congress made money available to aid the Chinese armies and the date when the administration made its first payment to the Chinese.

The policy which this Government has pursued in China in the last few years cannot by any stretch of language be termed a bipartisan policy. The views of the administration and the views of the Eightieth Congress have been in open conflict. To this date the policy of the administration has prevailed. The Chinese have been abandoned to their own devices to carry out a struggle with Communists backed by the ruthless and powerful Soviet state.

It is my hope that a new policy has begun in China, a policy that has been forced by congressional action. It is my hope that the tactics of deliberate delay which the administration has shown in relations with the Chinese Government are at an end. It is my hope that the Chinese Government at last will have the support of American arms and ammunitions to wage for itself and for all freemen its battles against communism. The hopes which I express here today are shared, I am sure, by the majority of the Members of this body and by the American people.

Hon. JAMES FORRESTAL,
Secretary of Defense,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, which was approved by the Congress April 2, authorizes an appropriation of $125,000,000 for grants-in-aid to China. In the conference report of the managers on the part of the House and the Senate it is declared that the $125,000,000 should be provided allowing for aid of military character.

Since this committee now must consider the appropriation to be made, it is requested that you furnish to the committee a statement of the amount and character of military assistance which the Nationalist Government of China needs at this time.

In determining the appropriation that is to be earmarked for military assistance, this committee desires access to such information as you may have received from requests by the Nationalist Government, reports by our Army advisory group in China, or general surveys of the Chinese military situation made by the Department of National Defense.

It is recognized, of course, that the terms of the Senate bill 2202 place the initiative with the Nationalist Government in requesting grants-in-aid for military purposes out of the money appropriated. It is the apparent intent of Congress, however, to hold out to China an offer of American assistance that is reasonable when measured against the known needs of the Nationalist Government in its struggle against the Russian-supported Communists in China.

Sincerely yours,

STYLES BRIDGES.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 2, 1948.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,

MY DEAR SECRETARY: I am in general in accord with the position expressed in your memorandum to me of May 14, 1948, regarding the provision of additional aid to China as authorized by section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948. It is my desire that the grants to China under this section of the act be made under the following procedures:

1. The Chinese Government will, from time to time, submit to the Department of State requests for payment with respect to commodities or services procured by it, supported by invoices or other appropriate documentation evidencing the transactions.

2. The Department of State will examine the documentation submitted by the Chinese Government to determine that the request is not in excess of the total represented by the invoices or other supporting data, and will authorize the Treasury to make the appropriate payments to the Chinese Government.

3. The Secretary of State will request from the Chinese Government monthly reports showing in as much detail as possible the purposes for which expenditures have been made out of the funds provided to it under the authority of section 404 (b) of the act.

Attached is a copy of my letter to the Secretary of the Treasury informing him of this procedure and making an allocation of $13,500,000 to carry out the provisions of section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 2, 1948.

The Honorable SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Pursuant to the authority of section 404 (b) and section 406 of the China Aid Act of 1948 (title IV, Public Law 472, 80th Cong.), I hereby allocate to you the sum of $13,500,000 out of the funds advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to carry out the provisions of the said China Aid Act of 1948. Please take the necessary steps to effect this allocation.

Out of the funds allocated hereunder disbursements are to be made by you to the Chinese Government upon certification by the Department of State that the amounts requested are supported by invoices submitted by the Chinese Government, which the Department has examined to determine that the request is not in excess of the total represented by these invoices. A record of these disbursements should be forwarded monthly to the Department of State.

The Secretary of State will further advise the Chinese Government to furnish him monthly reports showing in as much detail as practicable the purposes for which expenditures have been made out of the funds made available under the authority of section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948.

At such time as appropriations may become available for the purpose of carrying out section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948, further allocations will be made out of such appropriations, to be disbursed in accordance with the terms of this letter.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

JUNE 28, 1948.

The Honorable GEORGE C. MARSHALL,
The Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Because of the urgent need of the Chinese Government for military supplies and economic aid, and the vital interest of the American people in the maintenance of Chinese independence, the Congress of the United States, on April 3, 1948, authorized and directed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to advance $50,000,000 for the purposes of the China Aid Act.

From April 3, 1948, to the present day, the Department of State has failed to use any portion of this sum for the purchase of military supplies by the Chinese Government. There has been a general laxness throughout Government in freeing the advances for China aid to be used by the Chinese Government. Although the advance of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for European recovery was made available in April, the funds for China military aid, which were provided in the same legislation, were not released until the middle of June. Moreover, none of this money has been expended to aid China since its expenditure was authorized.

The facts are as follows:

The China Aid Act passed by the Congress on April 3, 1948, authorized, in section 404 (b), appropriation of a sum not to exceed $125,000,000 for additional (military) aid to China through grants "on such terms as the President may determine and without regard to the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948."

In section 406 of the same act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was authorized and directed to make advances, not to exceed in the aggregate $50,000,000 to carry out the provisions of the China Aid Act of 1948, in such manner and in such amounts as the President shall determine.

This sum of $50,000,000 was intended to cover advances upon the economic and military aid, pending an appropriation by Congress. On April 5, 1948, officials of the State Department informed Chinese officials that of this sum $36,500,000 would be for the economic-aid program and $13,500,000 for the special (military) aid.

Since April 5, 1948, the Chinese Government has repeatedly attempted to obtain from the Department of State a statement of the necessary procedure for utilizing the $13,500,000, as well as the total sum of $125,000,000. No reply has yet been given by the Department of State, in spite of the fact that on June 10, at the open hearing of the Senate Appropriations Committee, the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Thorp, presented to the committee a letter, dated June 2, 1948, outlining the procedure for the utilization of the special-aid fund. (A copy of the letter of the President is attached hereto.)

Because the Department of State and other agencies of the Government have delayed in making these funds available for expenditure, the Chinese Government for nearly 3 months has been prevented from utilizing the military aid authorized by the Congress on April 3.

In view of the extremely serious military situation in China, where Chinese Government Armies with insufficient supplies are being attacked by more than 2,000,000 well-armed Communists, the delay of the Department of State in this matter is clearly contrary to the vital interests of the American people.

It is my desire that you furnish to the Senate Committee on Appropriations a full explanation of the slow action by the Department of State in this very urgent situation. The committee would like assurance, also, that immediate action will be taken to carry out the wishes of Congress that were expressed in the enactment of Public Law 472 last April.

Sincerely yours,

STYLES BRIDGES.

JULY 1, 1948.

The Honorable STYLES BRIDGES,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BRIDGES: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of June 28, 1948, in regard to the extension of aid to China as authorized by Public Law 472, in which you ask for an "explanation of the slow action by the Department of State" and request assurance that immediate action will be taken to carry out the wishes of the Congress as expressed in the enactment of Public Law 472.

The China Aid Act of 1948 (title IV of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948) authorized the appropriation of $463,000,000 for assistance to China to remain available for obligation for the period of 1 year. Of this total, $338,000,000 was authorized to be appropriated for economic-type assistance, which would be administered by the Administrator for Economic Cooperation. The sum of $125,000,000 was authorized to be appropriated for additional aid to China through grants, on such terms as the President might determine and without regard to the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948.

On April 30, 1948, after consultation with the Administrator for Economic Cooperation and subsequent negotiation with Chinese Government representatives, the Secretary of State exchanged notes with the Chinese Ambassador, which until July 3, 1948, would provide a legal basis for the implementation of section 404 (a) of the China Aid Act of 1948. Prior to this exchange of notes, the Acting Secretary of State addressed a letter to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget recommending that the $50,000,000 advance by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation authorized under section 406 of the China Aid Act of 1948 be divided as follows: $36,500,000 to the Administrator for Economic Cooperation to provide initial economic assistance to China and $13,500,000 to be reserved as part of the additional aid through grants to the Chinese Government to be transferred in accordance with the terms decided upon by the President.

Accordingly, $36,500,000 has been made available to the Administrator for Economic Cooperation for use in the program of economic assistance. Most of these funds have been committed for commodities which have either arrived in China or are in the process of being shipped to China.

Following detailed discussion by representatives of the Bureau of the Budget, the Treasury Department, and the Department of State of the question of the terms to govern the transfer of the funds under the $125,000,000 grants in additional aid authorized in section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948, the Secretary of State submitted a memorandum dated May 14, 1948, to the President in which he recommended that the President delegate his powers under section 404 (b) of the act to the Secretary of the Treasury. On May 18 the Under Secretary of State forwarded a letter to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget enclosing a draft letter of allocation setting forth these terms and asking for Presidential approval thereof.

During the hearings on the China Aid Act of 1948 before the House Appropriations Committee, members of the committee indicated to representatives of the Department of State and the Economic Cooperation Administration concern over what was regarded as a lack of adequate control of the expenditure of the $125,000,000 grants to be made available to the Chinese Government in accordance with the provisions of the China Aid Act of 1948. On May 24, 1948, the committee in executive session asked the Under Secretary of State for a statement of the arrangements to be prescribed by the President for the transfer of these $125,000,000 grants to the Chinese Government. Statements by members of the committee indicated that the terms which had been set forth in the draft letter of allocation forwarded to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget by the Under Secretary of State on May 18 would not conform to the wishes of the committee in this respect. The Bureau of the Budget, therefore, in consultation with the Department of State, revised the terms contained in the draft letter of allocation and forwarded the revised terms to the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee in a letter dated May 26, 1948. The chairman was informed that the President had not yet issued any determination of the terms for these grants and that no payments had yet been authorized from the advances made available for this purpose under section 406 of the China Aid Act of 1948. He was also informed that the arrangements presently contemplated included procedures which were set forth in the letter.

Under date of June 2, 1948, the President addressed a letter to the Secretary of State outlining the procedures under which the $125,000,000 grants authorized in section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948 were to be made available to the Chinese Government and stating that the Secretary of the Treasury had been informed of these procedures and that an allocation of $13,500,000 had been made to him to carry out the provisions of section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948.

The Department of State had already prepared a note to the Chinese Ambassador communicating to him the above-mentioned terms and was on the verge of transmitting this note when indications were received that the House of Representatives was considering a foreign-aid appropriation bill which contained a proviso that the administration of the China-aid program conform with the objectives of assistance to Greece and Turkey. This would have required the imposition of terms different from those called for in the enabling legislation and would thus have made impossible the use of the terms decided upon by the President, as set forth in his letter of June 2, 1948, to the Secretary of State. On June 4, 1948, the House of Representatives passed the foreign-aid appropriation bill (H. R. 6801) containing the above-described proviso, reducing the total amount of aid for China from $463,000,000 to $400,000,000 and making no provision for an earmark of $125,000,000 for additional aid through grants. The Department of State did not, therefore, consider that it could communicate terms to the Chinese Government regarding these $125,000,000 grants which would be clearly inapplicable and inappropriate in the light of the action of the House of Representatives. Consequently, further action in this regard was held in abeyance pending the passage of legislation by the Congress appropriating funds for implementation of the China Aid Act of 1948.

The views of the Department on the reductions in the estimates and on the proposed controls are contained in the letter of June 10, 1948, addressed to you by the Under Secretary of State.

On June 15, 1948, the Senate approved certain amendments to the foreign-aid appropriation bill, 1949, one of which removed the Greek-Turkey proviso contained in the House bill and thus made the $125,000,000 grants available in accordance with the terms of the enabling legislation. On June 19, 1948, the foreign-aid appropriation bill, 1949, was sent to conference. The conference report shows that the total amount of aid to China was reduced from $463,000,000 to $400,000,000, that the Greek-Turkey proviso was removed from the bill and that the $125,000,000 grants were thus to be made available to China in accordance with section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948. The Foreign Aid Appropriation Act, 1949, was then passed by the Congress on the same day.

The President signed the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act, 1949, on June 28, 1948. On the following day the Department of State forwarded a note, dated June 28, 1948, to the Chinese Ambassador communicating the terms prescribed by the President governing the transfer of the $125,000,000 grants under section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948 and informing him that implementation of this section of the act would be promptly undertaken upon the receipt of a note indicating the Chinese Government's agreement to these terms. A copy of this note is attached for your information.

At the same time the Department of State forwarded copies of this note to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. In the letter transmitting a copy of this note, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget was asked to take the necessary action to have allocated to the Secretary of the Treasury the funds authorized under section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948 and appropriated by the Congress in the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act, 1949.

I am certain that you will recognize from the foregoing description of the circumstances relating to the $125,000,000 grants under the China Aid Act of 1948 that the Department of State has taken and is taking all possible steps to carry out the wishes of the Congress as expressed in the enactment of the China Aid Act of 1948 and the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act, 1949.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. BOHLEN, Counselor.

JUNE 28, 1948.

His Excellency Dr. V. K. WELLINGTON KOO, Chinese Ambassador.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to inform you that, in accordance with the authorization contained in section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948 (title IV of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948) and subject to the provisions of the act appropriating funds thereunder, the Government of the United States is prepared, for the period of 1 year following the date of enactment of the act, to extend to the Government of the Republic of China additional aid through grants in the amount of $125,000,000 which have been appropriated for this purpose by the Congress in the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act of 1949. As stated in section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948, this aid is to be extended on such terms as the President of the United States may determine and without regard to the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948.

Pursuant to the authorization under the act, the President of the United States has determined that the extension of additional aid under these grants shall be governed by the following terms:

1. The Government of the Republic of China shall, through its authorized representatives in Washington, present from time to time to the Secretary of State formal written requests for payment with respect to commodities or services procured or to be procured by it, supported by invoices, contracts, or other appropriate documentation evidencing the transactions.

2. The Secretary of State shall upon the receipt of such requests, supported by invoices, contracts, or other appropriate documentation evidencing the transactions, authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make the appropriate payments to the Government of the Republic of China.

3. The Government of the Republic of China shall furnish the Secretary of State monthly reports showing in as much detail as practicable the purposes for which expenditures have been made out of funds provided to it under the authority of section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948.

I should appreciate receiving notification of your Government's agreement to the terms set forth above for the extension of this additional aid under section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948. Upon the receipt of a note indicating your Government's acceptance of these terms, the implementation of this section of the act may be promptly undertaken.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

For the Secretary of State:

ROBERT A. LOVETT,
Under Secretary.

JULY 1, 1948.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: During the hearings on China aid before the Senate and House Committees on Appropriations this spring testimony was taken in executive session on the military needs of China. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer, appearing with Secretary of the Army Kenneth C. Royall, made certain proposals for the expenditure of $125,000,000 for military requirements. The Congress has subsequently voted appropriations of $125,000,000 in the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act.

During the conference between the Senate and House conferees on the bill it was the unanimous decision that the chairmen of the committees should communicate with you and express the desire that the administration check the expenditure of this $125,000,000 very carefully. There was a clear expression in the conference of a desire that this money should be matched to the military requirements of China in accordance with the general proposals made by Secretary Royall and General Wedemeyer.

Respectfully yours,

STYLES BRIDGES,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Appropriations.
JOHN TABER,
Chairman, House Committee on Appropriations.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 16, 1948.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

(1) To the Economic Cooperation Administration, the sum of $238,500,000, to be consolidated with the previous allocation of $36,500,000 made to that agency pursuant to my letter of April 30, 1948. These funds are to be utilized by the Economic Cooperation Administration for carrying out the provisions of the China Aid Act of 1948 pursuant to Executive Order 9943, approved April 9, 1948.

(2) To the Secretary of the Treasury, the sum of $111,500,000, to be consolidated with the previous allocation of $13,500,000 made pursuant to my letter of June 2, 1948. These funds are for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948 and are to be disbursed in accordance with the terms set forth in my letter of June 2, 1948.

This letter will supersede my letter of July 3, 1948, allocating to you the sum of $125,000,000 for aid to China from the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act, 1949 (Public Law 793, 80th Cong.).

Will you please arrange for the necessary transfer of funds and advise the Economic Cooperation Administrator and the Secretary of State when this has been done. A copy of this letter is being sent to those officials.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 28, 1948.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: My letter of June 2, 1948, addressed to you concerning the provision of additional aid to China as authorized by section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948 is amended to read in pertinent part as follows:

"It is my desire that the grants to China under this section of the act, which grants are hereby made, shall be paid under the following procedures:

"1. The Chinese Government will from time to time submit to the Department of State requests for payment with respect to commodities or services procured or ordered by it, supported by purchase orders, contracts, invoices, or other appropriate documentation evidencing the transactions.

"2. The Department of State will examine the documentation submitted by the Chinese Government to determine that the request is not in excess of the total represented by the supporting data and will authorize the Treasury to make the appropriate payments to the Chinese Government. The Treasury Department shall make the payments in accordance with such authorization.

"3. In those cases in which the Chinese Government wishes to arrange for the procurement or furnishing of supplies or services by any department, agency, or establishment of the United States Government, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State as to the availability of funds prior to the procurement or furnishing of such supplies or services and pursuant to sections 403 and 113 (a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, such department, agency, or establishment is authorized to submit to the Department of State requests for reimbursement of appropriations or for advance payments. On the basis of such requests, the Department of State will authorize the Treasury Department to make reimbursements or advance payments to such department, agency, or establishment.

"4. The Secretary of State will request from the Chinese Government monthly reports showing in as much detail as possible the purposes for which expenditures have been made out of the funds provided to it under the authority of section 404 (b) of the act."

Attached is a copy of my letter to the Secretary of the Treasury advising him of this decision.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE,

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: My letters of allocation under section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948 (title IV, Public Law 472, 80th Cong.), dated June 2 and July 16, 1948, are hereby amended in pertinent part to conform with the attached letter addressed to the Secretary of State establishing procedures under which payments under that act shall be made.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 28, 1948.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I enclose copies of letters addressed by me to the Secretary of State and to the Secretary of the Treasury setting forth the procedures to be applied to the additional aid to China authorized by section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act of 1948. I also enclose a copy of a memorandum addressed to me by the Secretary of State with reference to facilitating the procurement of military supplies by the Chinese Government. There are further enclosed copies of an exchange of letters on the same subject with Chairmen BRIDGES and TABER, of the Senate and House Appropriations Committees.

Will you please take such action as may be appropriate in the circumstances to facilitate the acquisition by the Chinese Government of such military supplies as the Chinese Government may request, either by making available existing stocks of the National Defense Establishment or by arranging for the procurement of such supplies on behalf of that Government?

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 28, 1948.

Hon. STYLES BRIDGES,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BRIDGES: Thank you for your letter sent jointly with Chairman TABER, House Appropriations Committee, further expressing the views of the Senate-House conferees with respect to the expenditure of the $125,000,000 authorized for grants to China under section 404 (b) of the China Aid Act.

I have instructed the Secretary of State to check the supporting data submitted by the Chinese Government in connection with requested payments to assure that no authorization for payment is issued in excess of appropriated funds. In addition I have directed the Secretary of Defense to render appropriate assistance to the Chinese Government in the acquisition of such military supplies as the Chinese Government may request. Accordingly, due consideration will be given to the general proposals made by Secretary of the Army Royall and General Wedemeyer to the Senate and House Appropriations Committees.

All administrative checks and controls related to this program will, of course, have to be carried out in a manner consistent with the clearly stated desire of the Congress that assistance furnished under this program shall not be construed as an expressed or implied assumption by the United States of any responsibility for policies, acts, or undertakings of the Republic of China or for conditions which may prevail in China at any time.

I have sent a similar letter to Chairman TABER, House Appropriations Committee.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

Why I Like the Mundt-Nixon Bill

OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I take this opportunity of calling attention to an interesting article by Godfrey Schmidt entitled "Why I Like the Mundt-Nixon Bill" appearing in the July issue of the monthly magazine Information:

WHY I LIKE THE MUNDT-NIXON BILL

(By Godfrey Schmidt)

"The Devil's first trick is his incognito," wrote Denis de Rougemont. Likewise, it is the Communist's cleverest wile to convince us that he does not exist. That is why he scurries about his nefarious purposes under the cover of civil liberties. He offers incense to liberty, and he gets smoke in people's eyes so they can't see him. He battens on the intellectual confusions of the people who have no faint notion of the respective spheres of liberty and authority. He may have heard of Lincoln's dilemma: "Must a government of necessity be too strong for the liberties of its people or too weak to maintain its own existence?" He wants Russia to be strong. He does what he can to make Czechoslovakia weak—until it is weak enough to be clutched. Then he even drops the pretense of civil liberties. For his ministry of interior can then arrest people, and afterward his ministry of justice can execute them. From the point of view of statistical averages, you don't have to arrest and execute very many. With a few horrible examples, you can frighten the majority while you work on them with your ministry of information. What you can't stifle by propaganda you can suppress by censor. In the end you will mold a docile electorate before whom you can perpetrate the spectacle of a rigged election. You can even manage a Communist dictatorship with a coalition government as long as you hold some key ministries and as long as you mislead the people with slogans like "Divide the land"; "Higher wages"; "Lower prices"; "Give us bread"; "Down with imperialist capitalists"; "Power for the workers," etc.

LIBERTY'S PRICE

I like the Mundt-Nixon bill because it erects a rampart from which we can more easily be eternally vigilant. It provides a way for being democratic without being stupid. It cuts a middle path between the horns of Lincoln's dilemma. I see no reason why alert Americans should have to wait until Communist politicos infest strategic positions in the United States before recognizing communism as a clear and present danger, even here.

NOT SUSTAINED

In this connection I don't appreciate the relevance of twaddle to the effect that you can't prosecute or persecute an idea. Communism in the United States is not simply an idea. Moreover, false ideas are prosecuted and persecuted whenever they are stripped from their trappings of half truth and hypocrisy. One of the reasons why some people dislike anything but license in the area of civil liberties is that they can't or won't distinguish between good and evil ideologies—or between good and evil, error and truth.

After social reforms, the very best way of fighting against communism is to deprive it of its incognito. I know of no reason why we can't join social reform with the Mundt-Nixon bill. As a matter of fact, in this election your politicians are vying with each other in their proposals of social reform. But that is no reason why we should bait the hook of the Reds who would have us believe that democracies do not have the power to effectively defend themselves against the secret marauders of civil liberties.

THE UNDERGROUND

The politically naive and immature keep saying: "If you do that to the Communists, they'll go underground." Poor, simple soul, don't you realize that in countries like this they are always underground? The part of them that you can see is make-believe, pretense. It's the part that you don't see, because it is hidden under the incognito, that you would fear if you did see it. If you take them at face value, you are doing precisely what they want you to do. When they drop the incognito so that you can believe what you see, it's too late. Then you are in the same fix as Czechoslovakia or Poland or Rumania. And even then they are underground—with their secret police, their snide terrorism, their devious propaganda. The monument to young Pavel Morozov, the boy who informed on his father and mother and thus sent them to execution, means that they bore secretly even into that closest of all communities: the family.

Some of the criticisms of the Mundt-Nixon bill have been so general that I ask myself whether their authors have read the bill itself.

MORE SANCTIONS

Section 5 makes violation of the act, as proved by court conviction, punishable by loss of citizenship. People may differ as to whether such punishment is condign. Personally, I think it is too severe. But I must confess that reasonable men of good will who have a proper appreciation of the danger which communism involves, and of the evil fascination which it has for some people, might differ from me in this respect.

DISSECTION

Let us be more specific, taking the bill apart section by significant section.

Section 1 simply gives the bill a title "Subversive Activities Control Bill, 1948."

Section 2 is a summary, in the form of legislative findings, of the nature of the Communist totalitarian peril. With dispassionate accuracy it makes out an irrefutable statement of the necessity for legislation of this type:

"The system of government known as totalitarian dictatorship is characterized by the existence of a single political party, organized on a dictatorial * * * basis * * * (it) results in the destruction of free democratic institutions, the ruthless suppression of all opposition to the party in power, the complete subordination of the rights of individuals to the state * * * control over the people through fear, terrorism and brutality. * * * A world Communist movement which in its origins, its development, and its present practice is a world-wide revolutionary political movement whose purpose it is by treachery, deceit, infiltration * * * to establish a Communist totalitarian dictatorship in all the countries of the world. * * * The recent success of Communist methods in other countries and the nature * * * of the world Communist movement itself present a clear and present danger to the security of the United States."

A country which has foresworn some 37 treaty or international obligations, which has sabotaged the UNO, which has its quislings in practically every country of the world, which has spilled its tyranny and aggrandizement over 13 neighboring countries, some of which were its allies—such a country seems to me to have out-Hitlered Hitler. If the latter's clear and present danger could evoke the retort of war, I think it is rather moderate to oppose Mr. Stalin's American intrigues with the Mundt-Nixon bill.

THE HEART OF THE BILL

Section 3 makes certain definitions: "Communist political organization" and "Communist-front organization." There is no substitute for a cereful reading of these crucial definitions. They are too long for full quotation or discussion in an article of this scope. In my view they are accurately, prudently, and effectively contrived. The Communist political organization is tied by every definition to control by the foreign government or foreign governmental or political organization which directs the world Communist movement. Soviet Russia is not mentioned. It is very clearly aimed at. Some 10 considerations are formulated for the guidance of those charged with interpreting the definition. Among these considerations are: the extent to which its policies are under the direction and control of the world Communist movement; the extent to which its views and policies are the same as those of such foreign government; the extent to which it receives financial or other aid, directly or indirectly, from * * * such foreign government; the extent to which it reports to such foreign government, etc. The net effect of these various considerations is that they could not possibly be applied to any party except one controlled by Moscow.

A Communist-front organization is one as to which in view of certain formulated considerations it is reasonable to conclude that * * * it is under the control of a Communist political organization.

I have reread these salient definitions many times, and can find no serious fault with them. On the contrary I think they are exhibits of fine legislative prudence and statesmanship.

PENALTIES

Section 4 of the bill makes it unlawful for any person to promote establishment in the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship controlled by any foreign government, foreign organization, or foreign individual. Violators are subject to fines up to $10,000, or imprisonment up to 10 years, or both.

Perhaps the most serious criticism which can be leveled at the bill is that it provides no statute of limitations for offenses under this section.

Section 6 makes it unlawful for any member of the Communist political organization to seek or accept Federal office or employment without revealing that he is a member of such organization. No one could be convicted under this section unless it could be proved that he knowingly participated in a Communist political organization which he believed or had reasonable grounds for believing was the type of organization defined by the bill. Also, every Government officer or employee is forbidden to employ anyone whom he knows to be a member of a Communist political organization.

RED AGENTS

Section 7 forbids Communist agents who move from country to country from applying for or renewing passports if they are members of a Communist political organization (not a mere front organization). Government officials are forbidden to issue or renew such passports.

Section 8 requires each Communist political organization and each Communist-front organization to register with the Attorney General, to make accounting of all moneys received and spent annually and to list the names and addresses of officers. A Communist political organization must, in addition, register its members during the preceding 12 months.

Section 9 opens to public inspection all registration statements filed under the act. And section 10 proscribes the act of remaining a member of an organization found by the Attorney General to be a Communist political organization, if that organization has not registered as required by the proposed act.

Section 11 requires the labeling of propaganda sponsored by Communist organizations.

THE PRIVILEGES

Section 12 forbids tax exemption to persons who give money to a registered organization or to an organization which the Attorney General has ordered to register. The activities of such organizations are not tax exempt.

Section 13 gives to the Attorney General power to investigate and to decide whether or not an organization is a Communist political organization or a Communist-front organization. Hearings must be public and must comply with due process.

RIGHT OF APPEAL

Section 14 provides for appeals to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia with review by the Supreme Court of the United States in a proper case.

It is unfortunate, I think, that the power to investigate and the power to prosecute is lodged with an official (the Attorney General) who is also called upon to discharge a quasi-judicial function. My own preference is for independent tribunals if they are to have the responsibility of quasi-adjudication. But the predominant pattern of American administrative law has long justified such blending of function. There was precisely this type of commingling of function in the National Labor Relations Board under the Wagner Act.

Finally, section 15 prescribes penalties: Fines of from two to five thousand dollars and/or imprisonment of from 2 to 5 years for officers of a Communist political organization or a Communist-front which does not register or which falsifies in doing so.

SANE AND SOUND

Except for the three respects to which I called attention, this bill seems to me to be a sane, moderate, effective, and necessary legislative tool for the control of a very serious problem confronting not only America but the world at large. The merits of the bill far outweigh its defects. The defects can easily be corrected.

OPPONENTS

Of course, the William Z. Fosters and the Henry Wallaces do not like the bill. Wallace misrepresents it by pretending to see in the bill an attack upon strikes. (The same Mr. Wallace seems to see nothing but peaceful intentions in Mr. Joseph Stalin.) Mr. Foster, who is the head of the Communist Party in America today, tries to make us believe that the bill is a monstrous misrepresentation of the benign and humanitarian aims of communism. The man who wrote Toward Soviet America in 1932 saw America in the light of Communist ideology and aspiration. He could hardly be depended upon to see the Communist profanation of America in the light of patriotic duty.

MERE SELF-DEFENSE

The Mundt bill is an act of rational and appropriate self-defense. Even if it pretends to no credentials of glory, I can find in it none of the blemishes of damnation which its critics say they see in it. And I think that I have a sturdy and a wholesome respect for the sacredness of the human person and for the Pauline notion of liberty under law.

Berlin Crisis Blamed on New Deal Blunders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN SANBORN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, in substantiation of my statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 4, 1948, regarding the Berlin crisis, I want to extend my remarks to include the following article which was carried in the August issue of the Steuben News:

BERLIN CRISIS BLAMED ON NEW DEAL BLUNDERS—MONEY FIASCO MAIN CAUSE OF RED REPRISAL

(By Leslie Gould)

A blunder by the Roosevelt-Truman administration on occupation currency in Germany set the stage for the current Russian siege of Berlin, with its danger of setting the spark for world war III.

This blunder was in turning over to the Russians the plates for printing American occupational German marks, convertible into dollars, but not into rubles.

The Russians printed upward of $200,000,000 of these marks, which were identical with the American-issued currency.

The flooding of Germany with these marks contributed to the black markets and inflation in Germany, climaxing in the just decreed 90 percent devaluation of the German currency.

BLOCKADE IS RED REPRISAL

It was this devaluation that brought the Russian reprisal—the blocking of all but air travel into Berlin.

The scandal on the American Government's handing over to the Soviet the plates for printing the marks was first disclosed in the New York Journal-American in 1944.

How serious this blunder on the German currency is, may be judged by the way the War Department still endeavors to cover up the true facts on this scandalous situation.

All inquiries as to just how much currency was printed by the Russians from the American plates and how much was redeemed by the United States get nowhere. Just a lot of double talk.

The War Department even refused this writer information given reluctantly a year ago to a congressional committee. The effort still is to cover up, gloss over, and create an impression that it wasn't so bad.

It is one of those things that the powers that be would like to have forgotten. So they aren't talking. This is obviously on order from the top.

This was one of a series of blunders first by President Roosevelt and later by President Truman in dealing with Stalin.

THE INITIAL BLUNDER

The initial blunder was holding back the American invasion army until the Russians could reach Berlin and take over the surrounding territory.

The others were at Yalta by Roosevelt and at Potsdam by Truman.

Roosevelt and Truman operated on the mistaken theory that you can work with and trust the Russians and that Stalin's word is good. Even today Truman calls Stalin "Old Joe" and a "decent fellow."

In this blundering they agreed to make Berlin an island in Soviet-controlled territory and compounded this boner by failing to provide in writing for an international corridor into Berlin.

This left American, British, and French forces in Berlin at the mercy of the Soviets, who are run by a dictatorship as absolute and foul as that of Hitler.

SURROUNDED BY REDS

There are approximately 10,000 Allied combat troops in Berlin surrounded by 70,000 Russians.

There are 2,750,000 Berliners in the Allied zone, also at the mercy of the Soviet. The Russians control all highway and rail traffic in and out of Berlin. These have been blockaded in a tough move by the Communists to starve out the Allied forces or force the American, British, and French to grant them a share in the rich Ruhr Valley.

The prize in this international poker game is Germany, for the side that controls Germany and its potentially great industrial plant will dominate Europe.

For Europe, it has been found, cannot live or recover from the war without a producing Germany. Europe is dependent on Germany's coal, coke, and steel.

Unable to unite Germany, because of the diplomats, and military blunders dictated largely by Roosevelt and Truman, the Allies are endeavoring to organize Western Germany as an economic unit. Western Germany comprises about 76 percent of the country and a little less of the population.

This comprises the heart of German industry, but the Russians in their 24 percent of Germany control the food-producing regions and some industry.

This makes for a lopsided economy, further aggravated by inflation and the dismantling of German factories and their shipment to Russia.

The German currency was first inflated by Hitler and later by the occupying nations. This was where the Roosevelt-Truman Administration made its colossal blunder of turning over to the Russians the plates for printing American occupational marks.

These marks had the same purchasing value as the German marks issued under Hitler and until the scandal was exposed were convertible into dollars at the rate of 10 for a dollar. The Russians did not make this currency convertible into rubles.

Giving the Russians the plates had the same effect as if the Secretary of the Treasury turned over to a gang of counterfeiters the plates from which dollar bills are printed.

This is a very touchy subject in Washington, but until convertibility in dollars was stopped the United States Army redeemed $380,000,000 in Allied military currency in excess of appropriated funds and most of it was printed by the Russians.

As far as can be found out, the Russians still have the plates. Originally, a dash after the serial number permitted identification of the Russian printed marks, but a mysterious change in the American plates no longer made this possible.

This ridiculous appeasement of Stalin fanned the inflation in Germany and broadened the black market, until something had to be done. This something was the just announced devaluation of the German mark through issuance of a new Deutsche mark.

EXCHANGE 10 FOR 1

One new Deutsche mark is being exchanged for 10 old Reichsmarks. A limit was placed on the number of old marks that could be exchanged initially. Black marketeers will be caught, as the holders of large amounts must prove the money was legitimately earned.

The move put the Russians on the spot. They had been the chief supplier of black market marks, largely from the printing plates handed them by Roosevelt. To prevent a wholesale lumping of old marks in the Russian territory, the Soviet also had to issue a new currency. They did this by putting stickers on the old marks.

In retaliation, "decent old Joe" Stalin ordered the blockade of Berlin.

If this results in a shooting war, the blame rests with the New Deal administration, for its blunders on the currency, on holding back the invasion army and on making Berlin an island in Soviet-controlled territory.

In money, the blunders are costing American taxpayers billions of dollars. Germany, alone, is taking more than a billion dollars a year.—(From New York Journal-American.)

Open the Files, Mr. President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. President, pursuant to leave granted heretofore, I include as part of my remarks a timely editorial from the Washington News of August 7, 1948. The editorial follows:

OPEN THE FILES, MR. PRESIDENT

When he was confronted by an issue, Al Smith used to say: "Let's look at the record."

In the same spot, President Truman is denying Congress access to official files.

During his career in Washington there has been little in Mr. Truman's conduct and attitude to suggest his one-time association with the Pendergast machine in Kansas City.

But he is handling this Communist spy case in the Pendergast way—by withholding pertinent records, by pooh-poohing sworn testimony, and by shouting, "red herring."

That is the attitude of every official unwilling to explain and defend official conduct. But it is one that ill becomes the President of the United States.

On March 13, 1948, President Truman directed the heads of the departments and agencies of the executive branch of the Government to keep confidential all reports and files relative to the loyalty of Government employees. That order is preventing congressional committees from ascertaining how Communists and alleged agents of Soviet Russia worm their way into key positions in our Government.

This order goes much too far.

We wonder how Senator Harry Truman would have reacted to such an iron curtain injunction against him when he was fearlessly investigating wartime expenditures, had a similar Executive order closed vital doors to his committee.

The Harry Truman of those days would have raised the roof, in our opinion.

We do not think that Mr. Truman, the man, has changed since becoming President.

We do think he has been getting some bum advice.

Certain steps in a loyalty investigation should not be made public, or future investigations will be hampered, if not made impossible. A great deal of the information obtained must be treated in the strictest confidence, particularly as to its sources.

But the conclusions of such agencies as the FBI, the Civil Service Commission and the reports made by these agencies and others to department heads are pertinent, in fact vital, to the present inquiry. How else can Congress judge whether these agencies are doing the job they are expected to do? If that cannot be ascertained, how can Congress make intelligent appropriations or amend inadequate legislation?

The Ferguson committee has been doing a careful objective job—in contrast with the not infrequent unsupported sensationalism of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. So we are sure that if the President will meet the Ferguson committee halfway an agreement can be reached in the interest of national security which will not result in injustices to any individuals.

A satisfactory investigation cannot be made if all records and reports on loyalty investigations are denied the committee.

The State of Washington and Its Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUSSELL V. MACK OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, the State of Washington is a great State. In area it is larger than all six New England States combined. But, in population, Washington has only one-fourth as many people as New England.

The population in our State of Washington, however, is increasing rapidly. The Federal Census Bureau estimates the population growth of Washington for the 7 years between 1940 and 1947 at 28 percent. During that period, only three States in the Union grew faster—California, Oregon, and Arizona.

This growth will continue. The State of Washington possesses the natural assets that will make it continue to grow. These natural assets include first, an abundance of cheap hydroelectrical power; second, millions of acres of land which, when irrigated, becomes the most fertile and productive in the world and water is now being placed on this land; and third, seaports that are nearest to the rapidly developing trade with the Orient.

The greatest economic fact in the life of the State of Washington is the Columbia River. Locked in the bosom of the Columbia is more cheap hydroelectricity than in any river in the world.

Every industry, big or little, must have some form of energy to turn the wheels of its machinery. The known sources of energy are coal, oil, gas, and electricity. Of these, electricity is the most efficient, the most dependable, and the least costly. No region in the world has such a potentially great supply of this cheapest and best form of energy—electricity—as the valley of the Columbia.

We have barely scratched the surface of the possibilities of electrical development that lie in the waters of the Columbia.

Plans of the United States Army engineers call for the development, ultimately, of 24 great power dams on the Columbia. To date, only one of these dams, Bonneville, has been fully completed as to electrical production.

The Bonneville Dam now produces about 500,000 kilowatts of electricity from its nine generators.

The Grand Coulee Dam, from nine generators already installed, is now producing about 1,000,000 kilowatts of electricity. Each of these generators is twice as large as those at Bonneville. But the Grand Coulee Dam power job is only half done. While nine generators are in operation, nine more are still to be installed. Of these nine, three now are being put into place, three others are in process of manufacture, and money still must be appropriated by Congress to build and install the last three. Congress should and will appropriate the money next spring for these last three generators.

On the Columbia River, a few miles below Walla Walla, Wash., a third great Columbia River power dam, the McNary, is under construction. It will carry nine generators, each as large as those at Grand Coulee. These nine McNary Dam generators will produce approximately 1,000,000 kilowatts of electricity.

The power installations at Coulee Dam will be finished and the McNary Dam completed by 1952. When these three dams are completed, we will have available in the Columbia River Valley one and one-half times as much electricity as we now have. Instead of getting about 1,500,000 kilowatts as we now do from the Columbia River, we will be developing by 1952 a total of about 3,500,000 kilowatts.

These extra and additional 2,000,000 kilowatts will mean not only that the farm and city housewives of southwestern Washington can use new electrical appliances to lighten their labors, but that also there will be enough additional electricity to supply power to many new pay-roll, job-creating industries that will locate in our midst. More power means more industries and more industries mean more jobs.

But even when the Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and McNary Dams have been completed, the job will only be partly done. Twenty-four dams are to be built on this river. When the first three are finished we must continue to work to have the remaining 21 additional dams built and put into operation.

This Congress, of which I am a Member, has appropriated more money for the development of Columbia River power than any Congress in all the history of the Nation. I am proud to have played a part in obtaining those appropriations, thereby proving by what was done and not merely by promises, that I am wholeheartedly working to the best of my ability to develop this great river for the benefits of our region and of the Nation.

But it is not enough just to develop great pools of power on the Columbia River. We must deliver that power to the consuming population centers, to the cities of southwestern Washington.

I am happy that my district, the southwestern Washington district, was granted, at my request, more than $5,000,000 for new power lines and substations to carry power to almost every city and community of the entire area. As a result of these new power lines and substations, many of which already are under construction and more of which soon will be started, nearly all of the cities of my district will have more power available to them. Several communities soon will have double the power supply they had when I came to Congress, 13 months ago.

FLOOD CONTROL

But the development of greater supplies of power for southwest Washington is not the only problem that the Congressman from southwest Washington faces.

Previous Congresses had neglected doing anything about the flood-control problems of the lower Columbia River. As a result of this neglect, hundreds of thousands of dollars of damage was done to the farms and settlements of the lower Columbia River in the disastrous Columbia River floods of May and June of this year.

But the flood-control problems of this region are no longer to be neglected. I have secured the promise of the United States Army engineers that they will make a survey this fall of the needs for bigger and stronger dikes all along the low-land regions of the Columbia River. These Army engineers will recommend to the Congress by February of next year, a whole program for building dikes of such height, width, length, and strength as are needed to safeguard Vancouver, Kalama, Woodland, Kelso, Longview, Puget Island, and the areas about those cities, from dangers of floods.

As you, the Members of this Congress know, I repeatedly have called your attention to the need for bigger and better dikes throughout the lower Columbia River Valley. I am happy to know that at long last we are going to get action and results. I am happy that I have been able to play a part in obtaining that action.

RIVERS AND HARBORS

When I first came to Congress in June 1947, I discovered, much to my amazement, that little or nothing had been done during recent years to improve any of the rivers and harbors in my southwestern Washington district.

It seemed to me that the State of Washington might be on the eve of a great development of trade with the Orient. I felt that if our ports of southwestern Washington were to get the benefits of that trade that our ports must be improved.

I surveyed the port problems of my district. I found that practically nothing had been done for several years to improve these ports or even to call the attention of Congress to the need of developing these ports.

That I might be of greater assistance in improving our southwestern Washington ports and of help in getting something done about flood control in our area, I asked that I be appointed to the Public Works Committee, which handles such problems. I was elected to that committee.

During the 13 months since I have been in Congress I have asked and you of Congress have appropriated funds for harbor improvements at Longview, Olympia, Willapa Harbor, and Bakers Bay.

In addition to this, the Congress authorized a much-needed harbor development at Westport, Wash., needed to save valuable property from being swept into the sea.

The Public Works Committee also passed a resolution, introduced by me, for the survey by the engineers of a project which will be of great value to Shelton. Shelton citizens had been seeking this survey for years, but previously had never been able to obtain any action on their request.

In addition, I worked with Congressmen ANGELL and NORBLAD, of Oregon, for a resurvey of a plan for widening and deepening the channel at the mouth of the Columbia River. The Public Works Committee has ordered that survey made this summer by the United States Army engineers. If the engineers find the widening and deepening of this channel a worthy project, and I believe they will, Bakers Bay, Longview, and Vancouver, Wash., and Portland, and Astoria, Oreg., will benefit greatly.

As a member of this powerful Public Works Committee, I am in a good position to advise the committee and Congress about an area that has more port and flood-control problems than any congressional district among the 435 into which the country is divided.

WHITE PASS HIGHWAY

Years ago, the State of Washington and the Federal Government started construction of a new mountain pass highway across the State from Yakima to Marys Corner, midway between Chehalis and Longview.

This new highway would provide the shortest all-year highway between the east side and west side of the State. Also it would be one of the most scenic. Progress on this road, which should have been completed years ago, has been slow, because of lack of adequate funds.

The recent Congress appropriated more money for such roads than any preceding Congress. As a result, work on the White Pass will go forward more rapidly. We can look forward to the completion of this highway in the not distant future.

TAXES ARE REDUCED

President Truman has consistently opposed reduction of the heavy income taxes. I disagree with him on this. I believe income taxes should be reduced. I voted to reduce them. When the President vetoed the income-tax-reduction bill, I voted to override his veto.

Under the Truman income-tax law the head of a family of four who had annual earnings of $2,500 paid an income tax of $95. Under the income-tax-reduction bill we passed over the President's veto that man's tax will be $16.60. He saves $78.40.

Under the old law the family of four with an income of $3,000 a year paid an income tax of $190. That family now pays $99.60, or saves $90.40.

The President, and those who support his income-tax theories, hold that it is inflationary for a citizen to keep his own money and spend it on himself and his own family. They hold it is not inflationary for the Government—the politicians—to take away a citizen's money in taxes and then for the Government to spend it. In my opinion, it is no more inflationary for a man to spend his own money than it is for the Government to take it away from him and for the politicians to spend it.

The new income-tax law, which we passed over the President's veto, also, helps every citizen who is over 65 years of age.

Under the Truman income-tax law the person over 65 years of age had to pay an income tax on every dollar he earned more than $500 a year.

The single man, age 65 or older, paid an income tax on all his earnings that were above $500 a year. In the bill which we passed over the President's veto the same person is allowed a $1,200 exemption. The single person, aged 65, who earns $1,200 or more a year makes a saving of more than $100 a year under the new law, which we passed over the President's veto.

Under the former Truman law, a man and wife, both of whom were 65 years of age or older, paid an income tax on all income that was above $1,000 a year. Under the law we passed over President Truman's veto this couple pays no taxes until their income exceeds $2,400.

This income-tax law which we passed over the President's veto saved American income-tax payers $4,500,000,000. Of that $4,500,000,000, 71 percent, almost three-fourths, went to those with incomes of $5,000 a year or less.

COMMITTEES VISIT WEST

Today I want to express, not only for myself but also for the citizens of my district, their thanks and mine to three committees of the House of Representatives which during the past year visited my district.

These were the Committees on Public Works, Public Lands, and Appropriations. There is nothing like seeing things for yourself. Of all the things which I have done in Congress during the past year to help my State and the Pacific Northwest, nothing has done our region more good than my success in getting these three committees to visit our region. You met our people. You saw our problems. You understand us better. I have heard many of you who visited us say that because of that visit you know the State of Washington and its problems better than you ever did before. That you should have come and seen our State and its problems for yourself is good for us, good for you, and good for the Nation. I hope you will come again and again. Our people always will be delighted to welcome you.

All my experiences and contacts with the Government during my first 13 months as a Congressman increase my conviction that there are too many people on the Federal pay rolls. This not only increases the cost of Government. It also adds to the confusion and makes it increasingly difficult for the average citizen to carry on his business with his Government.

Our Federal Government has too many agencies that duplicate the work of other agencies; and many of these, I am convinced, can be and should be eliminated in order to save money for the taxpayers, and to make our Government simpler, more efficient, and less confusing.

The extent to which our Federal Government has become involved in overlapping and duplicated agencies is revealed by a report of the Accounting Office, which says that we have 29 agencies engaged in lending Government money, 3 insuring deposits, 24 in the acquisition of land, 16 in wildlife preservation, 10 in government construction, 9 in credit and finance, 12 in home and community planning, 28 in welfare matters, 14 in forestry matters, 4 in bank examinations, and 65 in gathering statistics.

Surely no sensible man can believe that all this duplication of effort is either needed or is wise.

This overlapping of bureaus, with three, four, five, or more bureaus doing the work one bureau could do much better and with less confusion and less cost, is an inexcusable waste of taxpayers' money.

The taxpayers willingly will pay every cent of money that is needed to maintain a strong and efficient government. The money they pay in taxes, however, comes from the sweat of their labor, and they do not want to see it wasted.

The President Can Act To Help in Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the following letter was transmitted to the President by the Honorable JAMES G. FULTON, of Pennsylvania, and by me on this subject:

AUGUST 6, 1948.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

Mr. PRESIDENT: At this time when you called the Congress to meet in extraordinary session for the purpose of considering certain urgent questions falling within its jurisdiction, we have the honor to address to you this letter dealing with an urgent question exclusively within the province of the Executive—the policy of the United States toward the State of Israel.

Israel is in a critical state with immigration of the unhappy Jewish DP's of Europe hampered or prevented, its working population largely mobilized in its security forces, and its commerce and industry well nigh paralyzed by the uncertainties of the existing situation.

The Chief Executive, by his timely action, can do much to resolve these doubts. By his own order or direction, the Executive can effect the following:

1. Grant to Israel full (de jure) recognition thereby supporting its territorial integrity and providing the basis for a treaty of commerce and trade.

2. Instruct the State Department to withdraw its objections to the application of the State of Israel for a loan from the Export-Import Bank to aid in the resettlement of displaced persons and the development of its economy. Such a loan should and would meet the usual requirements of the Export-Import Bank.

3. Instruct the United States Representative to the United Nations to propose forthwith in the Security Council the admission of Israel to the United Nations, and to use the best efforts of the United States to secure Israel's admission at the next meeting of the General Assembly in September.

On the question of the future relations of the United States with the state of Israel, the Republican and Democratic Parties platforms find themselves in substantial accord. Since the means for giving effect to this policy lie in your hands as Chief Executive, we urge you to take speedy action in order to implement the above objectives. Strengthened by the certainty that these objectives enjoy bipartisan approval and secure in the knowledge that they can be accomplished forthwith by Executive action, we hope that you will see fit to put into immediate effect these pledges with all the urgency which the situation requires.

Respectfully,

JAMES G. FULTON,
Member of Congress,
Thirty-first District, Pennsylvania.
J. K. JAVITS,
Member of Congress,
Twenty-first District, New York.

Tendency of Government To Take Over Private Enterprise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, the tendency of the Government to take over private industry is still on the rampage. One of the latest methods is to try and have the Army and Navy take it over which, of course, on the surface does not bring violent protest, but it is simply a case of a wolf in sheep's clothing as it accomplishes the same net result.

I am referring to the absorption of the activities of the Western Union Telegraph Co., and I quote from a letter written by a veteran employee of many years and a prominent man in union circles. I shall not divulge his name but shall quote that portion of his letter which tells the story:

For many years past, the Federal Government, as you know, has operated and extended their Army and Navy communications systems and encouraged the use of those facilities by other Government departments for ordinary telegrams, which, of course, resulted in a considerable loss of revenues to Western Union.

We, as employees, did not object too strenuously, as the argument was to maintain an Army and Navy communications system for national defense and wartime, but we are now confronted with another source of competition by a Federally owned and operated creature known as Public Buildings Administration or PBA which is now competing with the Army and Navy as well as Western Union, thus duplicating the Government communications system, which is already quite adequate.

As you are quite familiar, I know, Western Union and its employees have been fighting for our very existence and in our opinion we should not find ourselves with another bureau to absorb additional revenues at needless expense to the taxpayers, especially at a time when Congress felt that a merger of privately owned communications systems was in order in the interests of economy and operation.

We do not like, of course, but we are not complaining too loud as to the use of the Army and Navy systems by the Government departments for ordinary telegrams but we certainly feel that somewhere along the line of the PBA system some economics could be effected by its abolishment of the communications system within that Department and transfer the teletype equipment to the Army, Navy, or Coast Guard systems as teletype equipment is indeed scarce. It could be sold to private industry if declared surplus.

For your information, the PBA folks are really trying to divert the Government telegrams from the Army signal center here in Los Angeles which would indicate considerable rivalry between the competing forces within the Federal Government much to the disgust of the Federal employees, as they are quite familiar with the present Army signal center which appeared adequate to them without another Federal creature dipping in.

I have many friends in the local Federal building and after observing our steadily reduced revenues, called upon them to see what has happened. It may be an indication of future developments or another step to absorb private industry and try to operate Western Union eventually as a Government-owned utility following the socialistic line of thought.

It must be quite expensive to the Government to operate this unnecessary system as surely their volume of handlings of the PBA system cannot justify the expense as I understand they are now arranging a messenger pick-up and delivery schedule between the local PBA address and the Federal building which is about one and one-half mile apart.

I know the present Congress is economy minded as certain departments have felt the ax but we wonder why such a sad condition should be tolerated as indicated in the PBA competing with free enterprise and the already adequately established communications systems within the Government.

I therefore appeal to you my dear sir in the interests of free enterprise and private industry to take a look into this matter or refer it to the proper department as surely it is not good business for the taxpayers to be forced to permit such a wasteful loss in competing with departments in the Government to the detriment of privately owned industry.

The Western Union is still suffering from the unfair and excessive wartime tax of 25 percent which also adds to our problems and is the source of bitter complaints from our patrons and diverts business from our lines.

Note on Cost of Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission granted for extension of remarks relative to inflation, I include as part of my remarks an editorial published in the Washington News under date of August 7, 1948, which is most pertinent at this time. The editorial follows:

COST-OF-LIVING NOTE

The Department of Agriculture reports it has bought 13,000,000 bushels of potatoes so far this year under the price-support law. It will buy another 9,000,000 bushels in the next 6 weeks.

To date the potatoes have cost the Government $2.25 to $2.72 a bushel but, in accordance with the parity formula, the price is going up to a top of $3.50. Total spent to date is $19,000,000. Before the year is out the cost will run close to $30,000,000.

This case, of course, comes out of taxes.

Once bought, these potatoes must be kept off the dinner table.

The Department says it isn't exactly throwing any of the potatoes away.

It has sold most of them for alcohol at 9 cents a bushel and for animal feed at from less than a cent to 18 cents a bushel.

The housewife, meanwhile, is paying around $3.50 a bushel for eating potatoes, this price varying somewhat according to locality.

Thus the Government uses the citizen's tax money to run up the citizen's grocery bill.

Is this a part of the Government's so-called campaign to fight inflation?

Who Is To Blame for High Prices?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN SANBORN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, a dispatch from Chicago yesterday quoted hogs at an all-time high of $31.50 per hundred pounds. The Secretary of Agriculture says meat prices will go still higher. President Truman blames the Republican Party for high prices—and he will get away with it, too, unless we Republicans tell the American people the truth and show them that the New Deal administration is entirely to blame.

During the past 15 years the administration's unsound monetary and fiscal policies has so debauched our currency that the 1948 dollar has a purchasing power equal to only 57 cents prior to 1934. On that basis, $31.50 is equal to only $13.50 before they started debauching our currency. Under their Marxist plan of managed economy and managed currency, the dollar lost 41 percent of its value in 1934 when the amount of gold constituting $1 was reduced from 23.22 grains to 13.71 grains, and another 37½ percent in 1945, when monetary reserves were reduced 37½ percent. And the end is not yet, for right now the dollar is losing more than 1 percent of its value every month. Of course, there were other contributing causes—regimentation, price controls, grain exports, and scores of other inanities, but the principal cause was a deliberate debauching of the currency.

Remedies now proposed by the President and the Congress—such as curtailment of credit and installment buying are merely temporary expedients, and will probably do more harm than good, because such acts blind us to the real causes and delays the adoption of the proper remedy.

Until money is made sound, stable, and dependable, nothing can be sound, stable, and dependable. Two identical bills—S. 2895 introduced in the Senate by Mr. ECTON, of Montana, and H. R. 7012 introduced in the House of Representatives by me provide the only real and lasting remedy, and can be put into operation in 30 days without cost to the taxpayers and without any economic disturbances.

The proposed roll-back of prices will effect only the producers of raw materials—farmers, lumberman, and miners, and since the drive is directed particularly against food prices, the farmer will be made the goat. In all seriousness, I implore my colleagues to give thoughtful consideration to a sound monetary policy. If we fail to do this the American people will not hold us blameless.

Out of Envy and Frustration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. DAVIS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Editor Ralph McGill, of the Atlanta Constitution, carried an editorial in a recent issue of that newspaper on communism. It presents certain facts regarding Communists in an interesting manner, and under leave previously granted, I insert this editorial herewith:

OUT OF ENVY AND FRUSTRATION

(By Ralph McGill)

Homer B. Chase, the local Communist Fuehrer, is due back from New York any day now, having been summoned there along with the rest of the mob to see what the orders from Moscow would be on the indictment and arrest of the Nation's leading Communists.

Any day now, as soon as the legal department gets to operating, they may be picking up Homer. This will please him in a way, because he is an adolescent, despite his years, typical of many in the movement, who find in it sublimation for their personal frustration and failures. They move in a semisecret world in which they imagine themselves great persons, arousing even greater forces which will one day bring the world to revolution. It compensates for their obvious inadequacies and their envy of more normal persons and answers the desire to be "big shots."

HORRIBLE

Rebecca West, watching these young punks shrieking over Wallace, drooling over the love song sung by the cowboy candidate for Vice President, saw them for what they were—a lot of bobby soxers mentally, but wearing long hair and a thin armor of sophistication, wishing to God they could have normal "dates," honestly admit liking movies, baseball, football, and dances, and somehow get away from all the phony intellectual clique which gets so tiresome even to them.

She said it was important to remember that youth can be horrible, too, just as there are many horrible middle-aged and old persons.

PROOF

These little Communists-Fascists prove young people can be horrible. Hitler proved it before them, as did Mussolini, and as did the Soviets, with their regimented youth movements which are taught a venomous hatred for everyone not just like them.

So you can understand Homer, when he drives his car and a truck driver pulls in front of him, referring to the truck driver as a Fascist illegitimate. To him the truck driver knew him and pulled in front of him on purpose and Homer can hardly wait for the day when all Fascist truck drivers will be put in their place.

Youth can be pretty horrible—but also pretty dangerous.

TYPICAL

This type runs the errands and does the minor chores for communism in every country. But in every country where communism has taken over the adolescent punks are shoved out of the way and the really tough guys take over. Usually, the punks turn up in their own slave-labor camps.

You get a better illustration of it from Miss Elizabeth Bentley, the former Soviet spy who recently testified in Washington.

She was one of those highly idealistic young women, graduate of Vassar, who seek love and, failing, send their frustrated energies seeking the higher service. She wound up running errands for the tough-minded Soviets who know how to take young oafs with cases of psychological maladjustments and make use of them. So do many others use those who can't come of age mentally, morally or spiritually.

IDEALISM

This streak of idealism or purity always expresses itself. Sometimes it leads to homosexual associations. Hermann Goering loved animals. Hitler was a mystic who wanted to purify the world by killing all persons he deemed unworthy of associating with the master race. Almost all of Hitler's crowd was made up of these psychological maladjusted persons.

They have got to find a way of sublimation for personal frustration and grievances. It is interesting to note, for example, that Homer Chase failed at work, couldn't stay married and now represents the Soviet Communists. He is a native of conservative New Hampshire. Don West, who was a Communist in the days when Homer was just out of his prime, and who won't say that he still isn't a Communist, is mightily admired by Homer. So Don must be in good standing. Don is a native Georgian who was a poor boy. He went Communist. We had a fellow named Burke around some months ago. He had been a poor boy in Montgomery. He was one of the organizers of the late and unlamented Columbians.

A lot of boys with no money and with poverty all around them have the courage to work out of it and not be defeated by it.

Some few, out of envy and frustration, become Communists, Columbians, Nazis, and Ku Kluxers, and spend their lives in hate and envy of others. It all depends on who gets them first. Homer Chase and Don West are the perfect Ku Klux mentality. The Commies just happened to get them first.

Republicans Twiddle Thumbs on Inflation and Housing Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party and its side-kick, the National Association of Manufacturers, have refused to face the facts of inflation. With exorbitant prices and profits, the major cause of inflation now threatening to ruin our economy, the GOPsters have done nothing to combat this dangerous trend.

Two years ago our people had war-savings bonds, bank-savings accounts, and cash in their pockets.

Since the Republicans took over the Congress, after the elections of 1946—in a brief period of 2 years—the people have had to cash in their war bonds and spend their cash and bank savings in order to live.

Exorbitant price increases and soaring profits have so reduced the actual purchasing power of the factory workers that, despite some wage increases, they cannot make ends meet.

These greedy price boosts by big business have been piled on the consumers' backs with utter disregard for the inflation disaster which can wreck the Nation.

Inflationary prices have gone so high that even if a factory worker averages $52 per week his real earnings and purchasing power is only $28 per week.

In 1939 corporate profits, after taxes, were $5,000,000,000. In 1948 the estimated corporate profits, after taxes, are $20,000,000,000, an increase of 300 percent.

In 1939 corporate dividend payments were $3,800,000,000, in 1948 they will be $7,500,000,000—just twice as much; but in 1939 undistributed profits were only $1,200,000,000. In 1948 they will be $12,-200,000,000 or more than 10 times as large.

Rental incomes in 1939 were $14,700,-000,000; in 1948 they will be $53,600,-000,000, an increase of almost 265 percent.

The headline in the Detroit Free Press Thursday, July 29, 1948, says "GM profits set another record—$110,282,260 net listed for second quarter—sales pass billion." And GM raised the price of cars 8 percent on July 25, 1948, in spite of these tremendous profits. Then later Ford announced their price boosts.

Since the Republicans killed price controls, and passed the Republican tax relief bills for the rich and greedy, the total revenue of steel firms was upped by $1,586,517,894. The recent increases effected by United States Steel and its satellites will soak the American public another $588,953,871.

The Republican elephant has learned nothing since the good old Hoover days. It is still the obedient servant of 5 percent of the people—the Wall Street bankers, the vested interests, the monopolists and cartelists, and the millionaires.

They rant about communism and close their eyes to the inflation robbery that is taking place at home.

Cannot they see that poverty, social agitation, industrial unrest feed on failure to keep our economic system in proper balance so that everybody has a chance, both economically and politically?

This Republican Congress has failed to enact adequate housing, education, and health legislation, or to expand social security, old age pensions, and civil rights.

President Truman has asked the Congress for all of these things. He is keeping his pledge and is faithful to the Democratic platform. But where are Governor Dewey and Governor Warren, the Republican nominees for President and Vice President? They are the leaders of the Republican Party. Not a peep out of them. Not a word from them to the Republican Congress which they control, instructing the Republican Congressmen to take constructive action on President Truman's recommendations.

What other conclusion can we reach except that they were faking and fooling the people when they met in convention at Philadelphia. No, there is no sincerity in the Republican Party, and Mr. Dewey is just a bulldog for big-business monopolists, the same as Hoover was. It is the same do-nothing Republican policy.

I charge that the GOP has snubbed the American people when it ignores the facts on inflation, profiteering, and housing. This wild inflation orgy is their baby. The Democrats were able to control inflation during the war when pressure was unbelievable.

The Republican Party leaders, at the direction of the National Association of Manufacturers, were responsible in June 1946 for the destruction of the original controls which had limited price rises to only 5 percent over a 3-year period of intense inflationary pressures.

The Republican leadership has made it clear that its heart still clings to Wall Street, that its overwhelming concern is not with the welfare of the working people of America but with the profits of the meat packers, the steel monopoly, and the great corporations which dominate the National Association of Manufacturers.

This Republican Congress was elected on a "beef" ticket. The Republicans decried meat controls as a menace. They led the American people to believe that there was plenty of meat to go around; that if meat controls were lifted the economic law of supply and demand would adjust prices and give the average American the opportunity to buy meat at a reasonable price.

They scrapped meat controls, but the economic law of supply and demand failed to adjust prices. While there was plenty of meat, prices skyrocketed beyond the reach of the average American family; and so, in order for the average American to get meat, he either paid through the nose to get it, at the sacrifice of other needs, or did without meat.

The Republicans worked with the meat packers in 1946, and they are still the "beef trust" Congress. They will do nothing to hurt the big meat-packers trust.

They do not want to talk about inflation. I want to tell the Republicans that the housewife need only look in her market basket to find that $15 only buys about $7 worth of food. That is why the housewives have declared war on inflation and are now organizing and telephoning to each other to bring about price reduction which the Republicans refused to do.

They all know that the Republicans refused to take action to bring adjustable controls which would keep prices, wages, and profits in balance, and which would prevent a sudden crash such as occurred during the Hoover administration.

What is true of meats is equally true of other commodities from which controls were lifted. Living costs constantly rose, which, in turn, necessitated higher wage demands, and the vicious spiral of inflation ensued. Were it not for organized labor, which is ever vigilant of rising living costs and struggling with management to adjust wages in order to try to meet the higher costs, a serious economic depression, not recession, would now be upon us.

The Eightieth Congress, dominated by the thinking of NAM, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and other vested interests, thought labor was getting too much and was becoming too powerful, and must be curbed. It passed the Taft-Hartley law that has caused considerable resentment in labor circles. This law will yet come back to plague the Republican Party in the coming elections.

Outside of promising meats to the meat-hungry American people, the Republican Party, in the last congressional elections, successfully used the communism bogey, by threatening the American people that Stalin is around the corner ready to take over America—a trick which failed them in the previous Presidential elections. They tried to smear the Democratic Party and Roosevelt with communism each time he ran for President, but the American people refused to be fooled and reelected him.

Now they are doing the same to President Truman. Instead of acting on the President's recommendations, they have brought out the red herrings.

I charge that the Republicans are responsible for this inflation and profiteering, and I respectfully refer you to the articles written by Blair Moody in the Detroit News on the fight over price controls during the time that this matter was up for debate in Congress.

The GOP had the opportunity during the past 2 years to act by passing progressive legislation in the interest of the people. The reactionary GOP did everything to thwart such legislation, instead of taking advantage to prove to the people that they had given the old guard and the vested interests the gang plank. Instead, it passed antilabor legislation such as the Taft-Hartley law.

The best guide for the American voter to go by, in order to vote intelligently in the coming election, is not only to look at the record of the Republican Congress during the past 2 years, although this would of itself be sufficient to turn them out of office. The voters should look behind the scenes and note the persons and organizations with whom Tom Dewey and the Republican Party are associated. They will find the same crowd of reactionaries, economic royalists, organizations like the NAM, men like Sewell Avery, Tom Girdler, and others like them, who are trying to entrench themselves in Government to serve the vested interests.

The people will remember that the President asked for a decent long-range low-cost housing program; for aid to education; to raise the minimum wage from 40 cents to 75 cents; to increase social-security benefits; no racial or religious discrimination on displaced persons; an expanded electrical power program to give cheap electricity; to protect and extend civil rights of citizenship and human liberty; a comprehensive health program; a stronger reciprocal-trade program; legislation to strengthen the antitrust laws; and a comprehensive program to stop inflation and profiteering.

The President reminded the Republicans that an economic collapse in America means world-wide depression.

To all of this the Republicans have said "No," and after a 13-day session they packed up and went home.

They inspired this inflation which has raised prices $26,000,000,000 in 1947, and an expected $35,000,000,000 in 1948. Since they killed controls, inflation has cost the average family $1,400, and the dollar will now purchase less than at any time in 165 years.

On housing, President Truman told Congress in his state of the Union message on January 6, 1947:

To reach our long-range goal of adequate housing for all our people, comprehensive housing legislation is urgently required * * * for rebuilding the blighted areas of our cities to * * * establish positive incentives for the investment of billions of dollars of private capital in large-scale rental housing projects * * * provide for rural areas and for the construction, over a 4-year period, of half a million units of public low-rental housing.

Again, in his state of the Union message to Congress on January 7, 1948, President Truman returned to his housing program, declaring:

Within the next decade we must see that every American family has a decent home. As an immediate step we need the long-range housing program which I have recommended on many occasions.

Again in his economic report to Congress on January 14, 1948, President Truman reiterated the imperative need for action on housing.

Again in a special message on housing sent to Congress on February 23, 1948, President Truman said:

We have learned much about the ways to meet the housing shortage. * * * We should act now * * * through farsighted legislation.

Again in an address before the Los Angeles Press Club on June 14, 1948, President Truman declared:

The Congress ought to stay in session until we get action on the housing bill. * * * It is vitally important for the welfare of the country that we have proper housing at a cost at which men and women can afford * * * at a cost which will not take everything these GI's have.

So the President called Congress into special session on July 26, 1948, to take action. The Republicans met for 13 days and did nothing.

The dangers of inflation were apparent as the Eightieth Congress began its first session January 6, 1947. In his state of the Union message then President Truman warned:

An important present source of danger to our economy is the possibility that prices might be raised to such an extent that the consuming public could not purchase the tremendous volume of goods and services.

Inflation had got out of hand by the fall of 1947. In his message to the special session of Congress November 17, President Truman outlined a 10-point program.

Again in his state of the Union message January 7, 1948, President Truman urged adoption by Congress of his 10-point defense against inflation.

Again President Truman set forth his program to combat the high cost of living in the economic report to Congress January 14, 1948.

Again, President Truman called for action against inflation in his speech to the American Society of Newspaper Editors April 17, 1948, in Washington.

So, in the special session called on July 26, 1948, the President begged and pleaded for action. The Republicans met for 13 days, and did nothing.

On taxes, President Truman, in his State of the Union message to Congress on January 7, 1948, proposed tax relief "for those who need it most" in these words:

I recommend * * * a cost-of-living tax credit be extended to our people consisting of a credit of $40 for each individual taxpayer and an additional credit of $40 for each dependent. * * * This reduction should be made up by increasing the tax on corporate profits. * * * This is the proper method of tax relief at this time. It gives relief to those who need it most without cutting the total tax revenue of the Government.

On civil rights, President Truman said in his special message February 2, 1948:

If we wish to inspire the peoples of the world whose freedom is in jeopardy, if we wish to restore hope to those who have already lost their civil liberties, if we wish to fulfill the promise that is ours, we must correct the remaining imperfections in our practice of democracy.

We know the way. We need only the will.

A 10-point civil-rights program was sent to Congress by President Truman.

So, what did the Republicans do? The Republican-controlled Congress passed—after three Presidential vetoes—a rich man's tax reduction. Under this relief measure, a family of four, with annual earnings of $2,500, got only a $78.40 tax cut, instead of the $160 proposed by President Truman.

But a family of four with an annual income of $50,000 got a $7,533.08 tax reduction from the Republicans. And on civil rights, they did nothing.

President Truman urged Congress repeatedly to increase the present minimum wage of 40 cents an hour. The President said in his state of the Union message January 6, 1947:

The solution of labor-management difficulties is to be found not only in legislation dealing directly with labor relations, but also in a program designed to remove the causes of insecurity felt by many workers in our industrial society. In this connection, the Congress should consider * * * provision for a fair minimum wage.

Again, in his economic report to Congress January 8, 1947, the President urged:

On the wage side, the Congress should extend the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to classes of workers in interstate commerce now excluded, and should raise the minimum wage in view of the substantial rise in the cost of living and in the national production since it was enacted.

Again, President Truman declared, in his State of the Union message January 7, 1948:

Another basic element of a strong economic system is the well-being of wage earners. We have learned that the well-being of workers depends on high production and consequent high employment. We have learned equally well that the welfare of industry and agriculture depends on high incomes for our workers. * * * I recommend lifting the minimum wage to 75 cents an hour.

To all of these pleadings, the Republicans turned a deaf ear.

The Republicans passed the Taft-Hartley Act, giving labor its worst setback in more than a decade. They also emasculated the Labor Department, cuttings its appropriations by more than one-half.

President Truman called for expansion of social-security laws repeatedly. He said in his Economic Report to the Congress January 8, 1947:

I recommend that the Congress * * * extend the benefits of old-age and survivors insurance to the occupational groups now excluded, and include under unemployment compensation the employees of all establishments, regardless of size, in the industries now covered by the Unemployment Compensation Tax Act. * * *

Our present social-insurance system is financed by employee and employer contributions. * * * From an economic point of view, it would be desirable to finance a part of the social-security system out of the general budget.

Again in his state of the Union message January 7, 1948, the President said:

We should now extend unemployment compensation, old-age benefits and survivors' benefits to millions who are not now protected. We should also raise the level of benefits.

President Truman, in a special message to Congress May 24, 1948, urged:

That the Congress take early action on the following recommendations: (1) More adequate benefits under old-age and survivors insurance. (2) Extended coverage for old-age and survivors insurance. (3) Extended coverage for unemployment insurance. (4) Insurance against loss of earnings due to illness or disability. (5) Improved public assistance for the needy.

And again he pleaded for action in the special session on July 26, 1948.

The Republicans did nothing. Instead, the Republicans passed legislation depriving 750,000 persons of social-security benefits.

On health, President Truman said in his state of the Union message January 6, 1947:

Of all our national resources, none is of more basic value than the health of our people. Over a year ago I presented to the Congress my views on a national program. * * * I urge this Congress * * * to enact the most important recommendation of the program—to provide adequate medical care to all who need it, not as charity, but on the basis of payments made by the beneficiaries of the program.

President Truman sent a special message on health to Congress May 19, 1947. He said:

I say again that such a health program must include: (1) Adequate public-health services, including an expanded maternal and child-health program. (2) Additional medical research and medical education. (3) More hospitals and more doctors—in all areas of the country where they are needed. (4) Insurance against the costs of medical care. (5) Protection against loss of earnings during illness.

Again President Truman said in his state of the Union message January 7, 1948:

The greatest gap in our social-security structure is the lack of adequate provisions for the Nation's health. * * * Our ultimate aim must be a comprehensive insurance system to protect all our people equally against insecurity and ill health.

Again on June 14, 1948, the President said:

I have had a health program. I sent the Congress a special message on health—on health and health insurance, and it had plenty of time to hold hearings * * * to debate it, to go into it, and they have done nothing about it. * * * The ordinary fellow who gets from $2,400 to $5,000 a year, and has to raise a family and keep up a home, can't afford to have his family get sick, because he can't afford medical care at the prices he has to be served at now. * * *

A healthy nation is a great nation, and unless we maintain the health of this Nation, we will not have a great nation.

Again he stressed the need to the special session, the Republicans did nothing.

On education, President Truman said in his budget message to Congress January 3, 1947:

I have long been on record for basic legislation under which the Federal Government will supplement the resources of the States to assist them to equalize educational opportunities and achieve satisfactory educational standards.

Again, in his state of the Union message January 7, 1948:

Our educational systems face a financial crisis. It is deplorable that in a Nation as rich as ours, there are millions of children who do not have adequate schoolhouses or enough teachers. * * * The Federal Government has a responsibility for providing financial aid to meet this crisis.

President Truman told the Greater Los Angeles Press Club June 14, 1948:

I appointed a commission to make a survey of the educational situation in this country. That commission made a formidable report, and pointed out exactly what the conditions in the schools in this country are today; and I made a recommendation to the Congress that the Federal Government make a contribution to the support of the schools of the Nation.

No action. No action. It's the most disgraceful thing in this country that the teachers * * * are not adequately paid. There are conditions in nearly all public schools in the country where the teacher has so many pupils under her care that she doesn't have time to learn all their names. Something must be done about that.

Again, the Republicans did nothing.

No true liberal should cast a vote for the Republicans until such time as the Republican Party repudiates the old guard, the Wall Street bankers, and the big business monopolists, and shows a sincere interest in the welfare of the average American citizen.

Progressive Party Platform—Keynote, Acceptance Speeches, and Address by Hon. Glen H. Taylor, of Idaho

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, several days ago acceptance speeches, platforms, keynote addresses, and other documents of the Democratic and Republican conventions were inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the platform of the Progressive Party, together with acceptance speeches by Henry Wallace and myself, the keynote speech of Charles P. Howard, and a radio address I delivered over the ABC network on July 31 in answer to the President's message.

There being no objection, the platform and speeches were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEACE, FREEDOM, AND ABUNDANCE

(The platform of the Progressive Party as adopted at the founding convention, Philadelphia, July 23–25, 1948)

PREAMBLE

Three years after the end of the Second World War, the drums are beating for a third. Civil liberties are being destroyed. Millions cry out for relief from unbearably high prices. The American way of life is in danger.

The root cause of this crisis is big-business control of our economy and Government.

With toil and enterprise the American people have created from their rich sources the world's greatest productive machine. This machine no longer belongs to the people. Its ownership is concentrated in the hands of a few and its products used for their enrichment.

Never before have so few owned so much at the expense of so many.

Ten years ago Franklin Delano Roosevelt warned: "The liberty of a democracy is not safe if the people tolerate the growth of private power to a point where it becomes stronger than their democratic state. That in its essence, is fascism."

Today that private power has constituted itself an invisible government which pulls the strings of its puppet Republican and Democratic Parties. Two sets of candidates compete for votes under the outworn emblems of the old parties. But both represent a single program—a program of monopoly, profits through war preparations, lower living standards, and suppression of dissent.

For generations the common man of America has resisted this concentration of economic and poltical power in the hands of a few. The greatest of America's poltitical leaders have led the people into battle against the money power, the railroads, the trusts, the economic royalists.

We of the Progressive Party are the present-day descendants of these people's movements and fighting leaders. We are the political heirs of Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln—of Frederick Douglass, Altgeld, and Debs—of "Fighting Bob" La Follette, George Norris, and Franklin Roosevelt.

Throughout our history new parties have arisen when the old parties have betrayed the people. As Jefferson headed a new party to defeat the reactionaries of his day, and as Lincoln led a new party to victory over the slave owners, so today the people, inspired and led by Henry Wallace, have created a new party to secure peace, freedom, and abundance.

With the firm conviction that the principles of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution of the United States set forth all fundamental freedoms for all people and secure the safety and well-being of our country, the Progressive Party pledges itself to safeguard these principles to the American people.

Betrayal by the old parties

The American people want peace. But the old parties, obedient to the dictates of monopoly and the military, prepare for war in the name of peace.

They refuse to negotiate a settlement of differences with the Soviet Union.

They rejected the United Nations as an instrument for promoting world peace and reconstruction.

They use the Marshall plan to rebuild Nazi Germany as a war base and to subjugate the economies of other European countries to American big business.

They finance and arm corrupt, Fascist governments in China, Greece, Turkey, and elsewhere, through the Truman doctrine, wasting billions in American resources and squandering America's heritage as the enemy of despotism.

They encircle the globe with military bases which other peoples cannot but view as threats to their freedom and security.

They protect the war-making industrial and financial barons of Nazi Germany and imperial Japan, and restore them to power.

They stock-pile atomic bombs.

They pass legislation to admit displaced persons, discriminating against Catholics, Jews, and other victims of Hitler.

They impose a peacetime draft and move toward universal military training.

They fill policy-making positions in Government with generals and Wall Street bankers.

Peace cannot be won—but profits can—by spending ever-increasing billions of the people's money in war preparations.

Yet these are the policies of the two old parties—policies profaning the name of peace.

The American people cherish freedom.

But the old parties, acting for the forces of special privilege, conspire to destroy traditional American freedoms.

They deny the Negro people the rights of citizenship. They impose a universal policy of Jim Crow and enforce it with every weapon of terror. They refuse to outlaw its most bestial expression—the crime of lynching.

They refuse to abolish the poll tax, and year after year they deny the right to vote to Negroes and millions of white people in the South.

They aim to reduce nationality groups to a position of social, economic, and political inferiority.

They connive to bar the Progressive Party from the ballot.

They move to outlaw the Communist Party as a decisive step in their assault on the democratic rights of labor, of national racial and political minorities, and of all those who oppose their drive to war. In this they repeat the history of Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, and Franco Spain.

They support the House Committee on Un-American Activities in its vilification and persecution of citizens in total disregard of the Bill of Rights.

They build the Federal Bureau of Investigation into a political police with secret dossiers on millions of Americans.

They seek to regiment the thinking of the American people and to suppress political dissent.

They strive to enact such measures as the Mundt-Nixon bill, which are as destructive of democracy as were the alien and sedition laws against which Jefferson fought.

They concoct a spurious loyalty program to create an atmosphere of fear and hysteria in government and industry.

They shackle American labor with the Taft-Hartley Act at the express command of big business, while encouraging exorbitant profits through uncontrolled inflation.

They restore the labor injunction as a weapon for breaking strikes and smashing unions.

This is the record of the two old parties—a record profaning the American ideal of freedom.

The American people want abundance.

But the old parties refuse to enact effective price and rent controls, making the people victims of a disastrous inflation which dissipates the savings of millions of families and depresses their living standards.

They ignore the housing problem, although more than half the Nation's families, including millions of veterans, are homeless or living in rural and urban slums.

They refuse social-security protection to millions and allow only meager benefits to the rest.

They block national health legislation, even though millions of men, women, and children are without adequate medical care.

They foster the concentration of private economic power.

They replace progressive government officials, the supporters of Franklin Roosevelt, with spokesmen of big business.

They pass tax legislation for the greedy, giving only insignificant reductions to the needy.

These are the acts of the old parties—acts profaning the American dream of abundance.

No glittering party platforms or election promises of the Democratic and Republican Parties can hide their betrayal of the needs of the American people.

Nor can they act otherwise. For both parties, as the record of the Eightieth Congress makes clear, are the champions of big business.

The Republican platform admits it.

The Democratic platform attempts to conceal it.

But the very composition of the Democratic leadership exposes the demagogy of its platform. It is a party of machine politicians and southern Bourbons who veto in Congress the liberal planks won in convention.

Such platforms, conceived in hypocrisy and lack of principle, deserve nothing but contempt.

Principles of the Progressive Party

The Progressive Party is born in the deep conviction that the national wealth and natural resources of our country belong to the people who inhabit it and must be employed in their behalf; that freedom and opportunity must be secured equally to all; that the brotherhood of man can be achieved and the scourge of war ended.

The Progressive Party holds that basic to the organization of world peace is a return to the purpose of Franklin Roosevelt to seek areas of international agreement rather than disagreement. It was his conviction that within the framework of the United Nations different social and economic systems can and must live together. If peace is to be achieved, capitalist United States and Communist Russia must establish good relations and work together.

The Progressive Party holds that it is the first duty of a just government to secure for all the people, regardless of race, creed, color, sex, national background, political belief, or station in life, the inalienable rights proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence and guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. The Government must actively protect these rights against the encroachments of public and private agencies.

The Progressive Party holds that a just government must use its powers to promote an abundant life for its people. This is the basic idea of Franklin Roosevelt's economic bill of rights. Heretofore every attempt to give effect to this principle has failed because big business dominates the key sectors of the economy. Antitrust laws and Government regulation cannot break this domination. Therefore the people, through their democratically elected representatives, must take control of the main levers of the economic system. Public ownership of these levers will enable the people to plan the use of their productive resources so as to develop the limitless potential of modern technology and to create a true American commonwealth free from poverty and insecurity.

The Progressive Party believes that only through peaceful understanding can the world make progress toward reconstruction and higher standards of living; that peace is the essential condition for safe-guarding and extending our traditional freedoms; that only by preserving liberty and by planning an abundant life for all can we eliminate the sources of world conflict. Peace, freedom, and abundance—the goals of the Progressive Party—are indivisible.

Only the Progressive Party can destroy the power of private monopoly and restore the Government to the American people. For ours is a party uncorrupted by privilege, committed to no special interests, free from machine control, and open to all Americans of all races, colors, and creeds.

The Progressive Party is a party of action. We seek through the democratic process and through day-by-day activity to lead the American people toward the fulfillment of these principles.

We ask support for the following program:

PEACE

American-Soviet agreement

Henry Wallace in his open letter suggested, and Premier Stalin in his reply accepted, a basis for sincere peace discussions. The exchange showed that specific areas of agreement can be found if the principles of noninterference in the internal affairs of other nations and acceptance of the right of peoples to choose their own form of government and economic system are mutually respected.

The Progressive Party therefore demands negotiation and discussion with the Soviet Union to find areas of agreement to win the peace.

The Progressive Party believes that enduring peace among the peoples of the world community is possible only through world law. Continued anarchy among nations in the atomic age threatens our civilization and humanity itself with annihilation. The only ultimate alternative to war is the abandonment of the principle of the coercion of sovereignties by sovereignties and the adoption of the principle of the just enforcement upon individuals of world federal law, enacted by a world federal legislature with limited but adequate powers to safeguard the common defense and the general welfare of all mankind.

Such a structure of peace through government can be evolved by making of the United Nations an effective agency of cooperation among nations. This can be done by restoring the unity of the great powers as they work together for common purposes. Since the death of Franklin Roosevelt this principle has been betrayed to a degree which not only paralyzes the United Nations but threatens the world with another war in which there can be no victors and few survivors.

Beyond an effective United Nations lies the further possibility of genuine world government. Responsibility for ending the tragic prospect of war is a joint responsibility of the Soviet Union and the United States. We hope for more political liberty and economic democracy throughout the world. We believe that war between east and west will mean fascism and death for all. We insist that peace is the prerequisite of survival.

We believe with Henry Wallace that "there is no misunderstanding or difficulty between the United States of America and U. S. S. R. which can be settled by force or fear, and there is no difference which cannot be settled by peaceful, hopeful negotiation. There is no American principle or public interest, and there is no Russian principle or public interest, which would have to be sacrificed to end the cold war and open up the century of peace which the century of the common man demands."

We denounce anti-Soviet hysteria as a mask for monopoly, militarism, and reaction. We demand that a new leadership of the peace-seeking people of our Nation—which has vastly greater responsibility for peace than Russia because it has vastly greater power for war—undertake in good faith and carry to an honorable conclusion, without appeasement or sabre-rattling on either side, a determined effort to settle current controversies and enable men and women everywhere to look forward with confidence to the common task of building a creative and lasting peace for all the world.

END THE DRIVE TO WAR

The Progressive Party calls for the repeal of the peacetime draft and the rejection of universal military training.

We call for the immediate cessation of the piling up of armament expenditures beyond reasonable peacetime requirements for national defense.

We demand the repudiation of the Truman doctrine and an end to military and economic intervention in support of reactionary and Fascist regimes in China, Greece, Turkey, the Middle East, and Latin America. We demand that the United States completely sever diplomatic and economic relations with Franco Spain.

We call for the abandonment of military bases designed to encircle and intimidate other nations.

We demand the repeal of the provisions of the National Security Act which are mobilizing the Nation for war, preparing a labor draft, and organizing a monopoly-militarist dictatorship.

These measures will express the American people's determination to avoid provocation and aggression. They will be our contribution to the reduction of mistrust and the creation of a general atmosphere in which peace can be established.

UNITED NATIONS

The Progressive Party will work to realize Franklin Roosevelt's ideal of the United Nations as a world family of nations, by defending its Charter and seeking to prevent its transformation into the diplomatic or military instrument of any one power or group of powers.

We call for the establishment of a United Nations reconstruction and development fund to promote international recovery by providing assistance to the needy nations of Europe, Africa, and Asia, without political conditions and with priorities to those peoples that suffered most from Axis aggression.

We call for the repudiation of the Marshall plan.

We urge the full use of the Economic and Social Council and other agencies of the United Nations to wipe out disease and starvation, to promote the development of culture and science, and to develop the peaceful application of atomic energy.

We demand that the United States delegation to the United Nations stop protecting Fascist Spain and press for effective economic and diplomatic sanctions against Franco's dictatorship.

Disarmament

The Progressive Party will work through the United Nations for a world disarmament agreement to outlaw the atomic bomb, bacteriological warfare, and all other instruments of mass destruction; to destroy existing stock piles of atomic bombs, and to establish United Nations controls, including inspection, over the production of atomic energy; and to reduce conventional armaments drastically, in accordance with resolutions already passed by the United Nations General Assembly.

Germany and Japan

The Progressive Party calls for cooperation with our wartime allies to conclude peace treaties promptly with a unified Germany and with Japan. The essentials for a German settlement are denazification and democratization, punishment of war criminals, land reform, decartelization, nationalization of heavy industry, Big-Four control of the Ruhr, reparations to the victims of Nazi aggression, and definitive recognition of the Oder-Neisse line as the western boundary of Poland. On this basis, we advocate the speedy conclusion of a peace treaty and a simultaneous withdrawal of all occupation troops.

Similar principles should govern a settlement with Japan.

State of Israel

The Progressive Party demands the immediate de jure recognition of the state of Israel.

We call for admission of Israel to the United Nations.

We call for a Presidential proclamation lifting the arms embargo in favor of the state of Israel.

We pledge our support for and call upon the Government of the United States to safeguard the sovereignty, autonomy, political independence, and territorial integrity of the state of Israel in accordance with the boundaries laid down by the resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations of November 29, 1947.

We support the prompt extension to Israel of generous financial assistance without political conditions.

We oppose any attempt to interfere with Israel in its sovereign right to control its own immigration policy.

We call upon the United States Government to provide immediate shipping and other facilities for the transportation of Jewish displaced persons in Europe who desire to emigrate to Israel.

We support, within the framework of the United Nations, the internationalization of Jerusalem and the protection of the holy places.

We appeal to the Arab workers, farmers, and small merchants to accept the United Nations' decision for a Jewish and Arab state as being in their best interest. We urge them not to permit themselves to be used as tools in a war against Israel on behalf of British and American monopolies, for the latter are the enemies of both Arabs and Jews.

The Far East

The Progressive Party supports the struggle of the peoples of Asia to achieve independence and to move from feudalism into the modern era. We condemn the bipartisan policy of military and economic intervention to crush these people's movements. World peace and prosperity cannot be attained unless the people of China, Indonesia, Indochina, Malaya, and other Asian lands win their struggle for independence and take their place as equals in the family of nations.

We call for the immediate withdrawal of American troops and abandonment of bases in China.

We demand cessation of financial and military aid to the Chiang Kai-shek dictatorship.

We follow the policy of Franklin Roosevelt in encouraging the creation of a democratic coalition government in China. We urge support for and the granting of large scale economic assistance to such a government.

We support the efforts of the people of Korea to establish national unity and the kind of government they desire. We demand an early joint withdrawal of occupation troops.

Colonial and dependent peoples

We believe that people everywhere in the world have the right to self-determination. The people of Puerto Rico have the right to independence. The people of the United States have an obligation toward the people of Puerto Rico to see that they are started on the road toward economic security and prosperity.

We demand the repeal of the Bell Trade Act relating to the Philippines and the abrogation of other unequal trade treaties with economically weaker peoples.

We urge action by the people of the United States and cooperation with other countries in the United Nations to abolish the colonial system in all its forms and to realize the principle of self-determination for the peoples of Africa, Asia, the West Indies, and other colonial areas.

We support the aspirations for unified homelands of traditionally oppressed and dispersed people such as the Irish and Armenians.

Latin America

The Progressive Party urges a return to, and the strengthening of, Franklin Roosevelt's good-neighbor policy in our relations with republics to the south.

We demand the abandonment of the Inter-American military program.

We call for economic assistance without political conditions to further the independent economic development of the Latin-American and Carribbean countries.

Displaced persons

The Progressive Party calls for the repeal of the anti-Catholic, anti-Semitic Displaced Persons Act of 1948 which permits the entry into the United States of Fascists and collaborators. We call for the enactment of legislation to open our doors in the true American tradition to the victims of Fascist persecution.

FREEDOM

End discrimination

The Progressive Party condemns segregation and discrimination in all its forms and in all places.

We demand full equality for the Negro people, the Jewish people, Spanish-speaking Americans, Italian Americans, Japanese Americans, and all other nationality groups.

We call for a Presidential proclamation ending segregation and all forms of discrimination in the armed services and Federal employment.

We demand Federal antilynch, antidiscrimination, and fair-employment-practices legislation, and legislation abolishing segregation in interstate travel.

We call for immediate passage of anti-poll-tax legislation, enactment of a universal suffrage law to permit all citizens to vote in Federal elections, and the full use of Federal enforcement powers to assure free exercise of the right of franchise.

We call for a civil-rights act for the District of Columbia to eliminate racial segregation and discrimination in the Nation's Capital.

We demand the ending of segregation and discrimination in the Panama Canal Zone and all Territories, possessions, and trusteeships.

We demand that Indians, the earliest Americans, be given full citizenship without loss of reservation rights and be permitted to administer their own affairs.

We will develop special programs to raise the low standards of health, housing, and educational facilities for Negroes, Indians, and nationality groups, and will deny Federal funds to any State or local authority which withholds opportunities or benefits for reasons of race, creed, color, sex, or national origin.

We will initiate a Federal program of education, in cooperation with State, local, and private agencies to combat racial and religious prejudice.

We support the enactment of legislation making it a Federal crime to disseminate anti-Semitic, anti-Negro, and all racist propaganda by mail, radio, motion picture, or other means of communication.

We call for a constitutional amendment which will effectively prohibit every form of discrimination against women—economic, educational, legal, and political.

We pledge to respect the freedom of conscience of sincere conscientious objectors to war. We demand amnesty for conscientious objectors imprisoned in World War II.

The right of political association and expression

The Progressive Party will fight for the constitutional rights of Communists and all other political groups to express their views as the first line in the defense of the liberties of a democratic people.

We oppose the use of violence or intimidation, under cover of law or otherwise, by any individual or group, including the violence and intimidation now being committed by those who are attempting to suppress political dissent.

We pledge an all-out fight against the Mundt-Nixon bill and all similar legislation designed to impose thought control, restrict freedom of opinion, and establish a police state in America.

We demand the abolition of the House Un-American Activities Committee and similar State committees, and we mean to right the wrongs which these committees have perpetrated upon thousands of loyal Americans working for the realization of democratic ideals.

We pledge to eliminate the current "loyalty" purge program and to reestablish standards for Government service that respect the rights of Federal employees to freedom of association and opinion and to engage in political activity.

We demand the full right of teachers and students to participate freely and fully in the social, civic and political life of the Nation and of the local community.

We demand that the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other Government agencies desist from investigating, or interfering with, the political beliefs and lawful activities of Americans.

We demand an end to the present practices of congressional committees—such as the House Labor Committee—in persecuting trade unionists and political leaders at the behest of big business.

We demand an end to the present campaign of deportation against foreign-born trade unionists and political leaders, and will actively protect the civil rights of naturalized citizens and the foreign born.

Nationality groups

The Progressive Party recognizes the varied contributions of all nationality groups to American cultural, economic, and social life, and considers them a source of strength for the democratic development of our country.

We advocate the right of the foreign born to obtain citizenship without discrimination.

We advocate the repeal of discriminatory immigration laws based upon race, national origin, religion, or political belief.

We recognize the just claims of the Japanese Americans for indemnity for the losses suffered during their wartime internment, which was an outrageous violation of our fundamental concepts of justice.

We support legislation facilitating naturalization of Filipinos, Koreans, Japanese, Chinese, and other national groups now discriminated against by law.

We support legislation facilitating naturalization of merchant seamen with a record of war service.

Democracy in the armed forces

The Progressive Party demands abolition of Jim Crow in the armed forces.

We demand abolition of social inequalities between officers and enlisted personnel.

We call for basic revision in the procedure of military justice, including the more adequate participation of enlisted men in courts martial.

We urge that admission to West Point and Annapolis be based on the candidates' qualifications, determined by open competitive examinations, and that an increasing percentage of young men admitted be drawn from the ranks.

Representative government

The Progressive Party proposes a constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of the President and Vice President by popular vote.

We call for home rule and the granting of full suffrage to the disfranchised citizens of the District of Columbia.

We favor the immediate admisison of Hawaii and Alaska as the forty-ninth and fiftieth States of the Union.

We urge that all general and primary election days be declared holidays to enable all citizens to vote.

Separation of church and state

The Progressive Party intends to maintain the traditional American separation of church and state and protect the freedom of secular education.

ABUNDANCE

High cost of living

The living standards of the American people are under bipartisan attack through uncontrolled inflation. The only effective method of combating inflation is to take the profits out of inflation.

The Progressive Party calls for legislation which will impose controls that will reduce and keep down the prices of food, shelter, clothing, other essentials of life, and basic materials. Such controls should squeeze out excessive profits, provide for the payment of subsidies to farmers wherever necessary to maintain fair agricultural prices, and allocate materials and goods in short supply.

We call for removal by the President of the housing expediter who is administering rent control in the interest of the real-estate lobby.

We call for strengthening rent control, providing protection against evictions, and eliminating the present "hardship" regulations which are a bonanza for the large realty interests.

Economic planning

The Progressive Party believes in the principle of democratic economic planning and rejects the boom-and-bust philosophy of the old parties.

We mean to establish a council of economic planning to develop plans for assuring high production, full employment, and a rising standard of living.

We mean to develop, on the TVA pattern, regional planning authorities in the major river valleys the country over to achieve cheap power, rural electrification, soil conservation, flood control, and reforestation, and to accelerate the growth of undeveloped areas, particularly in the South and West.

We mean to promote, through public ownership and long-range planning, the peaceful use of atomic energy to realize its great potential as a source of power and as a tool in science, medicine, and technology.

Only through the planned development of all our resources will the full benefit of the Nation's wealth and productivity be secured for the people.

Breaking the grip of monopoly

Monopoly's grip on the economy must be broken if democracy is to survive and economic planning become possible. Experience has shown that antitrust laws and Government regulation are not by themselves sufficient to halt the growth of monopoly. The only solution is public ownership of key areas of the economy.

The Progressive Party will initiate such measures of public ownership as may be necessary to put into the hands of the people's representatives the levers of control essential to the operation of an economy of abundance. As a first step, the largest banks, the railroads, the merchant marine, the electric power and gas industry, and industries primarily dependent on Government funds or Government purchases such as the aircraft, the synthetic rubber and synthetic oil industries must be placed under public ownership.

We mean to strengthen and vigorously enforce the antitrust laws to curb monopoly in the rest of the economy.

We call for the immediate abolition of discriminatory freight rates, which help to keep the South and West in bondage to Wall Street.

Tideland oil resources belong to the people, and we fight the efforts of the oil companies to steal them. We support Federal control of such resources.

We demand the repeal of the Bulwinkle law which exempts railroads from antitrust prosecution.

We call for the repeal of the Miller-Tydings legislation which eliminated retail competition in branded goods, excluding these from the coverage of the antitrust laws.

Labor

The Progressive Party recognizes that from the earliest period of its history the organized labor movement has taken leadership in the struggle for democratic and humanitarian objectives. Organized labor remains the mainspring of America's democratic striving, and the just needs of labor are of special concern to the Progressive Party.

We hold that every American who works for a living has an inalienable right to an income sufficient to provide him and his family with a high standard of living. Unless the rights of labor to organize, to bargain collectively, and to strike are secure, a rising standard of living cannot be realized.

We demand the immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reinstatement of the principles of the Wagner and Norris-LaGuardia Acts. These last measures are essential to restore labor's equality in collective bargaining and to prevent business from using government to establish a dictatorship over labor by injunction.

We will demand the right for employees in publicly owned industries to organize, to bargain collectively, and to strike.

We call for the establishment of collective bargaining machinery for Federal employees.

We support the legitimate demands of all wage and salary earners, including Federal employees, for wage and salary increases and improved working conditions. We demand the enactment of a minimum wage of $1 an hour, extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to cover all workers, enforcement of equal pay for equal work, regardless of age or sex, and the elimination of any regional wage differential.

We oppose governmental strike-breaking through seizure of struck industries under the pretext of Federal operation while profits continue to go to private employers.

We urge the enactment and stringent enforcement of Federal and State laws establishing adequate safety and health standards for miners, longshoremen, railroad workers, merchant seamen, and all other workers in hazardous industries.

We pledge drastic amendment of the Railway Labor Act to make certain that the railroad workers enjoy genuine collective bargaining and the right to strike. We call for amendment of the Railroad Retirement Act to grant railroad workers pensions of $100 minimum after 30 years service or when they become 60 years old.

We call for Federal legislation to improve railroad working conditions by establishing a 40-hour, 5-day week for nonoperating and terminal employees, a 6-hour day for roadmen, and train limit and full crew provisions.

We actively support measures to repair and improve the living standards of the 12,000,000 white collar and professional employees, who have suffered particularly under the inflation.

We call for an end to the second-class citizenship of our Nation's 2,500,000 agricultural wage worker and the thousands of food-processing workers who are excluded from the protection of social and labor legislation. We stand for legislation to protect the right of agricultural workers to bargain collectively. We call for extension of social security and fair labor standards coverage to all agricultural and food-processing workers.

We demand an immediate end to the arbitrary security orders issued by the Department of National Defense which blacklist employees in private industries under Government contracts.

Agriculture

The Progressive Party recognizes that the welfare of farmers is closely tied to the living standards of consumers. We reject the eat-less policy of the old parties, and proclaim our intention to develop, within the framework of an economy of planned abundance, a long-range program of full agricultural production, combined with necessary safeguards for the security of farmers and for the conservation of our natural resources.

We stand for the family-type farm as the basic unit of American agriculture. The Farmers Home Administration (formerly Farm Security Administration) must be expanded to provide ample low-cost credit to assist tenants, share croppers, and returned veterans to become farm owners. Marginal farmers must be assisted to become efficient producers. Where farming is incapable of yielding an adequate family income, supplementary employment on needed conservation and public-works projects must be provided.

We propose as a major goal of Federal farm programs that all farm families be enabled to earn an income of not less than $3,000 a year. We repudiate the program of big business, which would eliminate as many as two-thirds of the Nation's farmers.

We call for a 5-year program of price supports for all major crops at not less than 90 percent of parity—parity to be calculated according to an up-to-date formula. Dairy products and certain specialties should be supported at higher rates than 90 percent.

We demand that all essential crops be insured against hazards which are beyond the control of the individual farmer.

We support the principle of direct payments to farmers for soil-conservation practices, crop adjustment, and rodent control.

We favor the principle of compensating payments and production subsidies when needed to encourage a high level of consumption without jeopardizing farm income. We also call for assistance to low-income consumers through such programs as the food-stamp plan and the school-hot-lunch program.

We favor international commodity agreements and a world food board under the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization to stabilize world markets and to move farm surpluses to deficient areas.

We call for a long-range national land policy designed to discourage the growth of corporation farms and absentee ownership. This policy is especially important in the South to promote the proper development of its resources and to provide land for the landless. Priority in the purchase of land made available by river-valley projects must be given to tenants, sharecroppers, and small farmers.

We regard it as of utmost importance that programs of conservation, production, marketing, and price support be administered by democratically elected farmer committeemen, as in the triple-A program.

We stand for the principle of a graduated land tax and for the 160-acre limitation in the use of public irrigation.

We support farmer and consumer cooperatives as a highly important answer to the problem of monopoly control over markets and supplies. We oppose the tax drive being staged by big business against cooperatives.

We favor immediate flood-control projects and universal electrification of all farms. REA lines and generating facilities should be rapidly expanded, and river-valley projects for power and irrigation should be undertaken as promptly as possible.

Independent business

The Progressive Party believes that independent businessmen can survive only in an economy free from monopoly domination, where workers and farmers receive incomes sufficient to permit them to purchase the goods they need.

We propose to encourage and safeguard independent business by providing adequate working capital and development loans at low interest rates, granting tax relief, and giving independent and small business a fair share of Government contracts. We propose to make available to independent business, through an expanded Government research program, the know-how essential to efficient operation.

Housing

The new party charges that private enterprise, under monopoly control, has failed to house the American people. It is the responsibility of democratic government to guarantee the right of every family to a decent home at a price it can afford to pay.

We demand a Federal emergency housing program to build within the next 2 years 4,000,000 low-rent and low-cost dwellings for homeless and doubled-up families, with priority to veterans.

We recognize that to accomplish this objective it will be necessary to curb nonessential construction, to allocate scarce materials, and to reduce the cost of land, money, and building materials.

We pledge an attack on the chronic housing shortage and the slums through a long-range program to build 25,000,000 new homes during the next 10 years. This program will include public subsidized housing for low-income families.

We pledge that as a part of our general program of economic planning the building industry will be reorganized and rationalized, capacity to produce presently scarce materials will be expanded, and year-round employment will be guaranteed to workers in the building trades.

Government—Federal, State, and local—has the responsibility to insure that communities are well planned, with homes conveniently located near places of employment and with adequate provision for health, education, recreation, and culture.

We pledge the abolition of discrimination and segregation in housing.

Security and health

The Progressive Party demands the extension of social security protection to every man, woman, and child in the United States.

We recognize the service which the Townsend plan has performed in bringing to national attention the tragic plight of the senior citizens of America, and we condemn the bipartisan conspiracy in Congress over the past 10 years against providing adequate old-age pensions.

We pledge our active support for a national old-age pension of $100 a month to all persons at 60 years of age, based on right and not on a pauperizing need basis.

We call for a Federal program of adequate disability and sickness benefits and increased unemployment benefits, protecting all workers and their standards of living.

We call for maternity benefits for working mothers for 13 weeks, including the period before and after childbirth, and the granting of childrens' allowances to families with children under 18.

We favor adequate public assistance for all persons in need, with Federal grants-in-aid proportionate to the needs and financial ability of the States, pending the enactment of a comprehensive Federal social-security program.

We support the right of every American to good health through a national system of health insurance, giving freedom of choice to patient and practitioner, and providing adequate medical and dental care for all.

We favor the expenditure of Federal funds in support of an effective program for public health and preventive medicine and a program of dental care.

We favor the expenditure of Federal funds for the promotion of medical and dental education and research.

We look forward to the eventual transfer of the entire cost of the security and health program to the Government as an essential public service.

Women

The Progressive Party proposes to secure the rights of women and children and to guarantee the security of the American family as a happy and democratic unit and as the mainstay of our Nation.

We propose to raise women to first-class citizens by removing all restrictions—social, economic, and political—without jeopardizing the existing protective legislation vital to women as mothers or future mothers.

We propose to extend fair labor standards for women, to guarantee them healthful working conditions, equal job security with men, and their jobs back after the birth of children.

We propose to guarantee medical care for mother and child prior to, during and after birth, through a national system of health insurance.

We propose a program of Federal assistance for the establishment of day care centers for all children.

Young people

The Progressive Party believes young people are the Nation's most valuable asset; their full potentialities can be realized only by implementing our complete program for peace, freedom, and abundance. We challenge the failure of the old parties to meet the special problems of youth.

We call for the right to vote at 18.

We call for the enforcement and extension of child labor laws.

We call for Federal and State expenditures for recreational facilities, particularly in needy rural communities.

Veterans

The Progressive Party recognizes the veterans' special sacrifices and contributions in the Nation's most critical period.

We demand priority for veterans in obtaining homes.

We call for a Federal bonus to veterans based on length of service.

We demand the expansion of the Veterans' Administration program and increased GI benefits and allowances and the elimination of discrimination.

We demand that the coverage of the GI bill of rights and other servicemen's benefits be extended to war widows and to merchant seamen with war service.

We call for the prompt refund of the overcharges collected from veterans by national service life insurance.

We demand that the Government enforce the right of Negro veterans in the South to file terminal-leave applications and to collect their benefits.

We call for increased benefits for disabled veterans and a program to guarantee them jobs at decent wages.

Taxation

The Progressive Party demands the overhaul of the tax structure according to the democratic principle of ability to pay. We propose to employ taxation as a flexible instrument to promote full employment and economic stability.

We propose to exempt from personal income taxes all families and individuals whose income falls below the minimum required for a decent standard of living. We propose that income from capital gains be taxed at the same graduated rate as ordinary income.

We propose to enact effective excess profits and undistributed profits taxation.

We propose to curb tax dodging by closing existing loopholes.

We propose to work toward the progressive elimination of Federal excise taxes on the basic necessities of life.

We oppose all State and local sales taxes.

Education

The Progressive Party proposes to guarantee, free from segregation and discrimination, the inalienable right to a good education to every man, woman, and child in America. Essential to good education are the recognized principles of academic freedom—in particular, the principle of free inquiry into and discussion of controversial issues by teachers and students.

We call for the establishment of an integrated Federal grant-in-aid program to build new schools, libraries, raise teachers' and librarians' salaries, improve primary and secondary schools, and assist municipalities and States to establish free colleges.

We call for a system of Federal scholarships, fellowships, and cost-of-living grants, free from limitations or quotas based on race, creed, color, sex, or national origin, in order to enable all those with necessary qualifications, but without adequate means of support to obtain higher education in institutions of their own choice.

We call for a national program of adult education in cooperation with State and local authorities.

We oppose segregation in education and support legal action on behalf of Negro students and other minorities aimed at securing their admission to State-supported graduate and professional schools which now exclude them by law.

We call for a department of education, fine arts, and sciences, with a secretary of Cabinet rank.

Culture

The Progressive Party recognizes culture as a potentially powerful force in the moral and spiritual life of a people, and, through the people, in the growth of democracy and the preservation of peace, and realizes that the culture of a democracy must, like its government, be of, by, and for the people.

We pledge ourselves to establish a department of government that shall be known as the Department of Culture whose functions shall be the promotion of all the arts as an expression of the spirit of the American people, and toward the enrichment of the people's lives, to make the arts available to all.

Promotion of science

The Progressive Party calls for the enactment of legislation to promote science, including human and social sciences, so that scientific knowledge may be enlarged and used for the benefit of all people.

We condemn the militarization of science and the imposition of military control over scientific expression and communication.

We support measures for public control of patents and licensing provisions to insure that new inventions will be used for the benefit of the people.

A REAL CHOICE IN 1948

The Progressive Party has taken root as the party of the common man. It has arisen in response to, and draws growing strength from, the demand of millions of men and women for the simple democratic right to vote for candidates and a program which satisfies their needs. It gives voters a real choice.

Purposeful and deeply meant, the program of the Progressive Party carries forward the policies of Franklin Roosevelt and the aspirations of Wendell Willkie and holds forth the promise of a reborn democracy ready to play its part in one world. The American people want such a program. They will support it.

Under the leadership of Henry A. Wallace and Glen H. Taylor, a great new people's movement is on the march. Under the guidance of Divine Providence, the Progressive Party, with strong and active faith, moves forward to peace, freedom, and abundance.

ACCEPTANCE SPEECH BY HENRY A. WALLACE, PROGRESSIVE PARTY FOUNDING CONVENTION, SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1948, SHIBE PARK, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Four years and four days ago, as Vice President of the United States and head of the Iowa delegation to the Democratic Convention, I rose to second the nomination of Franklin Roosevelt, and said:

"The future belongs to those who go down the line unswervingly for the liberal principles of both political democracy and economic democracy, regardless of race, color, or religion. * * * Roosevelt can and will lead the United States, in cooperation with the rest of the world, toward that type of peace which will prevent world war III."

That was 4 years ago. Do you remember that summer of casualty lists and the wreckage still smoldering on the beaches of Normandy? A time of dying and destruction—and, yet, something more.

For in that time, you remember, every one of us held a dream. At the lathe, in the fields in early morning, at the kitchen window, sweating out a barrage in the line, every one of us dreamed of a time when the sound of peace would come back to the land, and there would be no more fear, and men would begin to build again.

And in that dark time, you remember, Franklin Roosevelt looked beyond the horizon and gave us a vision of peace—an economic bill of rights: The right to work for every man willing. The right of every family to a decent home. The right to protection from the fears of old age and sickness. The right to a good education. All the rights which spell security for every man, woman, and child, from the cradle to the grave.

It was the dream that all of us had, and Roosevelt put it into words, and we loved him for it.

Two years later the war was over and Franklin Roosevelt was dead.

And what followed was the great betrayal.

Instead of the dream we have inherited disillusion.

Instead of the promised years of harvest, the years of the locust are upon us.

In Hyde Park they buried our President—and in Washington they buried our dreams.

One day after Roosevelt died, Harry Truman entered the White House.

And 46 days later, Herbert Hoover was there.

It was a time of comings and goings.

Into the Government came the ghosts of the great depression—the banking-house boys and the oil-well diplomats.

In marched the generals—and out went the men who had built the TVA and the Grand Coulee, the men who had planned social security and built Federal housing, the men who had dug the farmer out of the Dust Bowl, and the workman out of the sweatshop.

A time of comings and goings, the shadows of the past coming in fast and the lights going out slowly, the exodus of the torchbearers of the New Deal.

I was still in the Cabinet—hoping that we might yet return, somehow, to the course Franklin Roosevelt had charted for the Nation in peace. And in that great hope, 2 years ago this month, I wrote to the President.

I warned him that we had fallen upon cynical counsel, that the bankers and the brokers and the big brass had launched us upon a dangerous policy—the get-tough policy.

I said then that "our postwar actions have not yet been adjusted to the lessons gained from experience of allied cooperation during the war and the facts of the atomic age."

I said that it would be fruitless to seek solutions for specific problems without establishing an atmosphere of mutual trust and confidence—and I warned that our get-tougher policy would only produce a get-tougher policy. That warning was before the crises in Greece, in Italy, in Palestine, in Czechoslovakia. That warning was 2 years ago—2 years before Berlin.

You have read your papers. In the 2 years since the people who planned for living were eased out of Washington, and the ghosts who plan for destruction were invited in—in those two short years during which the Department of State has been subtly annexed to the Pentagon, and the hand of military has come to guide the pen of the diplomat—we have ricocheted from crisis to crisis.

The get-tough policy has spawned its inevitable breed—the get-tougher policy.

And what harvest do we have of all our hoping, what fruits of the hard-won victory? Not peace—but the sword; not an economic bill of rights—but a mounting bill of wrongs.

Not life—but tens of thousands of deaths—on unnecessary battlefields in Greece, in Palestine, in China.

One world, yes—frozen in one fear.

The world's eyes today focus upon the burning spot of the cold war—Berlin.

Berlin need not have happened. Berlin did not happen. Berlin was caused.

When we were set on the road of the get-tough policy, I warned that its end was inevitable. Berlin is becoming that end.

There is no reason why the peace of a world should hang on the actions of a handful of military men stationed in Germany.

In all earnestness, I assure you that if I were President there would be no crisis in Berlin today. I assure you that without sacrificing a single American principle or public interest we would have found agreement long before now with the Soviet Government, and with our other wartime allies.

Long before now we could have embarked upon a policy for Germany upon which a sound foundation could be built for peace throughout Europe.

It is not by accident that Germany has become, once again, the heart of a crisis.

Germany will be the core of every world crisis until we have come to an agreement with the Soviet Union. We have been maneuvered into a policy whose specific purpose has been this, and only this: To revive the power of the industrialists and cartelists who heiled Hitler and financed his fascism, and who were the wellspring of his war chest.

In the western zone of Germany today, we are told, there is enjoyed peace with justice.

This so-called just peace is not just. It is a peace which rebuilds the war-making potential of German industry in the western zone.

This justice is being dispensed by local judges, of whom 70 percent are former Nazi officials. German war industry is on the rise again—and its managers are the same Krupp and I. G. Farben men who made Germany into Hitlerland.

There is no peace, no justice—for either allies or former enemies in our German policy. It is a child born of lust for power and profit.

With a Germany groomed and muscled as the easternmost outpost of another war, we cannot make a peace. Nor can the world which watches helplessly.

I repeat. If I were President there would be no crisis in Berlin. Do you remember when—only 2 months ago—our Ambassador to Moscow sent a note to the Kremlin? It was a note which seemed to be an invitation to sit around the table of reason—an invitation to talk over the problems which have created this continued state of crisis? Do you remember how the Russians responded with what seemed like real eagerness. You remember that day. It was as if somebody had suddenly declared peace. Sit down and talk it over, we said—that's the way. But what happened?

Within 24 hours our administration, having consulted its carbon-copy opposite party, slammed the door it had itself swung open.

On that day I addressed an open letter to Premier Stalin. I detailed a program which would have safeguarded the interests of both nations and preserved the peace. Ten days later, when Stalin responded to that open letter, the "get tough" boys slammed the door again. Since that time there have been no more approaches, except toward conflict. There are two sides to every curtain.

And so Germany still festers at the heart of all peacemaking—yet by closing the door to peace talks with Russian leaders nothing remains but the fruitless discussions of minor officials in Berlin.

I say the peace of the world is far too fragile to be shuttled back and forth through a narrow air corridor in freighter planes.

I say the lives of our children and our children's parents are far too precious to be left to the tempers of second lieutenants at road barriers where zone meets zone, or to the generals who are quoted calmly as favoring a "show of strength."

I say that if reasonable men, men without special interests, peace-loving men—if Franklin Roosevelt were in Washington today—there would be no crisis in Berlin. Long before this the leaders of both nations would have rooted out the causes for conflict.

We hear it said that we should have a show-down in Berlin. But what is the show-down about? What is the American public interest which will be served by a show-down? There may be some private interests, some interests of Dillon, Read and international bankers. But there is no public interest. Dillon, Read's distinguished alumni, Secretary Forrestal and General Draper and Dewey's Wall Street lawyer, John F. Dulles, are major advisers on this issue, but I have yet to meet the American in shop, or field, or college, or independent business who wants to give up his life to defend Dillon, Read.

I think we should look coldly at some of the facts which confront us if the cold war developed into a hot war:

There is not a single nation on the European continent prepared to put an Army into the field to defend Anglo-Saxon, that is, British and American policies.

We can buy generals with dollars, but we can't buy wartime armies. These generals won't die in battle. Soldiers would. We can support—and we are supporting—armies during this time of cold war, but we can't purchase suicide. We can buy governments, but we can't buy people.

It is said that we must have a show-down or lose prestige. Truman may lose prestige. Dulles may lose prestige. But the American people won't lose prestige by demanding fundamental discussions looking to peace. Our prestige in Germany went sinking when we divided Germany and established the western sector as an American and British Puerto Rico—as a colony. When we did that we gave up Berlin politically and we can't lose anything by giving it up militarily in a search for peace.

We who are met here tonight—who are met here at a time of crisis—are talking to the people of the United States and the world on behalf of the everlasting principles of the founding fathers of our country.

We who are gathered here tonight recall the crisis of 150 years ago when Thomas Jefferson was attacked here in the city of Philadelphia—attacked because he spoke courageously for the peaceful settlement of alleged differences between the United States and France.

It was a time of terror unsurpassed till now.

Thomas Jefferson was slandered as the tool of French revolutionaries bought with French gold.

One hundred and fifty years ago Thomas Jefferson took leadership in forming a new party—a successful new party which overcame the odds of a hostile press, of wealth, and vested interests arrayed against it, and of a Government which sought to undermine the new movement by jailing its leaders.

The party Jefferson founded 150 years ago was buried here in Philadelphia last week. It could not survive the Pawleys, the Hagues, the Crumps, the racists and bigots, the generals, the admirals, the Wall Street alumni. A party founded by a Jefferson died in the arms of a Truman.

But the spirit which animated that party in the days of Jefferson has been captured anew. It has been captured by those who have met here this week end with a firm resolve to keep our tradition of freedom that we may fulfill the promises of an abundant, peaceful life for all men.

Four score and seven years ago the successful candidate of another new party took office in Washington.

Lincoln, with the emancipation proclamation, fulfilled the promise of the new party which he led to victory. He headed a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. In the generations which followed his party became a party of the corporations, by the corporations, and for the corporations. The party of a Lincoln has been reduced to the party of a Dewey.

But we here tonight—we of the Progressive Party—we here dedicate ourselves to the complete fulfillment of Lincoln's promise; we consecrate ourselves to a second emancipation; an emancipation that will achieve for the Negro and all Americans of every race, creed, and national origin, a full, free, and complete citizenship everywhere in these United States.

We ally ourselves against those who turn to nightmares the people's dreams of peace and equality.

We ally ourselves to stand against the kings of privilege who own the old parties—the corrupted parties, the parties whose founders rebelled in times past, even as we do today, against those whose private greed jeopardizes the general welfare.

We stand against their cold war and their Red smear, under cover of which they steal our resources, strike terror into our hearts, and attempt to control our thoughts and dominate the life of man everywhere in the world.

We stand together to stop the disasters—economic, political, and military—which their policies must breed.

Only those who take the spirit of Jefferson and Lincoln and apply it to the present world situation can bring the peace and security which will end fear and unleash creative force beyond the power of man to imagine.

It was in the spirit of Jefferson and Lincoln that Roosevelt challenged the money changers in his first inaugural address 15 years ago. It was in the spirit of Jefferson and Lincoln that he told the Wall Street crowd in 1940 that they had met their master. In the spirt of Jefferson and Lincoln, he outlined the "four freedoms" and the economic bill of rights.

It was in the spirit of Jefferson and Lincoln that he addressed that great Senator, George Norris, and said: "I go along with you because it is my honest belief that you follow in their footsteps—radical, like Jefferson; idealist, like Lincoln; wild, like Theodore Roosevelt; theorist, like Wilson—dare to be all of these as you have in bygone years."

Franklin Roosevelt did not fear; he reveled in the names hurled by those who feared the shape of his vision. We, of the new party—Progressive Party—shall cherish the adjectives and mound of hate thrown at us. They are a measure of the fear in the temples of the money changers and the clubs of the military. The base metal of vituperation cannot withstand the attack of truth.

We of the Progressive Party must—and will—carry on where Roosevelt and Norris and LaGuardia left off. They preserved for us all that was most precious—the old-fashioned Americanism that was built for us by Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson.

There are some who say they agree with our objectives, but we are ahead of our times. But we are the land of pioneers and trail blazers. Though we have reached the end of the old trails to the West, a new wilderness rises before us. The wilderness of poverty and sickness and fear. Once again America has need of frontiersmen. A new frontier awaits us—no longer West to the Pacific—but forward across the wilderness of poverty, and sickness, and fear. We move, as the Pilgrim ships moved, as the Conestoga wagons moved, not ahead of our time, but in the very tide. And always before us, the bright star, the dream of the promised land, of what this Nation might be.

But the American dream is no utopian vision. We do not plan rocket ships for week-end trips to Mars. The dream is the hard and simple truth of what can be done. In one fleet of heavy bombers lies wealth and skill that could have saved Vanport from the floodwaters, that could have taken a million veterans out of trailer camps and chicken coops. We can build new schools to rescue our children from the firetraps where they now crowd two at a desk. We can end the murderous tyranny of sickness and disease. The dream is nothing but the facts. The facts are that we spend $20,000,000,000 a year for cold war. The facts are that world health authorities, given one-tenth of this sum, could in 1 year with $2,000,000,000—wipe from the face of the earth tuberculosis, typhoid, malaria, and cholera.

The cold war has already brought death to millions of Americans.

Look at your friends. Read the papers. Here are casualty lists. Millions—sick of cancer, tuberculosis, of pellagra, of heart disease, and polio. We can prevent and cure not only these diseases but a vast host of others by devoting our science as enthusiastically to peace as to war.

A nation that is shaped for life, not death, can save these lives—your lives, the lives of your families. Together we must rise up and write an end to the casualty lists of the cold war. This is the American way—to conquer the forces of nature—not our fellow men.

Within the past month other men, candidates of the graveyard parties, have stood in this city, have flexed their muscles, and have declared their intention to continue the cold war whose heaviest tolls have been taken here at home. Both have said that "partisan politics must stop at the water's edge." They have declared their agreement. It is an agreement which would doom the Nation and the world.

It is the policies which operate beyond the water's edge; the policies which demand heavy arms, and draft acts, and the waste of resources and skills in producing for disaster—it is those policies which determine the real wages for American workers, prices for American consumers, and the life-span of all the people of the world.

Yes, other candidates have stood before the American people to declare that they have made no commitments to obtain their nominations. But they have committed themselves; they have committed themselves to the policies of the "big brass" and "big gold"; to the policies of militarization and imperialism; to the policies which cast a shroud over the life-giving, life-saving course Franklin Roosevelt had charted for his post-war world.

I tell you frankly that in obtaining the nomination of the Progressive Party—a nomination I accept with pride—I have made commitments. I have made them in every section of this land. I have made them in great halls and sports arenas, in huge open air meetings and in small gatherings. I have made commitments in the basement of a Negro church and in union halls and on picket lines. I have made commitments. I have made them freely. I shall abide by them. I repeat them with pride:

I am committed to the policy of placing human rights above property rights.

I am committed to using the power of our democracy to control rigorously and, wherever necessary, to remove from private to public hands, the power of huge corporate monopolies and international big business.

I am committed to peaceful negotiations with the Soviet Government. I am committed to do everything I can through the new party to save the lives of those who are now to be drafted through the establishment of peace without sacrificing any American principle or public interest.

I am committed to appointing to positions in the Cabinet and Administration men whose training and private interests cannot conflict with their public responsibilities.

I am committed to building and strengthening the United Nations as an instrument which can peacefully resolve differences between nations.

I am committed to using the power and prestige of the United States to help the peoples of the world, not their exploiters and rulers; to help the suffering, frustrated people in the colonial areas of the world even as we help older civilizations which have felt the full destructive force of war.

I am committed to planning as carefully and thoroughly for production for peace as the militarists and bankers plan and plot for war. For many of today's 60,000,000 jobs are cold war jobs, unstable jobs, suicide jobs. I am committed to making 60,000,000—and more—jobs of producing for peace—house building jobs, school building jobs, the jobs of building dams and power plants and highways and clinics.

I am committed to a program of progressive capitalism—a program which will protect from the tenacles of monopolists the initiative and creative and productive powers of truly independent enterprise.

I am committed to fighting, with everything I have, the ugly practice of stifling with Taft-Hartley injunctions and the power of government the free trade union organizations of our workers. I am committed to rooting out the causes of industrial conflict and antilabor practices; to returning us to the basoic principles of the National Labor Relations Act and to strengthening the democratic organizations which give our workers safeguards against economic and political injustice.

I am pledged to fight the murderers who block, impede, and stifle legislation and appropriations which would eliminate segregation and provide health and education facilities to bridge the gap of 10 years life expectancy between a Negro child and a white child born this day.

I am pledged to licking inflation by stopping the cold war, the ruthless profiteering of monopolies, and the waste of resources which could give us an abundance of the goods of peace.

I am committed to helping lift the heavy hand of fear from our elder citizens, whose minds and bodies have served to build this America, and whose reward must be the economic security which will enable them to spend their days with the peace of mind that comes from work well done and appreciated. And I am committed to those programs—principally the program for peace, which will lift from our young people the dread of war and drafts and unemployment and which will replace these fears with hope born of security and the equal opportunity to develop fully their individual talents and careers.

I am committed—as I have been my whole life through—to advancing those programs for agriculture which will increase the productivity of our land and better the lives of our farmers and their families.

I am committed to stopping the creation of fear; to using all my powers to prevent the fear makers from clogging the minds of the people with the "red" issue. The American people want and deserve fewer "red" issues and more red meat. Millions know and millions more must see that it is not the Kremlin, not the Communists who have sent milk to 24 cents a quart and meat to $1.30 a pound; that it is the "red" issue and not the Reds who did this to us.

Yes, I am committed and I am confident the new party will commit itself to the principle of using our democratic process to the end that all men may enjoy the benefits made possible by modern science.

And I am committed to and do renounce the support of those who practice hate and preach prejudice, of those who would limit the civil rights of others, of those who would restrict the use of the ballot, of those who advocate force and violence, and I am committed to accept and do accept the support of those who favor the program for peace I have outlined here, the support of all those who truly believe in democracy.

ACCEPTANCE SPEECH BY HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR, OF IDAHO, PROGRESSIVE PARTY FOUNDING CONVENTION, SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1948, SHIBE PARK, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

I accept the nomination as Vice Presidential candidate of this new party.

I accept it as an honor, and I accept it as a challenge.

I am proud to be associated with Henry Wallace in the founding of this new party, and I am proud to be his running mate on the Progressive Party ticket.

I accept the nomination as a challenge.

A challenge not only for me but through me for the great and growing host of American people who see clearly that they must do battle with the forces that would bankrupt America by spending billions upon countless billions in a futile effort to bribe whole nations into becoming our mercenaries in a senseless struggle for world domination.

We know these forces.

We have given them many names in these two days of our meeting here in Philadelphia.

We have known them for a long time—the forces of greed that have kept back the development of my West and your South—the forces that had to wait for Roosevelt's death to take over the Democratic Party as they had long invested the inner sanctums of the Republican Party.

But monopoly, the trusts, big business, the big corporations, and the bigger bankers behind them—whatever name you give them down the years—these we have known and fought because they let the plain people of America have so little out of life.

We fought them because they kept the farmer at the brink of ruin, the laborer almost an indentured servant, the small-business man a tolerated guest.

But today the fight is not over how to live but whether to live.

The fight against these forces of greed is no longer a struggle for better existence, but a struggle for survival for all the world.

Today the forces of greed have embarked America on a policy of preparing for a war of extinction.

I say to you, my friends, that is the only issue: whether we shall live out our lives and the lives of our children in peace or whether we shall perish.

It is as simple and straightforward as that.

It is life or death.

It is peace or war.

Most of us are familiar with the name of Sumner Welles, Assistant Secretary of State under Cordell Hull in the Roosevelt Cabinet.

In his latest book entitled "We Need Not Fail," Mr. Welles makes this point-blank accusation, and I quote:

"This bankruptcy of the Security Council has been due to no Soviet veto. It has been due exclusively to the policies of selfish and short-sighted expediency pursued by Great Britain and, still more, by the United States."

Such a terrible indictment by this great statesman—mind you, he is no Red, not even pink, in fact, he is a blue-blood and rather conservative—but what he has to say should be of great concern to millions of Americans who place their hopes in the United Nations.

I am one of these.

I have fought for the United Nations since its inception.

The fact that our bipartisan get-tough Wall Street cartelist foreign policy makers would scuttle the United Nations to further their cold war makes me furious.

It increases my determination to fight all the harder in the framework of this great new party for the peace and freedom and abundance we have promised.

This great spending scheme, now known as the European Recovery Administration, is not a plan to aid friendly nations to recover economically.

It is not even a plan to feed hungry people.

It is a cynical scheme to enable our cartelists and exploiters to filch billions of dollars from the pockets of American taxpayers for a scheme to corner world markets.

The State Department sent out teams of speakers to sell you the Marshall plan.

Some of them went to church groups and women's clubs and appealed to their Christian principles and mothers' hearts.

"We must have the Marshall plan," they told these good people, "to prevent starvation in Europe—to feed hungry babies."

Other groups of speakers went to businessmen's organizations and told them, "Now don't let anybody kid you, the Marshall Plan will enable us to corner the markets of the world."

The idea is to use the taxpayers' money to send free samples all around the world.

French markets are flooded with American refrigerators while French factories that produce such items are closed or their production is curtailed and French workers are deprived of jobs.

In other words, the American taxpayer has paid for his Frigidaire but it isn't in his kitchen for his wife to use—it has been sent abroad.

Something like $300,000,000 worth of tobacco is included as part of the Marshall plan samples.

Did you ever hear of a hungry baby eating tobacco?

Of course, it is good business if the Europeans get used to our nice mild tobacco. It would be very unpleasant for them to have to go back to Turkish tobacco.

Of course, that would make it difficult for the Turks to survive but then we have them on relief so why worry about that?

We are sending them a lot of Coca-Cola under the Marshall plan.

My wife doesn't feel that Coca-Cola is the best diet for babies, but maybe she is just old-fashioned.

Here is the plain truth of the situation.

The New York Times, of May 5, carried an article with this heading "Europe feels pang of overproducing."

The article goes on to say that production is being curbed in many lines—that food is actually spoiling in Holland and Italy.

I say to you that the so-called Marshall plan is the greatest fraud, the greatest steal ever perpetrated in all history and it was put over with a program of calculated falsehood and deceit.

The Marshall plan appropriation itself carried an item of $10,000,000 to be divided among certain big newspapers and magazines for their part in selling the Marshall plan.

In other words, the taxpayers have paid $10,000,000 to help sell the Marshall plan to themselves.

We have a huge armament program fastened upon us—not because our leaders fear Russia—they hate Russia.

Yes, this multi-billion-dollar armament program is another device to promote scarcity at home, keep prices high, help our monopolists, intimidate their victims all over the world and, of course, it means fabulous profits for the armament makers—a very small and select clique.

Few businesses are prepared to turn out tanks and cannons and B-29's.

Of course, the little fellows will get some around the edges to popularize the program.

All this is justified with the warning that all Russia understands is force—must get tough.

Who tells us this?

Well, sir, there is Admiral Leahy, the President's right-hand adviser and former bosom pal of old Fascist Marshal Petain—Mr. Forrestal, Secretary of National Defense, former president of Dillon, Read.

And Dillon, Read was most active in setting up the cartel arrangements between our monopolists and the German monopolists.

Incidentally, Dillon, Read is the principal financial agent of Texaco and Standard Oil.

Texaco and Standard Oil control the Arabian-American Oil Co.

Then there is Mr. Draper, Under Secretary of the Army—former Dillon, Read vice president—the man who did most of the contact work in setting up the German-American cartels.

And then there is Mr. Dulles, who did most of the legal work of setting up those same cartels.

Mr. Dulles who will be Secretary of State should Mr. Dewey become President.

We are going to win this election.

I know we will win it because I do not believe that God in his mercy will inflict this terrible atomic ordeal on mankind.

The only possible way it can be averted is to banish the warmongers from high places and replace them with a man of good will.

The only such man available is Henry A. Wallace.

When we have won this victory we will do many things besides reaching an honorable and just understanding with Russia.

We intend to house our people, take care of our aged, educate our young, banish the darkness with great power developments, control monopolies by nationalizing the biggest ones, rigidly enforcing the antitrust laws against the others.

We intend to see that the channels of credit are reopened to small businessmen.

Repeal the Taft-Hartley law and enact a dollar-an-hour minimum wage.

We intend to make this a nation of citizens with equal opportunity, and pending the time when we come to power we shall carry on our campaign for civil rights as we have in the past, by example and not merely by words.

We shall insist upon holding nonsegregated meetings in every corner of this Nation.

As for me, I am going back to Birmingham and their Jim Crow police chief, who was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention, will have to put up or shut up.

They will either have to throw me in jail for 180 days as they threatened they would if I came back to Birmingham or they will have to eat crow—Jim Crow.

TEXT OF ADDRESS BY CHARLES P. HOWARD, KEYNOTE SPEAKER AT OPENING SESSION OF PROGRESSIVE PARTY FOUNDING CONVENTION, PHILADELPHIA, PA., JULY 23, 1948

Now, at last, the people of America come to convention.

We meet in a historic hall, still haunted by the ghosts of a Republican circus and a Democratic funeral.

Listen closely and you can still hear the echoes of the back-room deal and the machine-made sell-out.

We meet in a hall still littered with the phony promises of bargain-basement politicians and corporation counsels.

Well, the carbon-copy conventions are over. The money changers are gone from this temple. Now, at last, we have come to say what the people need, what the people demand, and what the people shall have.

I look across this hall, and I see no one here tonight to answer the roll call for Dupont or the House or Morgan. I see no delegate who will rise to speak for the Ku Klux Klan. I see no delegates from the Hague machine and the Kelly machine, the Pew machine or the Grundy machine.

We are not the party of the mechanical smile or the Missouri compromise.

We are giving away no door prizes.

Our delegates have come from the Pittsburgh foundries and the Portland shipyards. Before me are men who own small plants and small stores. Before me are housewives and typists, preachers from the cottonfield churches of Georgia, school teachers, grocers, doctors, lawyers, factory workers, and farmers. We are not a convention of ward heelers.

This is really only the second convention to meet in this election. The Republicans and the Democrats were merely two sections of the same convention.

Since the death of Franklin Delano Roosevelt we have seen our Government become a closed corporation. We have seen the big money boys move in and take over. We have seen legislation by lobby and policy by profiteers. Time and time again they have rammed through laws not for the people of Denver and Scranton, but for the profits of Dupont and Standard Oil. We have seen a year that will be written down in history as a time of flood, and fear—and the Eightieth Congress. Here is the miserable record:

They have killed the OPA. For the first time since the depression American families have come to know the full and bitter meaning of "Give us this day our daily bread."

They have passed bill after bill in the private interest. To name only one—the Bulwinkle bill. It protects the railroads from the antitrust laws, and jacks up the price of every commuter's ticket.

They have knifed our labor unions with the Taft-Hartley slave law. They have turned the clock back to the time of the open shop and the sweat shop, the court injunction, and the company thug.

They have lifted the ceilings on rents and killed the plans for low-cost housing.

Whenever a bill came up for the benefit of the people—whether it was Federal help for schools, or national health insurance, or the extension of social security—the congressional order of the day was kill, kill, kill.

They killed the antilynch bill. They killed the anti-poll-tax bill. They killed the fair-employment-practices bill. They killed every proposal to wipe out Jim Crow from the United States Army.

This killing was the joint handiwork of Republicans and Democrats, a majority of both parties, plotting together in a Congressional Murder, Inc.

And the final hypocrisy is that these very men met in this very hall and drew up civil-rights planks for their party platforms. Civil-rights planks. How many times have they both courted us with the same shabby promise, and how many times have they both betrayed us? I remember 30 years of promise and 30 years of betrayal.

Mr. Truman has called a special session of Congress to consider emergency legislation. Suddently, he can't wait. For 2 years he has been playing post office with the Eightieth Congress—and pin-the-tail-on-the-donkey with the people. He has been long on say-so and short on do-so. With one side of his mouth he vetoed the Taft-Hartley Act, with the other he called for the injunctions that broke two railroad strikes and two mine strikes—and that both parties applauded.

They have never once relinquished the idea of human slavery. Slavery has always been a profitable business. What was once the slave quarter and the auction block has become the Jim Crow coach and the starvation wage. This slavery of the Negro people is not a thing to be wiped out by campaign oratory or a passing promise. It is a sickness deep in the very bone of the country. Its fever sores are the ghettoes of Harlem and the South Side of Chicago, the thousand cities and towns across the land where a Negro cannot eat in a restaurant, sleep in a hotel, go to a movie, be treated in a hospital—where even children's games are Jim Crow.

We have heard the civil-rights promises of the old parties, but we have learned to read between the lines—and between the lines we read betrayal. What else can we expect from the men who year after year have ruled this country with a national policy of Jim Crow—backed by the nighstick and the hangman's rope?

Mr. Truman has called a special session of Congress. But it is not necessary to convene Congress to test the sincerity of the Democratic civil-rights proposals or Mr. Truman's sincerity. It is very simple—as simple as this: "Mr. Truman, I ask you, as commander in chief of the armed forces, to sit down now and pick up your pen. Pick up your pen and write. Write the Executive order which will abolish Jim Crow from the United States Army."

We have been blinded with promises for too many years. Our eyes are open now. We believe only what we see. We have seen Henry Wallace go into the South and insist on speaking—and speak—to nonsegregated audiences. We have seen GLEN TAYLOR, a United States Senator, defy Jim Crow in Alabama and go to jail—arrested by a police chief who later turned up as a delegate to the Democratic National Convention.

But most of all, we of the new party see ourselves. We see ourselves not picking up political crumbs, but helping to create political policies. The new party says to the Negro people: "Come help us make this Nation what you would have it."

The plain fact that I stand here before you tonight defines our party.

For the first time in my life, I am experiencing human dignity.

And this human dignity which I know for the first time, here and now, was not given me by the old parties—for their way is the denial of decency in the name of profit. Not only here, to me—but far beyond our borders, to millions of people—for our domestic policy is only the reflection of our foreign policy. And our foreign policy is the brain child of banking-house diplomats, and banking-house brass, of John Foster Dulles and James Forrestal, of Robert Murphy and Gen. William Draper.

These are men who were the executives of investment houses and Wall Street law firms that put up the money for Hitler's steel trusts, that represented I. G. Farben, the Nazi chemical cartel, and the German bankers. The forces that shaped these men and their advisers are no secret. These men who have lived and worked always in the thin air of the corporation board room, an atmosphere as far removed from the roots of American life as the stock ticker is from the pay envelope.

And that is why, at this moment, there are at least three places on this earth where American guns are killing innocent people. American guns are murdering the very men who fought beside us on the Burma Road and the mountains of China. The men who turned the tide against Rommel at Alamein—now they receive their reward in the form of bombs on Tel-Aviv. British bombs paid for with American money.

Because every time a bomb falls in Palestine or China, an American corporation rings up a profit on the cash register. Because our State Department's interest is not in protecting lives—but in protecting pipe lines. That is why destruction is the order of the day. The corporation men of our State Department have never found a more profitable business than destruction.

Look at any spot on the map for proof. Look at Germany. Most of all, look at Germany.

Who are the men in power there today? I will name you a few. Robert Pferdemenges. What was he? A chief Nazi industrialist. What is he now? Head of the state of Wurttemberg-Baden. And another, Reinhold Maier. What was he? Member of the German Parliament in 1933 which voted Hitler into office. Maier—the man who said, "We feel ourselves at one with the views expressed by Hitler." What is now? Government advisor in the British zone.

Who put them there? Men like Gen. William Draper. What was he? A vice president of the investment bankers, Dillon, Read & Co. What is he now? Under Secretary of the Army, boss of General Clay in Berlin.

Our denazification courts have been working overtime whitewashing the Nazi munition makers of Krupp and I. G. Farben. Most of the judges who cleared these men were appointed by former Assistant Secretary of War Patterson. And who was Patterson? A member of the law firm that represented I. G. Farben—the chemical cartel that put up most of the money to finance Hitler.

We have left almost intact the German steel industry that has twice infected the world with war. We have allocated the lion's share of the Marshall plan moneys to rebuild the Nazi industry that made war against us.

We have been repaid for our efforts in Germany by generous compliments and deep gratitude. I will quote you this, "The Marshall plan is an excellent start toward rebuilding Europe's economy. The western world is moving entirely in the right direction, and for this I give the greatest credit to American politics." That salute was paid us by Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, former Reichsbank president and Nazi finance minister, speaking from his prison cell where he escaped the Nuremburg gallows.

Our ships crossing the Atlantic carry supplies to the German industrialists—and our ships coming home carry the coffins of the GI's they killed.

At the end of the war we had a reservoir of good will all over the world. Three years of Truman and Dulles have drained it dry. In Burma and in Africa, in the hills of Greece and the streets of Jerusalem, the name of the United States is spoken now in accusation and anger.

I have had some experience with war. I was 4 years old in 1898, but I remember my mother standing at the kitchen window, waiting for news of my father who was fighting in Cuba. I remember the days in France, where I fought as an officer, in the First World War. And I remember my three sons, going down one by one to the mailbox to get their draft notices. And day after day my wife and I sat in the kitchen and ate our supper at a table with three empty chairs. I had time to think then—and I realized then that war does not begin on any hour or any day. War does not begin by congressional declaration. War begins slowly, day by day. And those draft notices which came to our mailbox in Des Moines had journeyed a far distance. They were postmarked in Madrid and registered in Munich. There were a hundred times when we could have prevented the delivery of those draft notices.

And now, once again, the President's greetings are in the mail. And they bear postmarks of corruption in China and betrayal in Israel, and murder in Greece. They bear the mark of every Nazi we have restored to power in Germany.

We are told that all of our get-tough policy is necessary. We are told that warships in the Mediterranean are necessary, that bomber bases in Africa are necessary. We are told that there is a dire threat to our security, and that we must arm to the teeth to protect ourselves from the Soviet Union. I say—we of the New Party say—that another war will mean the end of civilization. I say—that we of the New Party say—that there is no difference between the United States and the Soviet Union too big to be settled at the conference table. And we say that the last best hope of earth is the belief that human beings can join together to prevent their destruction.

We are told that the Soviet Union refuses to cooperate in planning for peace. But what are the facts? In the late spring of this year, our Ambassador to Moscow, Walter Bedell Smith, delivered a note to the Russians saying that the door was always open for discussion of differences. One morning the paper told us the news that the Russians were willing to sit down and talk peace. It was the first sunlight in months of darkness. In Moscow, crowds hoisted American correspondents to their shoulders. They brought out American flags.

On the morning busses and commuter trains we smiled and nodded and said, "That's good." Around the world, people gathered to wait for the news, and the streets were bright with hope. But by early evening, the word from Dillon, Read was, "No peace," and the obedient hand of Truman slammed the door.

And the darkness came down again.

That very night Henry Wallace wrote to Josef Stalin a letter proposing a program for peace. And once again the Russians agreed that there could be peace, and offered to talk things over. And once again the word from our State Department was "No." And now in Berlin we reap the bitter fruits of that spring planting.

I repeat, what is at stake is the very survival of civilization—is the life of our own sons. I repeat that our crisis can be solved only at the conference table, and never on the battlefield. The White House has said that it is tired of talking over differences, and I say that we are tired of dying over them. The diplomats of the carbon-copy parties have proved that they are not interested in seeking peace. And that is why we of the new party say that the choice is Wallace or war.

Two things lie at the heart of democracy—choice and change. And these are the very things upon which the new party has been founded. For we had come to the time when the merger of two old parties had made displaced citizens of those who opposed their policy.

It is not an easy thing to strike out on a new trail. How well I know. For 30 years I was a Republican. Thirty years of living on second-hand promises that never came through. I served as chairman of a division of the Iowa State Republican committee. All my ways have been the traditional ways—I am proud of my record of service in the Shriners and the Elks and the chamber of commerce. I was the first founder and commander of the Des Moines Abraham Lincoln post of the American Legion.

It was not an easy thing to break with the old party and take up with the new. How many nights I lay awake and tried to deny the simple truth—tried to find reasons for holding back from joining with the only party that held a promise for the future. I knew I could not go on with the party that is no longer Lincoln's; that has passed wholly into the control of the very corporations which deny my people jobs and advancement. I realized that it was my very love for the American tradition that should lead me into the ranks of this new party. For this new party is in the the greatest tradition. It is the tradition of Americans to leave the old paths and strike out boldly for the new. That was the spirit that led Daniel Boone across the mountains, that led Frederick Douglass into the underground railroad—the spirit that drove the immigrants along the western trails. Americans have always pushed toward a frontier. Today there is a new frontier. It is in the program of Henry Wallace and the new party.

In Henry Wallace we see once again the image of the mountain men who visioned a great nation where there was only desert and forest.

Once again we offer to Americans the precious right of choice. The old parties offer you runaway prices—we offer you restoration of price control and a roll-back from dollar butter and 25-cent milk. They offer you a Jim Crow America—we say that those who perpetuate Jim Crow are criminals and we propose to fight them with everything we have.

They offer you packing-crate houses and park benches to live in—we offer an immediate emergency housing program to build 8,000,000 homes for veterans and working people.

We offer you a national health insurance program, a $100-a-month minimum old age pension, the raising of the minimum legal wage to $1 an hour, the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, the repeal of the draft and compulsory military training.

This hall is alive with hope. The very air breathes promise. We are preparing to set out from here as earlier pioneers set out from Independence and Fort Dodge. The wagon train to Freedom is making up now. And just as these were 100 years ago, there are now those who will try to frighten you, to dissuade you from the frontier. The witch-hunt and the loyalty check are designed to keep you from the new party, and to keep you from the polls.

We are afraid. We stand with Roger Williams, who, 250 years ago, defied the un-New England activities committee, saying: "I plead the cause of innocence against the bloody tenet of persecution for cause of conscience." We stand with Thomas Jefferson, who said: "Nothing is unchanging but the inherent rights of man." We stand with Frederick Douglass, who said: "Those who profess to favor freedom and yet depreciate agitation are men who want crops without plowing up the ground, who want rain without thunder and lightning, who want the ocean without the roar of its many waters." We stand with Abraham Lincoln, who said: "This Nation, with its institutions belongs to the people who inhabit it."—and who said: "We, even we here, may nobly save or meanly lose the last best hope of earth." We say, with Franklin D. Roosevelt, "Thank God, we are young enough in spirit to dream dreams and see visions; to believe that one day a generation may possess this land blessed beyond anything we now know."

The new trails await us. The frontier awaits us. The rebirth of this Nation awaits our coming. And we are on the march.

SPEECH DELIVERED BY HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR, OF IDAHO, VICE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE ON THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY TICKET, OVER THE ABC NETWORK, ORIGINATING AT GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1948

Shortly after I took my seat in the Senate in 1945, I was interviewed by a writer preparing a magazine article. As he was going out the door, at the conclusion of the interview, he turned back to ask one final question. He said, "Senator TAYLOR, what is your basic faith?" Now, I had never been asked that question before, and I had to think a moment. Then I answered, "Well, sir, my basic faith is in the ultimate good judgment of the American people."

I deliberately put in that word, "ultimate," because of my deep conviction that it is very, very difficult for the average American citizen to get the truth, and, of course, anyone must first know the truth in order to be able to render an intelligent decision.

I think it is a monument to the intelligence and common sense of the American people that they do so often come up with the right decision despite the way the press distorts the news with misleading headlines, omission of news contrary to the big business point of view, and deliberate falsehoods which are fed to the people by syndicated writers and the editorial columns. While some of the news stories concerning our Progressive Party Convention at Philadelphia were objective and honest and fair, I am forced to state that some of the syndicated columnists have reached an all-time low in the way they have deliberately misrepresented the events which transpired at that convention.

Their flat statements that Communists were in control, for example, had no foundation in fact. They write such things because they know that is what their bosses want them to write. In view of the degeneration of the press into a tool of special interests, we can be thankful for the development of radio. It has been a great instrument in helping bring truth to the American people, and, although many liberal commentators have been forced off the air in the last few years, it is still possible for dissenters to make their voice heard—witness my speaking to you at this moment through the courtesy of the American Broadcasting Co.

I believe that television will be an even greater instrument for the enlightenment of the American people. Neither an editorializing columnist or a radio commentator can distort the facts when the people can both see and hear what is transpiring. I have talked to a considerable number of people who saw the new party convention by way of television, and after having actually seen and heard what transpired there, they have invariably been furious at what they have read in the newspapers and some of the biased misleading statements of certain radio commentators. The American press generally has played up, sensationalized, and distorted every disagreement with Russia, which is equally true of certain radio commentators.

No opportunity is being overlooked to belittle, misrepresent, and vilify the aims, objectives, and leadership of the newly formed Progressive Party. For these reasons, I am especially grateful for this opportunity to speak directly to the American people.

Well, the special session of Congress—the so-called turnip session—has finished its first week. On Monday the Senate met and passed a resolution informing the President that we were in session and awaiting his pleasure. This momentous announcement took about 10 minutes, then the Senate adjourned until Tuesday.

On Tuesday the Senate met and listened to the President's special message, and then the Senate adjourned until Wednesday. On Wednesday the Senate met and listened to a number of speeches about everything in general and nothing in particular, and adjourned until Thursday. On Thursday the Senate met, and Senator WHERRY, the acting majority leader, announced we would take up consideration of the anti-poll-tax bill, whereupon the southerners started a filibuster. Also, on Thursday, the Banking and Currency Committee, of which I am a member, met to consider anti-inflation legislation.

Chairman TOBEY had considerable difficulty getting high Government officials to appear to testify because the Democratic administration was not prepared, in spite of the fact that we had been called back primarily to consider anti-inflation legislation.

The morning session of the committee was fairly well attended by Republicans and Democrats but when the afternoon session of the committee convened, not one Democratic Senator put in his appearance. The reason was simple. Every Democratic Senator on the Banking and Currency Committee is a southerner and they were more interested in their filibuster to keep Americans from voting than they were in anti-inflation legislation to keep prices down so Americans can continue to eat.

At the end of Thursday's session of the Senate, a very amicable unanimous-consent agreement was arranged whereby the southern filibusterer who had the floor was granted the privilege of retaining the floor on Friday. If I had been on the floor of the Senate instead of tied up in the Banking and Currency Committee, I would have objected to such an agreement. Recently, when I talked at length against the militarization of America and drafting of American boys in peacetime, there were no sociable unanimous consents and no adjournment.

The Senate stayed in continuous session and at the first opportunity and by indulging in shady parliamentary tactics, my efforts to stand up against the Wall Street monopolists and the generals who are running our country, was brought to an end.

On Friday of this week, the filibuster against civil rights continued unabated. Friday morning's Washington Post carried this heading: "Poll-tax bill starts polite filibuster. Southerners lacking in old fiery attack. Republicans go along." That is what it says. That is the truth. This is a bipartisan filibuster.

Neither the Democrats nor the Republicans dare enact the legislation to carry out their campaign promises contained in their new platform so recently adopted at Philadelphia. Their bosses won't permit it and they have the same bosses—big business monopolists, cartelists, armament manufacturers getting rich off the cold war. These behind-the-scenes manipulators are reasonable people.

They realize that promises must be made in platforms, but they will not permit those promises to be carried out. So the plan is to let the southerners filibuster a few days or a week or two and then adjourn Congress. Senator ROBERTSON of Wyoming is quoted as saying that Mr. Dewey passed the word along that we should stick around a few days and then go home. Yes; that is the sorry picture. Both Democrats and Republicans made it perfectly clear that they intend to bury every important issue with talk.

They have begun to lay down a barrage of talk to cover their failures—a flood of words to prevent one constructive deed and to obscure issues. The trade-mark of the special session is not politics but words—words that won't even grow turnips, let alone produce houses, lower prices, or abolish the poll tax.

It has been said that another great crash and depression is just what Mr. Stalin is waiting for—just what he wants. That may be true. I don't know. But I do know that we of the Progressive Party do not want that to happen. We want to preserve our American way of life. We want to preserve our institutions in order that American citizens with initiative may enjoy the privilege of going in business for themselves.

We want to preserve our democratic form of government. We are not at all certain that our economy or even our democracy can withstand the great economic upheaval toward which we are rushing because of the monopolistic and militaristic policies of the bipartisan coalition.

The wreckers of Hoover's time flung the Communist epithet at Roosevelt in a frantic effort to stem the tide of popular resentment that engulfed them. The bipartisan wreckers of today are the very people whose greedy grab for profits is threatening to end our American dream in the greatest catastrophe of all times.

These same exploiters now try to brand as Communist-inspired and Communist-controlled this great people's movement which has come to life in a spontaneous meeting of average citizens, common people, working men and women, farmers, teachers, doctors, lawyers, small-business men, representing all that is good and fine in this great and good country of ours.

Side by side with inflation is the menace to our democracy that has certainly grown from the continued denial to millions of our citizens of their basic civil rights. Just as the fruits of our top-heavy prosperity are today unevenly divided, so are the fruits of our democracy and our lopsided economy cannot continue to bear the strain of an even more lopsided democracy that denies to so many people basic rights enjoyed by others.

But the bipartisan coalition refuses to recognize the dangers and refuses to take action. Just as the reactionary Congress under Hoover failed to take action. People demanded action then and got it. The people demand action now but they won't get it from this Congress and they won't get action from either of the old parties because they cannot act. He who pays the fiddler calls the tune.

The subservience of the Republican Party to the monopolists and special-interest groups of this country is well known to the people. Even the recent Gallup poll bears out that fact. The statement is made and not denied that the Democrats are expecting both Mr. Forrestal, our Wall Street Secretary of National Defense, and Mr. Harriman, our big-business Secretary of Commerce, to contribute half a million dollars each.

I am determined to be faithful to the trust placed in me by the people. That is why I was forced to join with Henry Wallace. How can you possibly serve the people in a party owned lock, stock, and barrel by Forrestal and Harriman and their warmongering profit-greedy crowd.

But let's get back to the special session. There is method and deliberation in the flood of words going on there. It could not continue without the gentleman's agreement of the Republican Party and the President's Democratic Party. Make no mistake about it.

The filibuster over the poll tax is a filibuster of both old parties. It is not a filibuster on the poll tax alone. It is a filibuster against price control and housing and security as well. And it is a filibuster which exists only because both parties want it to exist. It is the guaranty that the Democrats can preserve State rights over human rights, and the Republicans profits over prosperity.

For behind the polite filibuster now taking place on the floor of the Senate is the compact of both Democrats and Republicans to saddle America with the costs of a cold war with heavy arms expenditures with a peacetime draft. They have voted for guns, not butter. And the men who now control both old parties will not introduce equality into the caste-ridden Army, nor will they surrender any part of their power to control prices and reap the greatest profits in their history. They recognize the need to make concessions only in words and platforms, but not in fact.

The real filibuster started on Monday with the President's Executive orders on civil rights in the armed forces and Federal employment. Those Executive orders hit the headlines but if we read more than the headlines we wonder why he had not issued such orders at any time in the last 3 years as we in the Progressive Party insistently pointed out in our first founding convention last week.

When you read the Executive orders you find a promise and not a fulfillment. Here is no end to discrimination and segregation in the armed forces. Here is only talk about the end of discrimination. Instead of action you have the appointment of a committee to investigate. How many committees of investigation does it take before we shall have an end to discrimination? How many investigations do we need to tell us what is already so plain?

The President's committee to investigate the need of a draft and universal military training urged the necessity of making our Army democratic by bringing an end to segregation and discrimination but not one of its recommendations was included in the draft bill.

What is the purpose of another committee of investigation if not to postpone and delay the end of discrimination for our Negro citizens who are also called upon to die in the names of freedom and equality and democracy? The Executive order does not eliminate segregation and places no deadline for action to stop discrimination. It is small wonder that the New York Times reported an official as saying that the President's order was a pretty good political approach which should not too greatly affront the Southern Democrats.

No real action can be expected from this Executive order. It was not meant to produce action, as Gen. Omar Bradley, the President's Chief of Staff, made clear the next day. General Bradley announced categorically that segregation would not be abolished in the Army until it was abolished in the Nation as a whole. He added that people needed to be told that the Army was not interested in reforms. The Chief of Staff told us once again that the Commander in Chief did not mean what he said. He has also told the American people exactly who is boss when it comes to putting such an order into effect.

He has emphatically told the country and the President that the brass hats will run the Army in the same old way. But this is not the first time that we have seen the President's orders spelled out to mean the opposite by his supposed subordinates. Early this year, when the President sent his civil-rights message to Congress, he said that he had instructed the Secretary of the Armed Forces to do away with discrimination and segregation as soon as possible, but when Mr. Royall, Secretary of the Army, testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee later, he said the President didn't mean what he said.

He went further. He threatened the President. He said that if he received any such orders he would resign before he would carry them out. Whom shall we believe? The President and his words or Secretary Royall and General Bradley's lack of action? If the President really means to end discrimination and segregation why has he failed to discipline Secretary Royall and General Bradley for openly disregarding and flouting his orders? Certainly he has not hesitated to discipline others in the administration who went counter to his beliefs.

Indeed, he has not hesitated to fire faithful servants for no reason at all. Witness Marriner Eccles, Wilson Wyatt, and James Landis. Their only sin was that they tried to do a good job. The plain fact of the matter is that Mr. Truman does not control his administration but his administration is controlled by the military men and Wall Streeters. From the evidence to date it is becoming clear that neither party intends to stop the poll-tax filibuster. It is a polite filibuster by agreement of both old parties.

It is a convenient device. It hides the real intentions of the Republicans and conceals the evasions of the Democrats. By permitting the filibuster to continue the Republicans can shift the blame for inaction on prices, housing, and other issues to the Democrats. By failing to press for breaking of the filibuster, the Democrats are relieved of their responsibilities for having called the turnip session of the Congress.

Strategists of both old parties can sit back and relax while the taxpayers have the cost of the special session heaped on top of the costs of the Marshall plan and the big armaments program. That is exactly what they are doing. That is exactly what was predicted and that is why when the first Southern Democrat arose on the floor of the Senate on Thursday afternoon; he rose with a smile and was greeted with smiles by all his colleagues. It's in the bag.

May I quote from an AP dispatch describing the opening session. It says: "No word was edged with roughness, no political differences entered on the pleasant scene of cheer and good will. Gallery fans who came to witness a political roaring and gnashing of teeth went away disappointed. Smiles wreathed the Senators' faces except for Senator TAYLOR, who is Henry Wallace's running mate. The countenance of the Progressive Party's Vice Presidential candidate was serious and bordered on the glum. He did not join in the backslapping and general carefree spirit which seemed to prevail."

That is a pretty fair description. I am not in the club any more. It is all right to talk about democracy, freedom, competition, private enterprise, and civil rights; but when it becomes apparent that a Senator takes his obligations seriously and really means to do something about it, that's a horse of another color.

The polite filibuster makes it obvious that neither old party wants seriously to do anything to stop inflation. We in the Progressive Party have forced both old parties to adopt liberal-sounding platforms. Now it is up to the people to make them both perform. The Republicans have announced they will do nothing in this session. Mr. Dewey, their contender, sits in Albany, afraid to breath a word. Their leaders in both Houses have flatly stated they will do nothing.

At least they are more frank than the President and his party, for the Democrats, despite their talk, will also do nothing unless they are forced to by an aroused people. The simple fact is that there can be no end to inflation, there can be no abundance of good things at reasonable prices here at home until we bring an end to the fabulous spending for foreign-aid programs and useless armaments.

The plain fact of the matter is that the sinister forces which control both the old parties don't want an end to inflation. They are enjoying the most fantastic profits ever known in the history of the world. They mean to continue enjoying those profits even if it means taking it out of the hide of the taxpayers.

That is the real reason for the so-called Marshall plan and this huge armament program. At the beginning of the year we were faced with a terrible crisis, terrible, that is, for the monopolists. We had reached the point where you would have been able to buy a $1,500 automobile for $1,500. Supply was catching up with demand.

You would have been able to get a $125 ice box for $125 instead of $325. That was unthinkable to the monopolists. So with the aid of the press, which they own or control, the bipartisan coalition really got down to brass tacks and did some hard work for their monopoly bosses. They put over the Marshall plan by telling the average good American that it was designed to feed hungry people and at the same time telling businessmen that its real purpose was to help get markets for American industry, which, of course, was the truth. All of the special-interest groups got their hands in this great grab bag up to the arm pit. Instead of sending grain exclusively, which could have been milled in Europe, thereby giving employment to unemployed Europeans and aiding European recovery, great quantities of flour were sent in order that the Milling Trust could get its cut out of these endless billions of taxpayers' money.

Nearly $300,000,000 worth of tobacco was included to insure southern votes for this great robbery of the American people, and a nice big consignment of Coca-Cola. Using the Marshall plan as a lever, we forced the French to lower their tariff on ice boxes. Now we are flooding the French market and their factories producing such items are going out of business or curtailing production. This, of course, in the name of aiding European recovery. Simple arithmetic showed the boys that even the billions to be spent for the Marshall plan didn't take up all the slack.

There would still be enough for home consumption and prices would have to come down. The big armament program was the final answer. Admiral Zacharias, one of our foremost authorities on such matters, recently said that we now had enough atomic bombs to destroy the whole world. We didn't have to take them any place—just explode them and the resulting radioactivity would be so great that there would be no place on earth habitable.

Now if we have enough atomic bombs to kill everyone on earth including ourselves, then why produce airplanes and tanks and guns if not to insure profits for the armament manufacturers, channel scarce materials into useless war production and keep prices up for all the monopolists. If we can kill everybody on earth with one big explosion, why draft our boys? They had to do that to keep their armament program from being utterly ridiculous.

The people would question the sanity of building planes and tanks and guns if you didn't have anybody to fly the planes, man the tanks and carry the guns. So we have departed from our long traditions of being a non-militaristic Nation. We are drafting our boys and using the Hitler method of maintaining prosperity and armament economy.

It is not enough to produce guns when people are crying out for the good things of life but the great danger is that once we start down this road, there is no turning back. Profits and jobs depend on making guns. Unless we can stop this ghastly performance by electing a man of peace in 1948, I am afraid our way of life is gone for good. The Germans had no great leader to step forward and protest militarization of their country.

Americans are more fortunate. They have a man willing to face the abuse, the red-baiting, the vilification and ridicule and speak out against this madness. We are fortunate indeed to have Henry Wallace to lead us at the most dangerous moment in all our history.

Hitler and Goebbels used Russia as a bogeyman to scare the people into sacrificing their liberties. Our exploiters and would-be Fascists are using the same technique. They tell us that Russia is all to blame for the tension in the world, and yet in his latest book, entitled "We Need Not Fail," a great American statesman and one of Roosevelt's trusted lieutenants, has this to say, and I quote:

"This bankruptcy of the Security Council has been due to no Soviet veto. It has been due exclusively to the policies of selfish and short-sighted expedience pursued by Great Britain and still more by the United States."

I wish that I didn't have to subject myself to the Red-baiting and vilification of our kept press that I am forced to endure, but I can see no other way if I am to be true to the trust the people have reposed in me. The plain fact of the matter is that the same people control America today that were most instrumental in putting Hitler into power—Secretary of National Defense James Forrestal, who was formerly president of Dillon, Read, the Wall Street banking house most active in financing Hitler to power. Draper, Under Secretary of the Army, vice president of Dillon, Read, did the actual contact work in setting up the cartel areas between our monopolists and Hitler's monopolists.

Dulles, the architect of our foreign policy, did most of the legal master minding. Admiral Leahy, the President's most intimate adviser, a Fascist sympathizer and friend of old Quisling, Marshall Petain.

It is not my object to glorify Russia, but I must ask in all earnestness, "Can we expect the Russians to have confidence in a government headed by such people, and it will still be headed by the same kind of people if Mr. Dewey is elected?"

We are supporting Fascists and reactionaries all over the world. The amount of our aid to Holland and France, for example, just about equals the cost of their imperialistic adventures in reconquering Indonesians and Indo-Chinese.

In Greece there were 13,000 guerrillas when we first started interfering. We spent $300,000,000 in a year and at the end of that time there were 26,000 guerrillas. I say to you people that never in history was such a great fraud perpetrated as that which is being imposed upon the American people today and you are paying for being deceived. The Marshall plan appropriation carried an item of $10,000,000 to be divided between two great newspapers and four magazines for their part in helping sell the Marshall plan, and yet in one of those two newspapers some truth appeared, accidently I presume, because the item I refer to was only in one early edition.

In later editions this article was deleted, but the rest of the page was the same. On May 5 the following heading appeared over an article in a great New York newspaper: "Europe feels pang of overproducing."

Then it goes on to say that food is spoiling in Holland; that Belgium and Luxemburg are curtailing production in steel, fertilizer, cement, window glass, textiles, and machine tools. In the magazine, United States News and World Report, of May 14, in discussing the Marshall plan there appears this statement:

"Surpluses are beginning to show here and there—Italian fruit and German textiles are examples. These things are spoiling and are setting in warehouses."

In that same issue is this very enlightening statement. It says armament in any case is to be revised as a major industry sustaining the boom that had begun to sag.

Armaments, if carried forward on the basis of plans being approved by Congress, will continue for at least 5 years to be a major United States industry.

Do you people think for one moment that, if armament manufacture is a major United States industry for 5 years, you will ever be able to get rid of it? You might just as well talk about abolishing agriculture.

This article in the United States News and World Report also has this to say: "Living standards of the public will be influenced, too. Just as civilian supply was about to catch up with demand the military steps in to take a larger share of goods and manpower.

"Armament spending will take steel, aluminum, copper, and other materials that otherwise could go to civilian industry to be used to produce goods for civilian industry. Armament, too, will draw on manpower that otherwise could be employed in civilian industry.

"As a result, people in general will enjoy fewer goods than they might otherwise have enjoyed. They will be expected to gain in satisfaction, however, from the feeling of security that money spent on armaments can give."

Does it make you people feel secure?

To know that we are spending fabulous amounts on airplanes, tanks, and guns and that your sons are being drafted and we are continuing to make atomic bombs—doesn't all this make you feel secure in spite of the fact that Admiral Zacharias tells us that by exploding the atomic bombs we now have we can render the whole earth uninhabitable.

I don't know what the outcome of this political campaign is going to be.

I know that I will be fortunate if I retain my liberty and freedom of action because we have gone a long way down the road toward fascism and the one-party state with our bipartisan coalition controlled by the same people or their American counterparts which ended freedom and brought destruction to Germany.

At any rate you are being warned before it is too late. You will have an opportunity I hope to vote against these people and policies that threaten ruin to our great Nation.

I know that you are almost hopelessly snowed under with a flood of propaganda, much of which is paid for with your own money as I have pointed out. But I still have confidence, as I said at the beginning of this broadcast, confidence in the ultimate good judgment of the American people.

Whether this fantastic scheme to enrich a few at the risk of world war and very likely the extinction of mankind, whether the enormity of this scheme can be grasped by the American people before it is too late, I don't know.

All I know is that when I am convinced that something should be done, I start doing it to the best of my ability.

I don't stop to consider whether I will be successful or what the consequences may be to me politically or personally.

My philosophy of believing in the ultimate good judgment of the American people and in taking action to further my beliefs regardless of political consequences led me to join in founding this new peoples' party.

I knew that a merciless Red-baiting campaign would be waged against us, but I am accustomed to the Red smear.

In 1938 I ran for Congress. Because I spoke out in favor of a Columbia Valley Authority to develop our great Northwest, the power companies and other vested interests smeared me Red through the columns of their subservient press. I indignantly and righteously denied the charge. I was defeated in the primary.

In 1940 I was nominated to the Senate. Again I was assailed as being communistic. I denied it but I was defeated in the general election by 14,000 votes. Again in 1942 I won the nomination and again the Red smear. I denied it but lost by 4,000 votes. In 1944 I again won the senatorial nomination—for the third time.

Again the monopoly crowd howled Communist. Our Democratic Party leaders said, "Jump on that. Don't let them get away with that. It's murder." But I was fed up. I said, "Oh, to thunder with them." I never once mentioned the charge of communism. I just went to the people and told them what I stood for and I was elected.

Perhaps with that lesson in mind I should ignore the Red baiting being directed against me today. However, circumstances are different. The Red hysteria is unfortunately greater now than it was then. So, I feel that perhaps I am justified in making a statement.

I am no Communist. Most of my adult life has been spent managing my own business. It was a modest enterprise, to be sure, and I was long convinced that I could have fared much better financially if I had been willing to sacrifice my independence and work for a wage.

I preferred to manage my own affairs and exercise my own initiative. I have a wonderful family—a lovely wife and three fine sons. I want these boys of mine to have the same opportunity that I enjoyed to have a business of their own if they have the desire and the capacity. I am a firm believer in genuine free enterprise.

By that I do not mean that I believe monopolies can rightfully be called free enterprise and that they must be brought under control if genuine free enterprise with competition as the life of trade is to be preserved in this great country.

It is significant to note in this connection that on the same day the Progressive Party platform was adopted with a strong plank on monopoly control, the Federal Trade Commission came out with a warning that private enterprise was in grave danger of joining the dodo because of monopoly control in this country.

I also believe passionately in democracy and the right of men to rule themselves through their elected representatives. If I didn't have such strong convictions about these matters I certainly would not risk my personal safety by invading the strongholds of segregation and discrimination. I know that this new Progressive Party is not dominated by Communists.

I am convinced that there is no danger of it being dominated by Communists. Any possible danger of such an eventuality would of course be further minimized if the so-called liberals still outside our party would overcome their fear of being Red-baited and join with us this great people's movement.

I also say to you people that if at any time I should become convinced that this new party or any party with which I might be associated was Communist-dominated and its policies were inimical to the best interests of America and our way of life, I would withdraw and give my reasons for so doing. The truth is, of course, that this whole Red smear is a device to avoid discussing issues.

Personally, I shall continue to fight for a better America free from monopoly control, free from corrupt politicians, free from the un-Christian curse of discrimination and segregation, an America in which our old people can live in comfort and security as pledged in the Progressive Party platform, an America of decent homes and job security, an America where an enterprising man can go in business for himself and rise according to his ability, an America with better schools and better hospitals, an America of peace, abundance, and security.

Watch That Gold

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN SANBORN
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to call to the attention of my colleagues and the American people the following news item which was carried on the front page of the Washington Times-Herald of August 5, 1948:

NINE COTTON MILLS SLIDE DOWN TO 4-DAY WEEK

BOSTON, August 4.—Lack of orders and the world monetary situation caused nine large New England cotton mills today to go on a 4-day week.

Since we can expect to read many similar items with increasing frequency, it would be well to analyze just what this means and what is responsible for such a situation. In reality, American industry and American labor are being forced to compete with foreign slave labor or labor paid much below the American scale of wages, not only without benefit of the tariff, but under a condition where foreign imports are actually subsidized with American gold. That is free trade with a vengeance.

THIS IS HOW IT WORKS

In the first place, the so-called Reciprocal Trade Act permits the President to eliminate 75 percent of the tariffs on imports. Then foreign nations are permitted to buy our gold at the lowest price in the history of this country, because our gold price of $35 per ounce is equivalent to only $12.95 prior to 1934. This is a result of the debauching of our currency under the New Deal's unsound policy of managed economy and managed currency which has so depreciated our dollar that it now has a purchasing power equal to only 37 cents prior to 1934.

Take, for example, a shipment of pottery or other goods from Czechoslovakia, a Russian satellite nation, which sells at New York for $10,000. By demanding payment in gold, this $10,000 instantly becomes $16,000 or more, since, based on the present value of our dollar, our gold price should be $56 per ounce instead of $35 per ounce, and in many parts of the world gold is selling for more than $100 per ounce.

The dollar shortage in European countries is the only thing that prevents them from draining away all of our gold at much below its real value.

However, the vaults of the international bankers in New York and elsewhere are bulging with these synthetic 37-cent dollars, and if we should be misled by the 42 so-called economists who advocate a return to the single gold standard and the redemption of currency in gold at $35 per ounce, we can expect to see our Treasury drained of all its gold overnight, for if they are permitted to convert these depreciated dollars into gold on this basis, their 37-cent dollars will instantly become 59-cent dollars.

Our currency should be made redeemable, but since there is not enough gold in the world to supply an adequate redeemable monetary reserve, silver must be joined with gold at fixed and proper ratio, and the price of both metals pegged as provided in Senate bill 2895 and H. R. 7012. This means that if we would have peace and economic stability, we must return to the monetary system of bimetallism which time and experience proved to be the most perfect monetary system the world has ever known.

THEY WOULD HAVE THEIR CAKE AND EAT IT TOO

Those responsible for our funny, money-free trade policy are spending hundreds of millions of American dollars to build factories in foreign countries where they can manufacture goods with low-wage labor, evade American income and other taxes, and flood our markets with those goods under our present free-trade policy. Thus far, we have not noticed the heavy influx of foreign goods because of the backlog of demand built up under the war years, but once that demand is satisfied, we can expect to see more and more smokeless chimneys over American factories as is evidenced by the above news item.

But the greedy international bankers, who hope to have their cake and eat it, too, will kill the goose that lays the golden eggs, for the American market will cease to be the best market in the world if they are permitted to pursue this policy which would eventually bring about the unemployment of millions of American workers.

Anyone who knows anything should realize that free trade is possible only between nations and peoples that enjoy the same standard of living. The United States has but 6 percent of the world's population and 6 percent of the land area of the world. Free trade will not bring the other 94 percent of the world's people up to our standard of living, but drag us down to theirs.

When the American people wake up to what is happening to our economy they will demand adequate tariffs fast enough against these foreign factories built with American dollars for the purpose of exploiting the American people. Why should not the American people protect the American market for American producers? We created this market ourselves. We took it from no one. It is a tribute to free competitive enterprise under a free government which shows the folly of regimentation, managed economy, price-fixing, and other accouterments of the totalitarian state, whether you call it Fascist, Communist, Socialist, or Collectivist.

The other 94 percent of the world's population have 94 percent of the world's land area in which to build a sound economy of their own after they cease to follow the isms and ideologies of an illusory utopia pictured for them by Karl Marx, Cecil Rhodes, Lenin, Stalin, and Henry Wallace. It is time that we return to constitutional government and the American way of life, and repudiate those who would have us follow foreign isms and ideologies.

IN THE MEANTIME, WATCH THAT GOLD

We have two-thirds of the world's gold supply, approximately $23,000,000,000. But Europeans, living in countries asking for our dollars under the Marshall plan, have investments and cash in the United States amounting to the huge total of $26,000,000,000. If they should suddenly decide to convert these holdings into gold at $35 per ounce, they could not only demand and take all of our gold, but could demand $3,000,000,000 additional in gold that we do not have and cannot deliver. All gold and silver now owned by the United States Treasury should be frozen and kept here at home until we adopt a sound monetary system.

He Helped Make Westchester

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, Friday, July 16, 1948, marked the anniversary of the death 15 years ago of William L. Ward, the man who, more than any other individual, made Westchester County, which I have the honor to represent, the greatest county in the world. He was my friend and my leader for whom I had the greatest admiration and respect. Politically, he was a genius. He was called the boss of Westchester and a benevolent despot. Under leave granted to me, I include as a part of these remarks an editorial from the Daily Times of Mamaroneck, N. Y., of Friday, July 16, 1948, regarding Mr. Ward, entitled "He Helped Make Westchester," together with a news article from the same paper and on the same day entitled "Works and Spirit of William L. Ward Live on in Westchester":

[From the Mamaroneck (N. Y.) Daily Times of July 16, 1948]

HE HELPED MAKE WESTCHESTER

Today marks the fifteenth anniversary of the death of William L. Ward. To a new generation his name may mean little, for much has happened in even the short span of years since he left us. That is why, to keep alive the memory of one of Westchester's greatest friends, we publish today accounts of his career and tributes from some of his closest friends and political associates, to be found elsewhere in this issue.

It is not given to many men to leave upon the face of their communities such permanent marks of their deeds. But William L. Ward left more in Westchester than the parkways, the humanitarian institutions, the civic projects he fostered. He left behind a blazed trail for others to follow, that they might carry on his concepts of government. He initiated a system of government under which we are still regulated; he instilled into officeholders a sense of civic responsibility which has not yet died; he established a dominant political organization wherein the impetus he gave is still evident. For he was, above all, a political realist, and knew that one must utilize the tools at hand to achieve results.

If history be, as has been said, merely the chronological recordings of events set in motion by men, then it may be observed that much of the modern history of Westchester County and its cities, towns, and villages stems from ideas which sprang from the brain of this remarkable man.

For he, more than any other individual, made Westchester what it is today.

Words mean so very little in tribute. They may be carved upon the tombstone but even the most eloquent lack the conviction of actual accomplishment. That is why we say the real monument to Mr. Ward lies around us, in the conveniences and comforts, in the health and beauty, in the opportunities for gracious living and religious upbringing of our children which we enjoy in Westchester, and toward which he contributed largely for more than 40 years.

Today, on this anniversary of his passing, we may well pause to lay our verbal wreaths upon his grave and to express briefly our appreciation.

"Boss" Ward of Westchester may have left us but his works live on.

[From the Mamaroneck (N. Y.) Daily Times of July 16, 1948]

WORKS AND SPIRIT OF WILLIAM L. WARD LIVE ON IN WESTCHESTER; PARKS, PARKWAYS, WELFARE BUILDINGS STAND AS WARD MONUMENTS

"BOSS" USED POWER TO IMPROVE COUNTY

(By Hugh W. Robertson)

William Lukens Ward died 15 years ago today.

To a new generation, their interests diverted by a depression, the New Deal and World War II in the intervening period, he is but a shadowy background in local history. But to older residents, especially to those who came into contact frequently with him. Westchester still reflects in all that has made it the outstanding county of the Nation the spirit of "Boss Ward," benevolent despot and political genius.

Westchester County is, geographically, a small area of about 450 square miles. Yet in its population, its voting strength, its automobile registrations, its telephones, its assessed valuations, its conveniences for living, its budgets and its bonded debt, it exceeds any one of a dozen States of the Union. In its parkways, its humanitarian institutions, its trunk-line sanitary systems, highways, schools, recreational areas and the like, it surpasses many more States.

It was William L. Ward who, more than any other individual, made Westchester that way.

Though much of the county's prominence is due, naturally, to its proximity to the greatest city of the world, it required brains and ingenuity and foresight to take advantage of that natural asset and develop it properly. For in competition at all times with Westchester have been Nassau and Suffolk on Long Island, Staten Island across the bay, and New Jersey and Rockland County across the Hudson.

Foresaw development

In private life, William L. Ward followed the steps of his father in the manufacture of bolts and nuts in a Port Chester factory. But it was through politics—sometimes power politics—that he achieved the authority he wished, with which to build this county into what his vision told him it could be made.

He foresaw the inevitable development of New York City's Suburbia and planned so that as expansion came, so came regulation and supervision and the attractiveness of opportunities for gracious living within the metropolitan area.

Political power he did not desire for his own personal interests. He never held but one public elective office, that of a Congressman for one term, and even that term was later denied him in a long-drawn contest after the 2 years had expired. He was averse to public recognition of his work and submitted only once to a testimonial dinner for himself.

But for what power he could grasp which would give him the right to make over Westchester he was greedy. For he was determined that his beloved county should not be made another Bronx. Instead it was to be, as realtors say, a high-class residential suburb.

In the course of his accomplishment he found it necessary to go beyond county political confines. He soon learned that to protect Westchester's interests it would be necessary to exert State and even national influence.

That is why for years at State conventions, and occasionally at national, the query went out: "What does Boss Ward think?" That was why he became chairman of the executive committee of the Republican State committee—a post which brought him eventually, and as reported, to the smoke-filled room at which Warren G. Harding was nominated for the Presidency. But always, in whatever capacity he appeared, it was the interests of Westchester which were ever paramount.

Span of two generations

With only brief minor interludes, Mr. Ward was in reality the boss of Westchester from 1896 until his death on July 16, 1933, a span of two generations. No other in Westchester history—and in few other places—has ever held such undisputed power for so long.

He was an intimate of Harding and of Coolidge and of Hoover. He often found it pleasant and beneficial to take a boat across Long Island Sound to visit Theodore Roosevelt at Oyster Bay—although the two differed in the Bull Moose split—and he was a frequent visitor at the White House, whence also came calls for advice upon occasion for the occupants.

By coincidence, young Ward, 37, found himself in opposition in his early political efforts to the grandfather of the present GOP chairman of Westchester, Tom Platt, State leader of the Republican Party. The grandson, Livingston Platt, now rules the county GOP forces.

It was with the elder Platt's political foe, Judge William H. Robertson, that young Ward alined himself, served the abortive congressional term—it was later held he had not been properly nominated—and then succeeded Judge Robertson as county leader.

The county was then, and had been for many years, Democratic. But in 1896 under his leadership it went Republican for McKinley, and with one exception it has gone for Republican Presidential candidates ever since, even in the heyday of F. D. R. and the New Deal, giving Wendell Willkie the largest majority of all the 3,000 or more counties of the Nation and even larger than the majority in 10 of the 12 States which Willkie carried. That exception was in 1912 when Wilson got a plurality but not a majority over the Republicans and Bull Moose candidates.

Charter idea his

There were fights, of course, within and without the party, for young Ward had to prove his right to the spurs and to the crown. Meanwhile, as his political strength grew, he turned more and more of his energies into upbuilding Westchester, utilizing politics as necessary, but keeping it secondary.

Much of his effort was toward a county charter, one which would stabilize and unify governmental agencies, a success which came, oddly, only after his death in 1933. The framework of county government today, erected after his death, represents ideas and opinions he advanced years before.

From the old Bronx Parkway Commission, he secured the nucleus of the Westchester County Park Commission. Finding water fronts held almost solidly by private interests, he began by condemnation in public interests and by purchase where possible the development of beaches and parks.

He ordered great through-traffic parkways longitudinally and shorter cross-ribs to connect them. Altogether, within 7 years authority was obtained for the expenditure of $60,000,000 in our parkways and park system.

In this period after World War I the most substantial steps for Westchester, as it is today, were taken. In addition to the 165 miles of fine boulevards, the Hutchinson, Saw Mill, Cross-County, Central Westchester, Bronx extension and other fast-speed traffic routes, he overhauled the State and county highway and bridge systems.

He planned and built bathing beaches—Glen Island and Croton Point and Kingsland Point; and swimming pools, Wilsons Woods and Tibbetts Brook; and the four county-owned golf courses, far better than some private links, Maplemoor, Saxon Woods, Sprain Lake, and Mohansic, the last on lands obtained from the State for the nominal $1 cost.

Approved airport study

He had visions of what has now become our county airport and approved when the late V. Everitt Macy, head of the County Park Commission, nearly 20 years ago sent Jay Downer, the commission's chief engineeer, to Europe to study airports and draft plans for one in Westchester.

He ordered built the county center at White Plains and lived to see there grand opera from the Metropolitan. Once he said it was a prime ambition to see 5,000 children in the center all singing at the same time.

He supervised the purchase from private interests of an old amusement park at Rye Beach and saw to it that a modern $2,000,000 Playland, one of the cleanest and most beautiful public recreation centers of America, was constructed. So keen was his interest that when troubled with insomnia in his later years he would dress and drive down to stroll along the paths of Playland and admire its architecture under the moonlight.

He aided in acquisition of State and privately owned lands for the two largest park areas of the county, increasingly popular this year with family picnic parties, Blue Mountain Reservation and Poundridge Reservation, the latter bearing his name as a memorial—Ward-Poundridge. It is one of two such memorial parks, the other being V. Everitt Macy Park at Woodlands in Ardsley, honoring the millionaire philanthropist who served under War administrations as superintendent of the poor, public welfare commissioner and president of the park commission.

Sites acquired

These and smaller parks were obtained, improved and operated, along with rights-of-way for routes yet to be built, including the Pelham-Port Chester, the Sprain Lake, the Briarcliff-Peekskill, the Mamaroneck, and the continuation of the Cross-County from Huguenot Woods in New Rochelle to Playland.

In matters of sanitation and health, welfare and relief, he was equally vigorous. Some $55,000,000 was expended or authorized for construction of a pioneering trunk-sewer system into which could flow municipal disposal lines.

Grasslands Hospital, used by the Federal Government during World War I, was reconverted into one of the finest hospitals in the East, and enlarged. "Sunshine Cottage" for tubercular children set a new mark in treatment. And a new county home for aged and indigent was built alongside, as well as modern penal buildings, one for the county penitentiary and the other for the county jail along with a prison farm.

Occasionally Mr. Ward met with a setback. One was on prohibition, which he favored, although not himself a teetotaler.

Always he sought to perpetuate good government in the county after his passing by selection of strong aides.

When he wanted a good health commissioner he went to Albany and plucked the State Health Commissioner for the Westchester job. For a new probation director he went to Providence and took the State director of probation from Rhode Island. When he set up in the budget committee of the supervisors a strong control over expenditures he stole from the State of New York William B. Folger for county budget director, an accomplishment still hailed by many as the finest day's work he ever did for Westchester.

With a sense of fair play, he introduced prominent Democrats of the country into his commissions and departments, and even in distribution of pick-and-shovel patronage there was always under him a rule that Democratic leadership got a minority of the jobs for allocation to their party workers. But not too many.

In social service, he and V. Everitt Macy and the present public welfare commissioner, Ruth Taylor, initiated in Westchester many of the reforms later borrowed by Governor Alfred E. Smith, expanded and extended at Albany under Franklin D. Roosevelt, and carried by him to Washington later as the nucleus of his social welfare program.

For a monument to him, look about you in Westchester, at the fine parkways and parks, beaches and pools, picnic areas and playgrounds, trunk-line sewers and hospitals, forest preserves and bridle paths, the county center and the golf courses. They stem from his vision and his energy.

This is but a sketchy outline of a few of the high lights which featured the public career of William Lukens Ward. There is not space within this entire newspaper to chronicle all that he did for the Westchester he loved.

"The best politics," he was wont to say, "is good government, and all you need for that is honest officials."

LEADER A BIG MAN MENTALLY, PHYSICALLY

(By Edward J. Hughes, editor, the Port Chester Daily Item)

William L. Ward isn't dead.

Not really.

To be sure, he left 15 years ago today to join his Quaker fathers in the great meeting beyond the skies.

But he is still here, too.

And that is not just a grandiloquent way of say he "lives in the soul as well as in the structure of government in Westchester County, which he loved and ruled for more than three decades, always dreaming and working and fighting to make it better and more beautiful than it was when he came into it as a boy."

William L. Ward still is very colorfully and dynamically alive in the minds and hearts of those who knew him and worked with him.

And it is because he was that sort of man, indestructible and unforgetable in the eyes of his contemporaries, that this effort to picture him for latter-day Westchesterites may be interesting and, to an extent, useful. For to know the story of William L. Ward, the man, is to better comprehend the character and better appreciate the ideals of the vast community he dominated so long by the driving power of his spirit.

"Boss" Ward or Bill Ward wasn't just another shrewd, guileful, skillful political leader, though he had all of those qualities in extraordinary measure.

He was first of all a big man, a strong man, mentally and physically and spiritually.

One was not surprised to learn that he had been a famous oarsman in his undergraduate days at Columbia—he had a diploma from the School of Mines.

One-time ballplayer

And even as an old man he carried the unmistakable evidence of a one-time baseball player—the gnarled, battered finger joints of one who had caught many a hot liner barehanded or with the unpadded gloves of the game's early days.

Many people have offered many explanations of Mr. Ward's major successes in business and in politics.

Some have said Bill Ward always had money, implying that all things are possible for those who have money. But Bill Ward, though his father before him also was a successful manufacturer of bolts and nuts, did not always have money—he was a Quaker boy, and Quakers don't believe in soft living, so Bill Ward had to make his own way. He established his own factory and knew, by actually doing the work, every job in the place.

Some have said that, because he was prosperous and prominent in business, Mr. Ward had so many influential friends he very easily became the boss of the Republican Party in Westchester and a boss of that party in New York State and in the Nation. The truth was that Mr. Ward's political ascendancy was made possible by little fellows rather than by the "big guns" of republicanism, whom he frequently fought.

At home with all

And that brings us to our own idea of how Bill Ward got to be the great man he undeniably was. We saw in him that rarest of all types of genius: The ability to understand the other fellow, his problems, his needs, and his ambitions, no matter what his economic or social background.

He had worn overalls like one accustomed to wearing them.

He had changed to well-tailored business clothes and, with an easy grace, had entered the offices of great industrialists to convince them that Russell, Burdsall & Ward Empire bolts and nuts were the best in the world—with the result that more automobiles, more plows, more ships, and more of other basic machinery in this and many other countries have been held together by Empire products than by those of any other bolt and nut manufacturer.

In faultless evening dress, he had attended state dinners in the White House. There he drank champagne.

With equally easy grace, he had sat in a Port Chester taproom with old cronies among his factory hands or his humbler political followers to munch sandwiches and sip beer.

He had attended, and enjoyed, garden parties at homes of the great—among them his particular friend, the late President Theodore Roosevelt.

But he also had attended, and enjoyed with unaffected gusto, the clambakes of groups like the James S. Merritt Association of Port Chester. "Jim" Merritt, butcher, real-estate operator, and insurance broker, was the beloved Republican leader of Port Chester along about the turn of the century. Each year his association had a clambake and outing at old Rye Beach.

Coolidge story told

In white clambake hats, the boys all paraded behind a brass band on Port Chester's main street before boarding horse-drawn carry-alls or the then amazingly modern trolley cars for the beach. Among the most chipper of the paraders and the lustiest of the fun-makers at the bake was, for many years, Bill Ward.

You see, he was completely at home anywhere, with anyone.

Once our editor sent us to ask him about a visit he had made to the White House when it was occupied by Calvin Coolidge. We were expected to get a story to the effect that the President of the United States and our illustrious fellow townsman had conferred on some momentous problem of government or politics.

Mr. Ward listened intently while we explained our mission. Then, after a moment of silence, and with a twinkle in the "cold gray eyes" which weren't really cold at all when you got to know him, he said:

"I give you my word this is all that happened during my visit to the White House—but you must never tell the story while Coolidge and Ward are around. I was invited to dinner and to spend the night. Only the President was at home. He and I had a very simple dinner. We talked, just like you probably talked at your dinner last night, about how hot it was. He said it was always cooler in Vermont. I said it usually was cooler in Port Chester.

"We finished eating. He suggested we sit on the porch. We did. I smoked a cigar—my own. He didn't smoke. It was nice out there. We sat for about an hour, relaxed and comfortable. He didn't say anything. Neither did I.

"Finally he stood up and said, 'William, you don't talk much, do you?' and I said, 'No, Mr. President, I don't.' Then he said, 'Let's go to bed.' And we went. The next morning we had breakfast together. He said, 'Good morning'; I said, 'Good morning'; we ate, and then we shook hands and I left."

Greatness of simplicity

And it wasn't hard for us to believe that that was really the whole story. For the Ward we knew and the Coolidge we have read about were much alike—it was the things which were unsaid between them that night in the White House which gave deep satisfaction to both of them. They were friends. Each had the greatness of simplicity. Each loved America—and each knew the other did.

Like Mr. Coolidge, Mr. Ward never lost his love for the folks among whom he had grown up and the countryside that always had been his home. Through most of his active life, he was given to walking, whenever he could spare the time, from his Comly Avenue home, the great gray castle said to have been named "Portland" because it was the first concrete house built in America, to the bolt and nut factory on Midland Avenue. In later years his chauffeur-driven car would trail him at a discreet distance.

The walking was ostensibly for his health—but it was also a way of looking over the town, to see where streets needed paving or a park should be placed; moreover, and most important, it was a way of casually meeting old friends—Lt. "Sport" Devanny of the police department, "Roccie" Marino, the barber, among many. Out of those contacts came information which brought aid and comfort to lots of families who never knew the course of the benefactions. No one ever asked Mr. Ward about a thing like that—if any other person knew, that person was his wise and gracious secretary, Miss Julie V. Jordan, and she could be as tight-lipped as her employer.

A man of contrasts and paradoxes was this "Boss" Ward—he could be ruthlessly tough, he could be completely kind, he could talk, he could be silent, he could walk with the great and meet the humble as one of them. He liked to explain it all this way: "My business is making bolts and nuts to hold things together and make 'em useful. My hobby has been holding men and women together in the job of making life better for all of us.

Peaceful inside

The last time we saw him he was seated in a big chair in his living room. A wild storm was raging outside. Inside it was peaceful. One sensed that this old man had been through many storms of many kinds—and had come through with head high, unswerved by the shifting winds, unawed and undaunted by beating rains. One felt that he had stood, as stood his great stone house, unshakable in the midst of tumult—a feudal baron in his mountain castle, ruling a broad domain.

Then he spoke: "I am an old man. I may not be around much longer. When I go, don't let anyone tell you any high-falutin' things about me. I've just been very fortunate—I've liked folks and they've liked me and we've been able to work together."

What we've written may seem "high falutin' "—but it isn't, really, for William L. Ward was a truly great son of Westchester and of America.

TRIBUTES PAID ON FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF DEATH

"MOST UNUSUAL LEADER," SAYS REFEREE YOUNG

(By J. Addison Young, official referee)

I knew Mr. Ward intimately from the time I first ran for district attorney in 1901. For many years he appointed me as a member of his well-remembered executive committee of the Republican county committee. This committee met quite often and its members became very well acquainted with each other.

I owe very much to his friendship and loyalty to me during all the years of our association. He was a most unusual leader. It is rare to find a political leader who does not wish political preferment or financial advantages for himself. Mr. Ward desired neither. In a conversation which I had with him during these years, I asked him once why he had spent so much of his valuable time in the interest of the county and his political party, and he replied that his one chief desire in managing the affairs of the county as a leader was to make Westchester County the best place to live in the country.

The parks, golf courses, beach resorts and wonderful boulevards which we enjoy largely as the result of his efforts show how fully he realized his ambition. With this in mind, I have often thought that the park in Poundridge which bears his name is the best possible tribute to his memory.

CLOSE PRAISES VISION, SERVICE TO COUNTY

(By Frederick P. Close, official referee)

Viewed through the perspective of the years we begin to more fully realize the genius for government possessed by our late and still lamented leader, William L. Ward. His outstanding characteristic was his vision of the necessity of preparing now for the needs of the future.

County government to him was not static, but a progressive, growing government, ever increasing the facilities of government for the benefit of the people of the county. He was ever watchful that such increased facilities and indeed all government in the county was conducted with courtesy, efficiently and as economically as could be consistent with the service the people of the county were entitled to receive.

If we turn our minds back to the early years of the present century we will see Westchester County situated, geographically, on the door step of the largest and most rapidly expanding city in the United States. But Westchester County had done little or nothing to take advantage of its fortunate situation.

It was Mr. Ward who foresaw the necessity of parkways, parks, of play fields and beaches, of broad thoroughfares geared to handle the greatly increased traffic that the belt-line production of automobiles was to bring to our county in the then not too distant future. It was Mr. Ward who first realized that the authority of local municipalities must be impinged so that trunk sewers and sewage-disposal plants might be constructed.

Missionary work recalled

It was Mr. Ward who first urged local communities to furnish recreational facilities to their residents and who created the county recreation commission to do missionary work in that field and to give assistance and advice to forward-looking towns and villages who saw the necessity and the need and sought to satisfy both.

He conceived the county center and hoped to make it the cultural center of the county. He foresaw that if Westchester County was to progress in government, it must discard the combined legislative and executive functions possessed by the loosely organized, unwieldy, and sprawling board of supervisors and create a county executive with centralized power, authority, and responsibility.

It was his vision that foresaw the service that could be furnished to the people of Westchester by the establishment of the county hospital, the expansion of the welfare department, the establishment of the children's court, and the creation of the probation department.

All of these improvements in county government and many, many more that could be enumerated are now accepted as a matter of course, but those who had any part in the government of the county when these changes were wrought know that they were not brought about without bitter opposition on the part of those who had no vision or for partisan or personal reasons refused to open their mind to the vision.

Esteem evidence of debt

The people of Westchester owe a debt to William L. Ward that they can never repay. However, the universal esteem, increasing as the years pass, in which his memory is held, furnishes evidence that they realize their obligation, and this appreciation is the only coin he would ever want or accept in payment.

His was an unselfish leadership without thought of anything except to make his party the synonym for courteous, honest, progressive, and efficient government and to make Westchester County the most desirable place in the world to live.

COURAGE, LOYALTY, HONESTY, RECALLED BY BLEAKLEY

(By William F. Bleakley, former supreme court justice and former county executive)

On July 16, 1948, Mr. William L. Ward will have been dead 15 years. To those of us who knew him intimately it seems but a short time. Our close association with him taught us to love and respect him. His ideals and his methods have lived after him. Constantly in seeking a solution we ask ourselves what would Mr. Ward do under the circumstances.

The qualities that made him famous as a political leader were courage, sagacity, loyalty, sound judgment, and honesty of purpose. He had an advantage over most political leaders in that politics was not a business with him. Being a man of independent means he gave his time and money to the promotion of the welfare of Westchester County. He believed that this could best be done by assuming the leadership of the dominant party.

It was he who conceived the development of our parkways. His theory was that the natural increase in the value of property would produce the revenue sufficient to pay the cost of the parkways. His judgment was justified. Westchester, under his guidance, became the most-discussed county in the United States. Praise came from every section of the country. He developed a system of parks serving every part of the county. The county center and playland have enabled the county to furnish the opportunities for culture and entertaining recreation. The greatest monument to his foresight is the development of Grasslands, the center of public welfare, ideal from the point of view of location and administration.

A request from him was equivalent to a command. Men did things for him because they had a deep affection for him and confidence in his integrity. He inquired diligently as to the qualities of men for public office. He was not satisfied alone with their reputation—he looked deeply into the question of their character. He was loyal to his party, but his county came first, and his party and his leadership were but means to an end. The development of Westchester County is a monument to his endeavors. Only a park bears his name, but his reputation lives on.

WALLIN CALLS HIS LOVE FOR COUNTY UNBOUNDED

(By William J. Wallin, former mayor of Yonkers)

It has been truly said and it is worthy of frequent repetition that a democracy cannot rise above its leadership.

It is also true that a courageous statesmanlike and unselfish leader can greatly raise the level of the commonwealth within the framework of a democracy.

William L. Ward was such a leader.

He wielded all the power of the unchallenged political boss of Westchester County for more than a generation. His love for Westchester was unbounded.

It was due chiefly to the leadership of William L. Ward that Westchester took the first place in the country and set a pattern for the rest of the country in many fields, then unplowed, but now so cultivated that the people accept them as if they had always been as they now are.

Public welfare, public health, parks and parkways are outstanding examples of this.

No narrow partisan

Mr. Ward was a staunch Republican, one having deep knowledge of the place and need of a party organization with strict discipline in its ranks, if our democracy is to work, and the rule of the majority—the keystone of democracy—is to bind the structure in unity.

But Mr. Ward was no narrow partisan. Almost without exception, the nominations for high office went to outstanding men who became a credit to the county and the Republican organization.

Mr. Ward insisted on order and decency in the county. To the elected official, be he Republican or Democrat, he gave support while in office. While actively seeking through his organization to nominate the organization's choice for judge and district attorney, once elected he brooked no interference, political or otherwise, with the performance of their duties.

Mr. Ward rose above partisanship where the public interest was involved and was quick to see the good in his political opponents and their plans for the public good. An outstanding example may be briefly related.

Mr. V. Everitt Macy was nominated by the Democratic Party as its candidate for county superintendent of the poor—commonly called the poormaster. A none too good home for the poor was located at Eastview. The local poormaster doled out a pittance to the poor.

After a strenous campaign, Mr. Macy was elected over Mr. Ward's opposition in this predominantly Republican county.

Mr. Ward, following his customary practice, gave assurances to Mr. Macy of his support while in office and invited Mr. Macy to see him in relation to plans and budget needs.

Reelection supported

The vision which Mr. Macy had of the welfare program now existing and then but a seeming dream, entranced Mr. Ward, who not only then gave Mr. Macy his support, but 3 years later fought against determined organization opposition to secure Mr. Macy the Republican nomination for county superintendent of the poor.

Following Mr. Macy's reelection and for many years, Mr. Ward's influence and loyal support of the Macy welfare program requiring complete changes in the concept of poor relief, changes in the laws, and large appropriations, were prime factors in bringing the program into being—a program which has been expanded and adopted in its main features throughout much if not all of the country.

Mr. Ward was a friendly man, but forthright in word and deed. He detested falsehood, sham, and hypocrisy. He lived the Quaker faith of his ancestors—love for God and all mankind, the doing of justice and withal, humility.

A great debt of gratitude is due to Ward of Westchester as he was known throughout the country and as he was proud to be known.

Mr. Ward had a sure conviction that the strength and vitality of a democracy can come solely from the grass roots, and that only the practice of democracy in the local governments could supply and store the life blood of democracy for the State and Nation. His political life was governed by this philosophy and he put it into practice to the glory of Westchester. He found in this work an abiding satisfaction and joy.

A grateful Westchester may well pay homage to the memory of its most useful citizen.

The Probe That Failed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial by Robert E. G. Harris which appeared in the Los Angeles Daily News on Monday, July 19, 1948:

THE PROBE THAT FAILED

In the first place it's rather odd and productive of several questions that the grand jury should be entering the local congressional campaign.

Also it's a bit hard to understand why the grand jury, having poked its nose uninvited into the Fourteenth Congressional District ballot miscount, hasn't been able to come forward with anything more constructive than a mild recommendation favoring further inquiry into the methods of selection and supervision of precinct voting officials.

Beneath the surface of the grand jury hubbub about the Douglas-Braden congressional contest you can detect that someone has been engaging in a powerful lot of wishful thinking. Here, in other words, was what looked like a heaven-sent opportunity. Suggest fraud, hint at criminality, make it appear DOUGLAS supporters were trying to steal the primaries, and you've set the proper mood of civic revlusion for a Braden victory in November.

Fortunately this wish-fulfillment seems to be frustrated. But the wishers can still wish, can't they? And they can still plant a seed or two—seeds of suspicion and doubt—which may germinate later on.

Actually what happened in the Fourteenth District primary last month was that a few precinct voting officials didn't count straight. On the Republican side the race between Democratic Representative HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS and candidate Wallace Braden was close—very close. First returns indicated Mrs. DOUGLAS had won. This would have assured her election, inasmuch as she had captured the Democratic nomination.

A recount of 30 precincts, however, disclosed errors in tabulating the ballots and Braden was certified as winner of the Republican nomination by 152 votes.

According to Acting Registrar of Voters Benjamin Hite the disparity occurred as the result of honest error and, in some cases, from ignorance by election board members of the proper tallying procedure.

Under normal circumstances this recount and admission of error should have ended the matter except for recommendations as to future safeguards. Nevertheless it didn't end the matter. The Los Angeles County grand jury decided to step in and to instruct its criminal complaints committee to take over.

Admittedly the grand jury has turned up a mare's nest. No fraud has been uncovered. There is no evidence that dead people were voted or fraudulent ballots were cast.

The grand-jury investigation merely has confirmed Hite's findings that certain precinct officials in the fourteenth district lacked simple skill in simple arithmetic.

Apparently dissatisfied with such an unspectacular conclusion, grand-jury officials then proceeded to issue a statement, heavy with implications. This statement was to the effect that in one precinct 2,522 votes originally were attested as having been cast, whereas the recount disclosed the precinct has a total of only 161 voters.

Registrar Hite exploded this statement by pointing out that the figure 2,522 could have resulted from precinct officials mistakenly counting every one of the votes of "X" on each of the 161 ballots and totaling them. Certainly it's asking too much even of a fervid imagination to believe any precinct election board would sit idly (and culpably) by while a polling place was being mobbed by 2,361 more voters than were listed on the register. The worst election frauds in the Nation's history were never marked by anything that brazen.

Now that the grand jury has made its little sally into congressional campaigning it might be a good time to look into the matter of voting machines. These machines cost money. But they make the ballot more effective. They obviate the possibility of mistakes such as occurred in the fourteenth district mix-up. The voter can register his will on these machines by pulling a lever. The machine then automatically records each vote and adds up the total. All precinct officials have to do is to read the numbers and record them on the reporting sheets.

Hence if Los Angeles and the State of California want to do something constructive they will provide means whereby voters who aren't particularly literate and election officials who can't add up a column of numbers can still be a part of the democratic process.

Meanwhile the grand jury can find a lot of rotten things to investigate if it will bother to look around.—R. E. G. H.

Internship Program In the Department of Medicine and Surgery of the Veterans' Administration

---

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the Congress, this year, passed Public Law 722, permitting the establishment of a system of internship programs in the Department of Medicine and Surgery of the Veterans' Administration. This law has great possibilities for improving the quality of medical service to our disabled veterans. I desire to include at this point a recent statement prepared by the Veterans' Administration showing the program which will be carried forward under this recently enacted law:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

A limited number of internships in Veterans' Administration hospitals will be offered qualified medical graduates, Veterans' Administration announced today.

The internships will be limited to the 75 VA hospitals now offering residency training programs in cooperation with 59 class A medical schools over the country. They will be further limited to those hospitals which have bachelor quarters available on the station grounds. A survey is in progress to determine what housing is available.

Two types of internships will be available:

1. Straight, for surgery, general medicine, and other straight subjects; and

2. Rotating, in which interns study, under a rotating schedule, surgery, general medicine, and other related subjects. Arrangements will be made for affiliated training in other than VA hospitals for obstetrics and pediatrics. Such affiliated training may not involve more than 20 percent of a year. The hospital at which such affiliated training is secured must be approved for internship by the Council on Medical Education and Hospitals of the American Medical Association.

Mixed internships will not be offered.

Internships will be for 1 year, subject to reappointment for 1 year, if desired and recommended by the local dean's committee. The deans' committees, composed of members of university faculties or prominent local doctors, supervise the residency training program and will also supervise internship training.

Annual pay for interns will not exceed $1,800 a year. Quarters, subsistence, and laundry will be furnished. The stipend for interns at each hospital will be determined by VA's chief medical director on recommendations of the deans' committees and in conformance with the existing scale of remuneration for interns in the locality.

Interns will be appointed in the VA in accordance with the national policy for all medical schools and hospitals, once each year on November 15, their tour of duty to begin the following July 1 or January 1 following July 1.

The new program is under the supervision of Dr. Paul B. Magnuson, VA's chief medical director, and Dr. Edward Harvey Cushing, assistant medical director for research and education in VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery. Dr. Cushing, formerly associate clinical professor at Western Reserve University, Cleveland, Ohio, handled many of the details in establishing VA's residency training program and is in charge of VA's research activities into the causes and cures of little-known diseases among veterans.

The 75 VA hospitals which now have residency training programs and the universities or other agencies with which they are affiliated are:

Clarksburg Did It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD G. ROHRBOUGH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ROHRBOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the text of a radio address which I made over three West Virginia stations, telling the story behind the story of the new Veterans' Administration hospital at Clarksburg, W. Va.:

Your veterans' hospital at Clarksburg is now fast becoming a real building of stone, brick, and mortar. There was a time, though, when it was made mostly of dreams and hopes.

There are many veterans' hospitals being built across these United States, and they are all being built of the usual conventional materials—wood, stone, brick.

There's something a bit different about your veterans' hospital here at Clarksburg. It's a little story I'd like to tell you. Something I think you as citizens of Clarksburg ought to know and of which you can be proud. For in the beginning, your hospital was only a dream—a dream that many said only a miracle could make come true.

The story begins 2 years ago at a luncheon meeting in the city of Clarksburg. A group of businessmen were meeting to talk over the possibility of acquiring a 200-bed general medical veterans' hospital.

There had been previous meetings with officials of the Veterans' Administration. These officials had indicated that this meeting—one of rather spontaneous origin—might be the deciding one in the selection of a northern West Virginia site for a new Veterans' Administration hospital.

The Veterans' Administration had said that the Clarksburg site—an 80-acre peninsular tract, surrounded on three sides by the West Fork River—would be an ideal spot for the hospital. But it had pointed out that the cost of the land was too much to meet the limitations of its budget.

The businessmen attending that luncheon were determined Clarksburg should not lose the hospital on such grounds.

During that meeting and within the next few hours, citizens of Clarksburg pledged contributions of more than $50,000 toward the purchase of the site. It was a demonstration of civic consciousness which, VA officials have told me, is without parallel in the hospital program. Call it what you will, it was a gesture as miraculous as it was generous.

One overly enthusiastic official of the VA said when he learned of the voluntary contributions that, in his opinion, Clarksburg has bought itself a hospital.

But it wasn't that easy. I found this out when I came to Washington for the opening of the Eightieth Congress. His optimistic report had not taken into account the unexpected that always develops in Government undertakings. It wasn't long until I encountered the first of many obstacles which were to be placed in the path of the Clarksburg hospital. There was serious doubt, I discovered, that the Government could accept, from private citizens, these generous cash gifts.

I learned that a special act of Congress would be required—not only because of the money which had been pledged but also because the site at Clarksburg was a larger tract than the Government plans required.

One Veterans' Administration official was most discouraging when he talked with me. Frankly, I must admit that I also feared for the worst. I knew the hospital program was behind schedule and I was apprehensive that, rather than wait for Congress to act, the Veterans' Administration might eliminate the hospital altogether.

So we must have a special act of Congress? Well, if this were necessary, I reasoned that the time to get to work on it was right then. But this time, it was I who learned that this wasn't as simple as it sounded.

Before the bill could have any chance of being approved by the House, it had to be approved by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Worst yet, at this point up came another "before." I found that before the committee would approve the bill, it required a favorable report upon the proposal from the Veterans' Administration. This report had to be in the hands of the committee before the bill could get out of committee.

I took it for granted that, because the Veterans' Administration was friendly to the idea of locating the hospital at Clarksburg, it would submit a favorable report to the committee within a week or two. I had not allowed for what Washington calls "administrative processing." Two weeks went by and there was no report.

I inquired if anything had gone wrong. No; I was assured, nothing was wrong—it just took a little time to prepare the report. I stood by for another 2 weeks. Still no report. I inquired again.

After weeks of this, I began to camp upon the doorstep of the Veterans' Administration. Instead of inquiring every other week, I began to inquire every other day.

By this time, spring had changed to summer. Time was running out for the first session of the Eightieth Congress.

At last, just 4 days before the session closed, I learned that a miracle had happened. The report was on the way to the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs. This committee, as you know, is headed by Mrs. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, of Massachusetts. She's a lady who has the best interest of the veteran in her heart.

I do not have to tell you that I already had thoroughly discussed the Clarksburg hospital situation with her. I have only to report that when a woman starts to do something, she does it. The same morning Mrs. ROGERS' committee received the report from the VA, it reported favorably upon my bill. That afternoon it was placed on the House Calendar. The following morning, the bill was voted upon in the House of Representatives. It passed by unanimous consent.

Next day it went to the Senate, where Senator CHAPMAN REVERCOMB, of West Virginia, had been doing some spade work. It passed the Senate that day.

Call it what you will, I say this speed on the part of the legislative was nothing short of a miracle.

The bill, in addition to permitting the Government to accept the cash contributions from private citizens, also provided that the city of Clarksburg might use a portion of the 80-acre tract for a municipal park.

Surely, I told myself, nothing more could develop to interfere with the new hospital. And yet, after what had already happened, I held my optimism within bounds.

I was not fully prepared, however, for the shock which I experienced last December 28 when bids were opened for the first time on the hospital construction. The low bid, it was announced, was $5,645,896—approximately 25 percent more than the Government had estimated it would be. I regretted very much that the Army engineers were forced to reject the bid. But I was not at all surprised that they took this position. The bid was excessive and that's all there was to it.

Would the bids be lower the next time they were opened? About all I could do was to hope, just, I'm sure, as many of you did. From December 29 to March 8, when the bids were to be opened the second time, I did my level best to see to it that the Clarksburg hospital did not remain in the talk stage. I was told that the Army engineers were hustling to get new bids but I was not at all certain that if they succeeded, the bids would be lower.

Then, on February 19, the Army engineers at Huntington announced the awarding of contracts for the construction of a 200-bed Veterans' Administration hospital at Beckley. This hospital would serve the counties in the southern part of the State.

As you might well imagine, I heard rumblings of discontent from the northern part of the State. "How come the South gets its hospital, and we don't get ours?" I was asked. There were other comments about the "paper hospital" at Clarksburg.

Yet, instead of being discouraged by the Beckley announcement, I was considerably encouraged. I was pleased that our veterans in the southern part of the State, many of whom live within the Third Congressional District, would have a hospital near their homes where their families might visit them often.

And if the bids at Beckley were low enough to be accepted, might not the second crop at Clarksburg be lower?

March 8 arrived at last. With a mixture of hope and fear, I read the telegram from the Army engineers at Huntington. I saw at a glance that the lowest bid was higher than the Government estimate. With a pencil, I began to figure just how much higher it was.

In thousands of dollars it was a lot of money, but in percentage the bid of the Thompson & Street Co., of Charlotte, N. C., was only slightly over the Government estimate.

I called the office of the Chief of Engineers in Washington and heard some very good news. Contracts had been awarded for other hospitals when the low bids were as much as 15 percent over the Government estimates. The Clarksburg low bid was just a little more than 1½ percent over the Government estimate. While they wouldn't say so as yet for certain, it looked to the Army engineers as if the bid would be accepted.

The next day the Army engineers called me back. They said the bid had been accepted. I was so overjoyed that I hung up the telephone without getting the details.

I called the engineers back and learned that the North Carolina firm had the main contract for $4,952,796 and the Otis Elevator Co. had the contract for elevators and dumbwaiters for $151,401. The total of the two low bids was $5,104,197.

I learned that, in addition to the construction of the main hospital building, the bid of the Thompson & Street Co. also includes a separate building for a boiler plant. It includes roads and it includes landscaping.

I also learned that quarters for hospital personnel are to be constructed on a contract to be awarded at a later date.

Ground was broken this spring for the Clarksburg hospital, with representatives of each of the local veterans' organizations turning over the first clods of dirt. I made a special trip from Washington to Clarksburg to be present for the ground-breaking ceremony. I'm sure you who have followed this report will understand why.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep and sincere regret that I have learned that it is the intention of our esteemed and distinguished colleague the gentleman from California, the Honorable CLARENCE F. LEA, to leave Congress at the close of the present session.

The service that has been rendered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] as Representative from the First Congressional District of California has been outstanding, not alone from the standpoint of the long number of years he has served—32 years—but primarily because of the high quality of service he has rendered.

He has been a studious, honest, hard-working Member of Congress. He has gained the admiration and respect of all his colleagues. His ability, high purpose, and patriotism have given him a commanding influence among his colleagues in the House.

It is regrettable that the Congress, and the district he has so faithfully represented, will lose his valuable services. Always sound of judgment, considerate of the rights of others, and actuated only by what he conceived to be for the best interests of his fellow man, he has made a great and lasting contribution to his Nation.

Time and again during his service in the Congress he has been called upon to serve upon special commissions and committees. To these have been assigned the important task of making careful studies of problems confronting the Nation, and calling for recommendations as a guide to legislative action. In each instance he has shown an intense and zealous desire to meet each problem and find a solution that would be sound and just. His service on these occasions has added to his stature as a statesman.

In order that there may be something in the nature of a biographical record of our distinguished colleague I have, without his knowledge, gathered some information in this respect, as follows:

CLARENCE FREDERICK LEA

Born in Lake County, Calif., July 11, 1874. Son of James M. and Elizabeth Lea; father born in Tennessee and mother in Kentucky. Father crossed the plains with a covered-wagon train on a 6 months' journey in 1851 with the gold rush.

Attended common schools, Lakeport Academy, Stanford University, and graduated from the law department, University of Denver.

Had his first job at the age of 14 years, operating a sulky hayrack at 75 cents a day, working from 6 a. m. till sundown. Got his money to go to Stanford University by farming part of his father's place on shares.

Went from Lake to Sonoma County by bicycle, about 70 miles over the mountains, to begin the practice of law shortly after graduating from the University of Denver in 1898.

In 1906 was elected district attorney of Sonoma County, in which office he served for 10 years. Was president of the District Attorneys' Association in California, 1916–17. Resigned when elected to Congress.

Elected to United States Congress in 1916 as a Member of the House of Representatives from the First Congressional District of California. Elected to each succeeding Congress, having secured the nomination of both major parties in 14 of the 16 elections. He is now serving his thirty-second year. Has a longer service in the United States Congress than any Member from California. There are only four Members in the House who have served longer than Mr. LEA.

Was one of 15 members of the House War Investigating Committee of the First World War. For several years he has been the only surviving Member in the House of that committee. Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, W. J. Graham, Illinois, chairman.

Was a member of the Subcommittee on Aviation of the above investigating committee and wrote a report on aviation during the World War, which has since been made a study of aeronautical education in some military courses.

Was chairman of the Democratic caucus of the Seventy-third Congress. Was also a member of the House Aviation Investigating Committee of the Sixty-eighth Congress. Select Committee on Inquiry Into Operations of the United States Air Services, Florian Lampert, of Wisconsin, chairman.

Member of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce since 1921. Became chairman of that committee on the election of SAM RAYBURN as Speaker in 1937, serving for 10 years.

Has the record of securing passage by the House of Representatives of the largest number of bills in any one day: Panama Canal, 21. This legislation came from Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee during Mr. LEA'S chairmanship.

Was on the subcommittee of above committee which wrote the Securities Act of 1933. He is author of the Natural Gas Act of 1938, which became a law and provided for Government regulation of the interstate shipment of natural gas.

Was coauthor of the Federal Food and Drug Act to safeguard the health of the Nation.

Lea amendment to Federal Trade Commission Act prohibits false and misleading advertising of foods, drugs, cosmetics, and so forth.

Had charge of legislation in House which resulted in the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938.

Was author of the act providing for the regulation of freight forwarders; the Air Pilot Training Act, and the resolution which called for a report from the Civil Aeronautics Administration to provide a national airport system. Mr. LEA was coauthor of the Federal Airport Act enacted in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

He piloted through the House the noted Wool Products Labeling Act, which requires all woolen goods to be sold under a label correctly stating their wool content.

Since 1934 Mr. LEA has taken an active interest in coordinating the different types of transportation. He was coauthor of a number of acts relating to transportation, including the Transportation Act of 1940, which coordinated the transportation agencies of the country, consisting of railroads, highways, inland and coastal waterways. This law helped our transportation system to handle the tremendous burden of freight imposed upon it by the last war.

While chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Mr. LEA was head of a national transportation survey of all forms of transportation, as authorized by Congress, to make a study of postwar problems of our transportation agencies.

Author of the act to prohibit certain coercive practices affecting radio broadcasting, commonly referred to as the Petrillo Act.

MODERNIZING OUR PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

For 20 years Congressman LEA has been interested in this matter, advocating through resolutions in various Congresses a proposed constitutional amendment to modernize the method of electing the President. His first resolution was filed in 1928; a similar resolution was reported to the House favorably in 1933—Seventy-second Congress—and another in the Seventy-third Congress. He has repeatedly since filed similar resolutions, and in this Congress filed House Joint Resolution 124. The principal proposals embodied in the resolution are that:

First. The electoral college be abolished.

Second. The relative voting strength of each State be preserved as at present by allowing it electoral votes in the same number as now.

Third. The President be elected by direct vote of the people.

Fourth. The unit State vote be eliminated.

Fifth. The electoral votes of each State be divided between the candidates in exact proportion to their popular votes in that State.

A few weeks ago, the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee recommended and subsequently the full committee, which has 27 members, unanimously reported to the House favorably a resolution for the adoption of a constitutional amendment in the exact language proposed by Mr. LEA. The resolution was reported in the name of Mr. GOSSETT, a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, has introduced in the Senate a resolution carrying the same language of the Lea resolution.

The adoption of this amendment would be an outstanding historical contribution to our method of electing the President.

In conclusion, I wish to express the great personal loss I will feel in no longer having the benefit of CLARENCE LEA'S mature judgment and loyal assistance in my work as chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. He has been, and will continue to be, a source of inspiration to me in the work of this great committee that he presided over for many years.

As CLARENCE LEA leaves the work of the Congress, for a well-earned rest, it is my hope and prayer, and I am sure that of all who have known him, that his days, and those of his good wife, may be long and filled with happiness and that God's richest blessings shall attend them both through all their remaining years.

The Record of the Eightieth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, when the Republican-dominated Eightieth Congress adjourned on June 20, 1948, after two sessions totaling 15 months of legislative deliberation, I stated that its record was one of miserable failure and broken campaign promises.

The Congress had a chance to redeem itself when the President called it back into special session on July 26. However, the Republican leadership is now adjourning the special session with little added to this record of failure. It still represents a sell-out of the people's welfare.

The real issues of the special session—inflation and housing—which are of direct concern to the people, have been ignored completely. To cover up this do-nothing policy, the House Committee on Un-American Activities and the Senate investigating committee staged a sensational spy hunt which became a three-ring circus. Under cover of this smoke screen created by newspaper headlines screaming "spies" and "Red plots," the Congress proceeded to water down the anti-inflation program and emasculate the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill until both are hardly recognizable. Now the Eightieth Congress is adjourning for the last time.

The legislation record of the Eightieth Congress can be summed up in two words—inaction and reaction. There was inaction on those vital issues—housing, health, social security, old-age pensions, education, minimum wages, and so forth—which directly affect the welfare of the vast majority of the people. At the same time, there was reaction in the form of repressive antilabor legislation, irresponsible budget cutting, restriction of reciprocal-trade agreements, tax hand-outs for the wealthy, and other NAM-sponsored and depression-breeding policies.

This reactionary and antisocial approach of the GOP extended to everything from taxation to veterans' affairs, from social legislation to agriculture, and from civil rights to foreign policy. The following subject by subject analysis, presented as a report to the people of Minnesota's Eighth Congressional District, substantiates the charge that the Republican Congress consistently favored special privilege and ignored human rights.

GOP TAX PROGRAM FAVORS WEALTHY

The policy of favoring corporate interests at the expense of the people found its fullest expression in the GOP tax program. The Knutson tax-reduction bill, passed during the second session over a Presidential veto, reduced Federal revenues by $5,000,000,000 annually. It is significant to note who benefits from this tax cut. Over 40 percent of the income-tax reduction goes to those with annual incomes of over $5,000—a group which constitutes less than 5 percent of the population. The $250,000,000 annual reduction in gift and inheritance taxes also benefits only about 12,000 of the wealthiest families.

In keeping with their desire to shift a greater proporation of the tax burden from the upper to the lower income groups, the Republicans rejected outright the democratic proposal to reimpose the excess-profits tax at this time when corporate profits after taxes are approaching $18,000,000,000 per year—the highest in history. In accepting the Knutson tax bill as the cornerstone of their party's tax program, the Republican leadership refused to give more than token tax reductions to the low-income groups—the people who need substantial tax relief in order to maintain their purchasing power during the present inflationary period. At the same time, the majority leaders indicated that they favor a national sales tax and the extension of excise taxes (an excise is a hidden sales tax), both of which are regressive in character and fall most heavily upon the lower income groups.

ALL GROUPS SUFFER FROM REACTIONARY GOP POLICIES

Every major group in American society—the worker, farmer, small-business man, and veteran—suffered from the reactionary and pro-Wall Street policies of the Republican majority. The interests of the common people everywhere were sacrificed during both sessions of the Eightieth Congress, and their needs were callously disregarded.

Organized labor was the first victim. During the 1947 session the so-called Portal-To-Portal Pay Act was passed which undermined the Fair Labor Standards Act, made its wage-and-hour provisions difficult to enforce, and hamstrung efforts to eliminate sweatshop conditions in industry. The NAM-sponsored Taft-Hartley law took away rights won by labor during half a century of struggle, opened the door to strike-breaking by injunction, and the use of the National Guard and Regular Army units against striking workers. Federal services to benefit labor, such as those of the Conciliation Service, the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and other Labor Department functions, were curtailed by budget reductions. The United States Employment Service was taken out of the Labor Department and made a minor bureau in the Federal Security Agency.

While adopting antilabor legislation, the GOP ignored all legislative proposals to benefit the workingman. No consideration was given to the proposal to raise minimum wages to 75 cents per hour, or to liberalize unemployment compensation payments to provide $25 per week for 26 weeks. Legislation to establish a labor extension program was rejected.

The farmer fared no better than labor. During both sessions, the Roosevelt farm program was undermined by drastic budget cuts which curtailed the AAA, soil-conservation, school-lunch, farm tenant purchase, and crop-insurance programs. REA funds were slashed during the first session, and only strong protests from the farm bloc made it possible to restore these funds for 1949. The farmer cooperative movement came under direct attack as the GOP threatened its destruction through the use of the Federal taxing power. The so-called Republican long-range farm program never materialized—instead, the Congress merely extended farm price support at 90 percent of parity for another year, after which a new 60–90-percent parity formula will take effect.

The veteran received little consideration. Only a few minor veterans' bills were adopted. Terminal-leave bonds were made cashable, GI educational subsistence payments were increased, and income limitations for on-the-job training were raised. GI term insurance was extended for another 5 years, and Civil and Spanish-American War pensions were liberalized. World War II vets with 60-percent service-connected disability and with dependents were given larger benefits, as were widows of veterans who were killed in the service. But the major problems of the veteran—housing, inadequate pensions, shortage of hospital facilities, and difficulties in obtaining business and farm credit—were left unsolved by the Congress.

The small-business man saw his problems ignored completely by the Republican Congress. The growth of monopoly and chain-store combinations were encouraged, and big-business lobbyists had a field day. No efforts were made to plug existing loopholes in the antitrust laws, or to give tax relief to small firms, or to furnish RFC credit to the small-business man. Instead, the Antitrust Division was immobilized by reductions in its operating funds, and the Office of Small Business in the Commerce Department was abolished.

The consumer saw his living standards undermined by new rent hikes resulting from the emasculation of rent control and from ever-increasing living costs which symbolize the failure of the majority party to formulate an inflation control and price roll-back program. The present economic situation, with its inflationary prices, swollen corporate profits, declining mass purchasing power, and reduced take-home pay; the increase in credit buying, and the dissipation of wartime savings, contains the seeds of a future depression. Positive Government action is required to remedy the present unfavorable wage-price-profit relationship and to cope with this threat to the people's living standards and security. But the Republican Congress chose to return to the boom-bust, depression-breeding policies of the Hoover administration. Such a do-nothing policy must eventually bring about another 1929 economic collapse, which will cause untold suffering and misery to all sections of the population.

SPECIAL INTEREST LEGISLATION FOR BIG BUSINESS

While disregarding the welfare of the common people, the record shows that the Eightieth Congress passed a mass of special interest legislation to allow big business to exploit the public and plunder the Nation's resources. Among the many examples of this kind of class legislation are the following:

First. The new rent control law, with its 15 percent rent-hike clause, gave the real estate and landlord interests over $750,000,000 in rent increases.

Second. The Reed-Bulwinkle law, exempting the railroads from the antitrust laws, permits two banking houses—J. P. Morgan and Kuhn-Loeb companies—to dictate higher freight rates.

Third. The Knutson tax law grants billions of dollars in tax hand-outs to the wealthy.

Fourth. The Portal Pay Act makes it more difficult for wage earners to collect back claims against big employers.

Fifth. The revision of the Social Security Act and the Internal Revenue Code reduce employer liability under various Federal statutes.

Sixth. Crippling of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act protects certain domestic industries to the disadvantage of the rest of the population, just as the Wool Tariff Act, which nearly blasted the Geneva trade meeting, was designed to benefit a single industry.

IMPORTANT LEGISLATION IGNORED

The record of the Eightieth Congress lies not only in what it did but also in what it did not do. Social legislation required to implement Roosevelt's economic bill of rights was killed in committee, and bills to develop our natural resources were blocked by the GOP leadership. Among its many sins of omission are the following bills which were never passed: Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, Murray-Wagner national health-insurance bill, minimum-wage bill raising wage floors from 40 to 75 cents, St. Lawrence waterway and Missouri Valley Authority, Federal aid to education, old-age pension program, extension and liberalization of the Social Security Act.

CIVIL LIBERTIES UNDER ATTACK

The Republican Party poses as a champion of civil rights, but its record is quite to the contrary. During the Eightieth Congress, civil liberties were placed in jeopardy. The House Committee on Un-American Activities has continued its campaign of stirring up suspicion, creating discord and spreading fear among the American people. Ten prominent Hollywood artists were cited for contempt for their personal political beliefs rather than overt acts, and the eminent atomic scientist, Dr. Edward Condon, was slandered and persecuted by the committee. Yet the majority party voted to double the appropriations for this Un-American Committee so that it may expand its "gestapo" activities. Furthermore, the vicious Mundt-Nixon "thought control" bill passed the House, and only strong public protest prevented it from passing the Senate.

The first peacetime military conscription law was passed during the Eightieth Congress—a measure which is contrary to American traditions, and which can militarize and regiment the Nation.

During this period when civil liberties were under attack, legislative proposals to promote and extend civil rights were completely ignored. For example, the FEPC, antilynching, and anti-poll-tax bills were killed in committee. During the debate on the draft law, Congress rejected amendments to eliminate race segregation and Jim-Crowism in the armed forces.

FOREIGN POLICY

The whole trend of American foreign relations under the first Republican Congress in 16 years was away from Franklin Roosevelt's internationalism, which was based upon the United Nations, world cooperation, and the good-neighbor policy. The GOP took many steps backward toward the semi-isolationist and "big stick" policies of previous Republican administrations.

The original Marshall plan was emasculated and its high ideals and noble purposes were distorted in favor of rebuilding Germany's war potential and to bolster political reaction in Greece and China. Crippling amendments to the reciprocal trade agreements program marked a return to the economic nationalism and high-tariff policies of the 1920's. The Stratton bill to admit 400,000 DP's into the United States was discarded in favor of an almost worthless DP bill which discriminates against Jewish and Catholic DP's, but allows former Nazi collaborators to enter the country. The United Nations was bypassed by our Government on several occasions and its decisions repudiated. Our refusal to accept the UN Palestine partition plan is a leading example.

SOME ACCOMPLISHMENTS

A limited amount of legislation was passed which will tend to promote the general welfare. Among those meritorious proposals which have become law during the two sessions of the Eightieth Congress are the following: Army-Navy merger law, State Department Voice of America program, European relief program of 1947, authorization of United States membership in International Refugee Organization, authorization of United States membership in World Health Organization, pension increases for retired railroad employees, pension increases for veterans of Civil and Spanish-American Wars, postal and Federal pay increases, 70-group Air Force, terminal leave pay bill, increase of GI subsistence and raising income limitation, REA appropriation increase, extension of farm price supports, Superior National Forest roadless area bill.

CONCLUSION

Unfortunately, the record shows that the sins of commission and omission of the Eightieth Congress far outweigh its positive accomplishments. The Republican Congress failed to formulate a people's program for full employment and economic security. It made no effort to implement Roosevelt's economic bill of rights and his four freedoms. Instead, those in control of the Eightieth Congress consistently favored special privilege and monopoly interest at the expense of the farmer, the worker, the veteran, and the small-business man.

Results of Education Program of Servicemen's Readjustment Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the fine results of the education program of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act are continually coming to my attention. In this connection I want to include the following recent article by the former Commissioner of Education John W. Studebaker, which appeared in the magazine Parade:

GI STUDENTS SHATTER TRADITIONS—THEIR INFLUENCE ON EDUCATION MAY BE FAR REACHING AND PROFOUND

(By Dr. John W. Studebaker, former United States Commissioner of Education)

America's returned veterans, swelling the enrollments in the Nation's institutions of higher education since the end of World War II, are shattering many educational traditions. Exploded is the belief that high-school credits are the only index of fitness to enter college. The old "student-faculty ratio" went up in smoke in some instances. Campus rules have been changed, methods improved, and the old fancy that only ivy-covered walls a college make has gone by the boards. Of even greater importance, perhaps, the presence of great numbers of former GI's in the Nation's colleges has helped to dissipate the popularly held fallacy that the more "customers" a school has the more profit it will make.

First, GI's have dispelled the theory that accumulation of certain high-school credits furnishes the only index of a person's fitness for college. Thousands of veterans have merited admittance to higher education classes because they have shown evidence of general educational development. Through a battery of tests they have revealed an ability to study college courses. Yet, they have not taken the number of credit hours of high-school study required of students in the past before they could receive a high-school diploma—traditionally the only pass through college portals.

Eighty-five percent of all higher education institutions now give the tests of general educational development to GI's. These tests are used as a basis for admission of veterans to college without regard to high-school credits. It is estimated that more than 100,000 veterans have been admitted to college on passing GED examinations. This type test is given in the armed forces by the United States Armed Forces Institute. More than 600 agencies have been established to give these tests throughout the country by the joint action of the American Council on Education and the respective State departments of education.

Veterans desiring to match their educational knowledge, not necessarily gained in classrooms, with that of regular high-school graduates, take five tests, each one requiring about 2 hours' time, to attain college entrance approval. The first is on correctness and effectiveness of expression. Tests two, three, and four require interpretation of literary materials, reading materials in the social sciences, and reading materials in the natural sciences. The fifth test measures general mathematical ability. At present, the GED tests are given in 46 States and the District of Columbia. About half of the States already are using the same type of testing for nonveterans. Up to this time no institution has reported such tests as unsatisfactory.

The GI has broken tradition. He has shown a new way to appraise fitness for post-high-school study in accredited colleges or universities. The trend logically might be away from requirements of stipulated types and hours of study for college entrance. But before such a trend can possibly gain national acceptance we must wait until many more high schools and colleges set up either the GED tests or similar methods of appraising an individual's fitness for advanced study.

Making good, so to speak, in college is another tradition-shattering accomplishment of GI students. It is true that veterans generally have been doing very well in their college courses, and several factors may be mentioned as being responsible. Matured through travel, disciplined, and in contact with a variety of persons and situations, the GI usually has sincerity and singleness of purpose. Perhaps the greatest factor, however, is relief from financial pressure. He has no tuition to pay because the GI bill provides for it, plus subsistence for himself and his family if he has one. But whatever it is that a GI student has that the nonveteran student does not have, the absence of worry over the financial phase of his college education seems to pay off in good grades for the veteran.

There is another question much in debate today. How many students can a college professor teach effectively? Year after year, in many institutions of higher education, the so-called student-faculty ratio had remained practically constant before the GI bill came along. Then, the tremendous influx of students into all types of colleges and universities across the Nation again shattered educational tradition. The former ratio of students to teachers had to go by the boards. The main problem was to accommodate the number of students desiring to attend the university, no matter how large the classes became. Problems naturally were presented. College presidents and staff members were compelled to change their policies. Large but not unwieldly classes have displaced small groups of students. Public address systems are making it possible for students to sit in two, or even more rooms, and still hear the same lecture. Notes are taken, and instructions are followed, yet a whole semester may go by without a student seeing his professor. This is probably an extreme example, yet it indicates how innovation and invention are helping shatter tradition—GI style.

VETERANS MAY FURNISH ANSWER

Educators sometimes disagree on the effectiveness of few or large numbers of students in classes. Problems they are having thrust upon them through the GI education program will probably help them crystallize their thinking along these lines. Perhaps the GIs themselves will help them arrive at some conclusions when final examination or term papers are presented.

I mentioned earlier the maturity of today's GI college students. It is my feeling that because of his experience and maturity, the veteran in college today usually knows what he wants and why he wants it. Cafeteria college courses of the past may be served up in the same old way in some institutions, with the instructor taking credit for the recipe found in an old cookbook. But the voluble veteran, travel-wise, and already graduated from war's school of hard knocks, comes as a hungry customer. The same old lectures dished out 20 years ago may today be adjudged rather stale and undigestible. Realistic, practical GI students have been known to express their dissatisfaction to the manager—the college president or the dean. They have helped many institutions to strengthen their college offerings and to build stronger programs in which students themselves work closely with the instructional or administrative staff to improve courses, teaching procedures, and administrative regulations.

A recent survey of selected colleges and universities by the United States Office of Education shows that students are having more opportunity to participate in classroom, campus, and community activities. The GI education program doubtless has been a major factor in stimulating such essentials of democratic education and practice as student unions, student councils, student regulation of dormitory life, housing units, and the financing of their own activities.

Gone is the day when a college was looked upon as an institution of higher education only if it had ivy-covered walls, a sprawling campus, and a proper setting and atmosphere. It is not uncommon today for a veteran to study in the same type temporary frame structure that served as his recreation hall during military service. Barracks, airplane hangars, and other temporary buildings declared surplus by the armed forces have been dismantled, removed, and reerected on college campuses to accommodate still-growing college enrollments. More than $84,000,000 was appropriated to the Federal Works Agency for this purpose in August 1946. A GI can get the word just as well in a makeshift frame structure as he can in an ivy-clad structure of long standing. It is pertinent in this connection, however, to point out that a recent survey of college and university building needs for the next decade reveals that in order to accommodate enrollments of GI's and other students anticipated by institutions of higher education by 1950, additional building space equal to that of 76 Pentagon buildings will be required. This space is equal to 265,000,000 square feet. Colleges and universities now have 341,550,000 square feet of building space throughout the country.

COLLEGES LOSING MONEY

Thus we conclude with an interesting observation on finance as it applies to GI education, which is making history in many different ways. There is a popular conception which when applied to higher education at least turns out to be a popular fallacy. This belief is that the more "customers" a college has the more money it takes in and the more profit it can report. This is not true. In fact, the contrary is true. Colleges and universities in the United States are losing money through the GI education program. Each institution of necessity is called upon to subsidize each student enrolled. Overhead charges are increased as the number of students enrolled goes higher. College treasuries have been drained. Deficit financing cannot be expected to continue for a very long period of time. There are those who see a solution in Uncle Sam not only paying what he pays now for GI education but his paying the college also which enrolls the veteran student. There are others, however, who see a solution only if foundations and endowments are increased for private institutions.

There is need to give Federal financial aid to public institutions of higher education. But greater contributions must be made by friends of privately controlled institutions which may not be eligible for Government support. Private institutions provide a very large part of the Nation's higher education to GI's and others today. They need financial help to tide them over this peak period of enrollments in colleges and universities.

Yes; the GI made history in wartime. Today, in days of peace, he is making history again in shattering many traditions which should help strengthen both American education and the American way.

Polish Women's Alliance Protests Discriminatory Postal Rates on Relief Packages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a letter that I received from the Polish Women's Alliance protesting against the discriminatory postal rates which favor Germany, Italy, and other countries as against those nations who were our allies during the war, and those people who suffered so much at the hands of the brutal Nazis. This is the result of the Republican Wherry amendment that was adopted in the Senate and approved by Senator VANDENBERG.

Three years ago if someone had prophesied that this Republican Congress would pass a law which would permit the sending of private gift relief packages to the enemy countries at a lower postal rate than for those packages that would be sent to Poland, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and others of our allies who were so brutally destroyed, we would say that such a person was crazy. Yet this has actually happened.

I hope that this fall, when Senator WHERRY, Senator VANDENBERG, and the other Republican Members of Congress return home, they will be asked to explain this discrimination.

POLISH WOMEN'S ALLIANCE OF AMERICA,
Chicago, Ill., July 15, 1948.

Hon. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI,
Congressman from Michigan, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It was with great disappointment that we read the pronouncement of the Federal postal authorities that on July 6, 1948, postal rates would be decreased on relief packages to countries in Europe and Asia to the exclusion, however, of Poland, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Albania, and Czechoslovakia.

We deem this action unjust and discriminatory, as it tends to create favoritism in certain classes. The class of citizens discriminated against pays not only the full rates but also helps through its share of the taxes to carry out the ECR program which in itself gives full assistance toward reconstruction to the countries which are also beneficiaries of relief packages from the United States covered by the 4-cent-a-pound reduction.

Our organization, the Polish Women's Alliance of America, sends through its members around 800,000 pounds a month of American goods to relatives and friends in Poland. The decreased postal rates would be a saving to us of about $3,200 a month for which additional commodities could be purchased. Thousands of other Americans would also enjoy this privilege.

Our argument is that Federal funds supplied by taxpayers all over the Nation should not be used discriminately but should be utilized for the benefit of the entire American population.

The proper approach to this situation would be that of general relief which not only would accord the benefit of a public frank to all Americans, who, through their taxes, contribute to the payment therefor, but would likewise create a reservoir of good will toward us from the people who are the beneficiaries of this private American charity.

Very truly yours,
(Miss) ADELA LAGODZINSKA,
President.

An Encouraging Omen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, as the special session of Congress was ending a distinguished Member of the Senate, with a Nation-wide reputation of successfully exposing and bringing to justice those guilty of violations of the law in his home State, arose, castigated President Truman, and suggested that impeachment might be the only remedy for the President's denial of information which might lead to the exposure of criminals and those who advocated the overthrow of our Government by force, and which is necessary to enable the Congress to legislate.

The Senator was mad—he was exasperated, he was angry—because the President had denied his committee the opportunity to obtain information which might, and probably would, have exposed enemies of our Government, those who belonged to an organization which advocated its overthrow by force, safely and profitably ensconced in his own administration.

But the President's denial of the Congress' constitutional right to information as to how their money is spent, as to whether those in the administration are guilty of illegal activities, is not new. He has been following that course for months.

Every informed individual in Washington knows that from the day Mrs. Roosevelt appeared with a group of Communists before the Dies committee, the New Deal, and more recently, the Truman administration, has been coddling and encouraging Communists who, in Federal positions, thrive on the taxpayers' dollars.

Early in January of this year a local union, which owes allegiance to an international officered by Abram Flaxer and represented by Alfred Bernstein, pulled a strike here in Washington closing 40 cafeterias to Government workers. The officers of the union, and both Flaxer and Bernstein, refused to deny under oath that they were Communists or members of the Communist Party. They have a reputation as such.

President Harry S. Truman attempted to force the employer to deal with the Communist-dominated union. Failing in his first efforts, which were by his direction carried on by the then Secretary of Labor, Judge Schwellenbach, President Truman called a meeting at the White House on February 11, 1948, and, after a discussion, one of those attending was instructed to do what he could to effect a settlement which would be acceptable to Flaxer and Bernstein.

A subcommittee of the Labor Committee, of which I had the honor to be chairman, held hearings in January, February, and March, and finally, to get at the truth of the charge that the President had, at the White House meeting, attempted to force the employer to deal with a union which was Communist-controlled through Flaxer and Bernstein, twice subpenaed the President's assistant, John R. Steelman, who was present at the meeting.

Steelman, on March 9, 1948, wrote me saying that, and I quote—

> In each instance the President directed me, in view of my duties as his assistant, not to appear before your committee.

That letter was written notwithstanding section 196 of title 2 of the United States Code, which makes it a misdemeanor for anyone—Steelman included—to refuse to appear when subpenaed by a congressional committee. Here we have a specific instance where the President advised violation of law, followed a course of action which concealed communistic activities, not in Russia, but here in Washington.

Nor has the President confined his protection to the Communists.

A parole board, appointed by an Attorney General who was appointed by the President and to whom he is responsible, in August of last year, after they had served approximately a third of their sentences, paroled five gangsters, members of the Capone mob—the "Crime syndicate" of Chicago—who had been convicted of a conspiracy to extort a million dollars from the motion-picture industry.

The President's Attorney General Tom C. Clark, a boyhood friend of one of the gangsters' attorneys, as a condition precedent to the granting of that parole, dismissed a mail fraud indictment against the same parolees, which charged that they had extorted a million dollars from workers—union men—in the picture and kindred industries.

The Chicago Tribune, the Chicago Herald-American, and other papers, called attention to the granting of the paroles. A subcommittee of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which I had the honor to be chairman, and of which Representatives FRED E. BUSBEY, MELVIN C. SNYDER, PORTER HARDY, JR., and W. J. BRYAN DORN are active members, held hearings in Chicago and in Washington.

As chairman, I wrote both the President and Attorney General Tom Clark letters requesting that information in the possession of the FBI be given the committee so that it might learn what sums, if any, had been paid for the granting of these paroles, and through what political influence and by whom that influence was exerted, in order to spring the prison gates and turn these convicts loose upon the public. Attorney General Tom Clark answered by stating that he had been instructed by the President to refuse to give the committee the requested information which the committee deemed necessary to expose those who had assisted these mobsters to escape just punishment.

And so it is that we find the President of the United States, Harry Truman, not only shielding the Communists, but permitting notorious gangsters known throughout the Nation as members of a crime syndicate, to hide behind the shield of the iron curtain thrown about them by his orders. Has the President divorced himself from the Pendergast machine?

Instead of calling a special session of Congress, the President might well have repented of his associations with the attorneys and members of the corrupt Pendergast outfit, one of whom, Paul Dillon, boasted in open hearing of his friendship with the President, of his entree to the White House.

Discouraged by the President's concealment of information which might have led to the exposure of enemies of our country who were holding Federal jobs, to the exposure of the politicians who sprung the ex-convicts from Fort Leavenworth, I introduced House Joint Resolution 342, and on May 13 last the House passed that resolution, which, had it been enacted into law, would have compelled those in executive departments, notwithstanding the President's orders, to give the Congress and its committees information to which it was entitled. That bill went to the Senate. It was pigeonholed.

But Saturday, as the special session was about to adjourn, at least one Member of that body evidently realized that, if the Congress is to function as the people's representative; if the President is to be prevented from appearing to protect the country's enemies and the crooks, something must be done.

As Senator FERGUSON stated, this issue between the Executive and the Congress should be squarely met and correctly solved. It is this: Shall the Congress, which alone has the power to create executive departments and provide the funds for their existence, be permitted to learn from them how they are functioning, how the money given them is being spent?

That information is necessary if the taxpayer and the peaceful, law-abiding citizen is to be protected in his constitutional rights. Authority to compel those in the Departments, which have been created by the Congress, to testify before its committees is necessary if the Congress is to legislate wisely, justly. The issue was stated by me on the floor of Congress on the 12th day of May, the day prior to the passage of the resolution by the House, when I said:

Mr. Chairman, House Joint Resolution 342 is an effort, by over-all legislation, to make available to every committee of the Senate and the House, under certain circumstances, information in the possession of the executive departments which is necessary to enable the Congress to carry out the duties imposed upon it by the Constitution.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly said that the Congress must have and be able to exercise the authority to obtain from the executive departments any and all information which is necessary to enable it to legislate, to ascertain the effect and the manner in which prior legislation is being administered. But President Truman does not now recognize those decisions.

It is my hope that the Senate has recognized the gravity of the situation, that it will have the courage to act. Senator FERGUSON again clearly stated the issue, as it has so many, many times been put before the Congress.

One of the most important issues before the people—perhaps the most important—in the election to be held on November 2, is whether they will elect those who will see to it that the enemies of our country, the members of our crime syndicates, are promptly and effectively brought to justice.

I most humbly call the attention of the Members of the distinguished Senate to the fact that the House has performed its duty, and, if the Senate will pass House Joint Resolution 342, or some similar act; if the people will elect an administration which will give us an Attorney General who will enforce the law; the Commies and the crooks, the gangsters who contribute fabulous sums to campaign funds, will be not on their way out, but out.

That Members of the other body are aroused and insistent that effective action be taken is an encouraging omen.

Lapel Buttons for Widows, Parents, and Next of Kin of Members of Armed Forces Who Lost Lives in World War II

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include a letter addressed to me from my very good friend and constituent, George J. Burger, of New Rochelle, N. Y.; copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Burger from K. Steen, LCDR, assistant to Director, Medals and Awards, Navy Department, Bureau of Naval Personnel, dated May 12, 1948; copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Burger from R. W. Berry, Assistant to the Secretary, Office of the Secretary of Defense, dated May 24, 1948; a letter from my colleague, the Honorable KENNETH B. KEATING, addressed to me under date of June 7, 1948; and a copy of Public Law 306, Eightieth Congress, approved August 1, 1947, to provide appropriate lapel buttons for widows, parents, and next of kin of members of the armed forces who lost their lives in the armed services of the United States in World War II.

Mr. Burger's son volunteered for service in the Navy prior to Pearl Harbor and became a naval aviator. He was a fine boy and had an enviable record. He was killed on August 18, 1941, prior to Pearl Harbor. The Navy in interpreting Public Law 306, Eightieth Congress, has, in my opinion and in the opinion of Congressman KEATING, who introduced the bill, wrongly interpreted provisions of the bill in denying to Mr. Burger the benefit of that act in the giving to him and his wife a lapel button. The Navy has ruled that that button may be given only to widows, parents, and next of kin of members of the armed forces who lost their lives between December 7, 1941, and July 25, 1947, inclusive.

I hope that the Secretary of Defense will see fit, upon further consideration, to amend the regulations above referred to.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF SMALL BUSINESS, INC.,
Washington, June 14, 1948.

Hon. RALPH A. GAMBLE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR RALPH: As I told you coming down on the bus from New York a week or two ago, when I showed you correspondence between the Navy Department and myself regarding their action in the awarding of next of kin to my late son, John, killed in the line of duty in World War II, I did not wish anything done insofar as Congress was concerned until I requested you to proceed.

I note the very fine letter that Congressman KEATING sent you under date of June 7. The city of New Rochelle unveiled a memorial on Decoration Day to those boys from their city killed in line of duty in the Second World War, including my son, John. Prior to that the American Legion saw fit to make the proper awards by certificate. Also, St. Lawrence University, Canton, N. Y., erected a permanent memorial to him in his honor as the first of the university students to lose his life in the line of duty in World War II.

In view of this I am asking you to spread on the RECORD in Congress the letter I received from the Navy Department on May 12, 1948, copy enclosed. I am also asking you to have inserted the letter that you received from Congressman Keating under date of June 7. His letter is all inclusive as to his original intention in sponsoring the resolution. I would also like to have included in the RECORD a copy of the letter I received from the office of the Secretary of Defense dated May 24, 1948.

The reason I am asking this of you is that many of my friends in Washington keep inquiring as to any action the Navy Department has taken in the case. They seem to be more upset about this than I.

For the many thousands of boys who entered the armed services during the time of the national emergency and who were killed in the line of duty, it would strike me that the least the Government could do is to recognize their supreme sacrifice.

I know many people in New Rochelle will be alarmed at this situation and, in fact, throughout the county. I trust that you see fit to make some remarks and have the enclosures appear officially in the RECORD.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE J. BURGER.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF NAVAL PERSONNEL,
Washington, D. C., May 12, 1948.

Mr. GEORGE J. BURGER,
National Federation of Small Business, Inc., Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BURGER: Your letter of April 30, 1948, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy has been referred to this Bureau for acknowledgment.

The act which established the gold-star lapel button provides that it shall be issued to widows and parents of members of the armed forces of the United States who lost their lives in the service during World War II, from December 7, 1941, to July 25, 1947, inclusive.

It is noted you state your son lost his life on August 18, 1941. In view of the above regulations, I sincerely regret that you are not eligible to receive the gold-star lapel button.

I wish to express my deepest sympathy in your bereavement. Please be assured that the Navy appreciates your son's services and his loyalty and devotion to duty during his naval career.

By direction of the Chief of Naval Personnel.

Sincerely yours,

K. STEEN,
L. C. D. R., United States Navy, Assistant to Director, Medals and Awards.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, May 24, 1948.

Mr. GEORGE J. BURGER,
National Federation of Small Business, Inc., Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BURGER: Secretary Forrestal has asked me to reply to your letter of May 19, concerning Navy personnel killed before Pearl Harbor, and the eligibility of next of kin to wear the Gold Star.

While it is regretted that those men who volunteered early and were killed before the outbreak of war cannot be rewarded in the same manner as those who lost their lives on active duty after Pearl Harbor, you may be assured that the armed services have thoroughly studied the problem. The policy now in effect is the result of careful consideration of all the factors involved. Your viewpoint is well taken, however, and I am indeed very sorry that this reply cannot be more favorable.

Sincerely yours,

R. W. BERRY,
Assistant to the Secretary.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 7, 1948.

Hon. RALPH A. GAMBLE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR RALPH: One of your constituents, Mr. George J. Burger, has called my attention to the fact that the Navy Department has interpreted the provisions of my bill, H. R. 1544, which became Public law 306, so as to deny a gold star lapel button to Mr. and Mrs. Burger who are the parents of John Burger, who enlisted in the Navy and lost his life prior to December 7, 1941, but after the time when an emergency was declared by the President. The law as worded relates to one "who lost his life in the armed service of the United States in World War II."

The office of the Secretary of Defense has informed Mr. Burger on making application for one of these buttons as follows:

"Secretary Forrestal has asked me to reply to your letter of May 19, concerning Navy personnel killed before Pearl Harbor, and the eligibility of next of kin to wear the Gold Star.

"While it is regretted that those men who volunteered early and were killed before the outbreak of war cannot be rewarded in the same manner as those who lost their lives on active duty after Pearl Harbor, you may be assured that the armed services have thoroughly studied the problem. The policy now in effect is the result of careful consideration of all the factors involved. Your viewpoint is well taken, however, and I am indeed very sorry that this reply cannot be more favorable."

The purpose of this letter is to express to you the fact that it was certainly not my intent as the author of this legislation to exclude those who patriotically offered their services to their country prior to Pearl Harbor Day but after the time when war clouds seemed to be gathering. In fact, I have indicated to Mr. Burger that I would be glad to support an amendment to the bill at the next session of Congress to cover this situation. It might be, however, that this letter, together with the committee report, would be helpful to you in securing a different ruling from the Secretary of Defense. If you undertake this mission on behalf of Mr. Burger and any others who may be similarly situated I would be happy to have you make use of this letter.

Very sincerely yours,

KENNETH B. KEATING.

[PUBLIC LAW 306—80TH CONGRESS]

(b) In addition to the gold-star lapel button furnished in subsection (a) of this section, gold-star lapel buttons shall also be furnished, upon application and the payment of an amount sufficient to cover the cost of manufacture and distribution, to the next of kin of any such deceased person, not hereinbefore designated. No such lapel button shall be sold to any person who has been furnished a lapel button under subsection (a), and not more than one button shall be sold to any one person.

SEC. 4. Whoever shall (1) wear, display on his person, or otherwise use as an insigne, any gold-star lapel button issued to another person under the provisions of this act; (2) falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or aid in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting any lapel button issued under this act; or (3) sell or bring into the United States, or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, from any foreign place, or have in his possession, any such false, forged, or counterfeited lapel button, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both.

SEC. 5. Such sums are hereby authorized to be appropriated as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

Approved August 1, 1947.

Government Expenditures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the cost of Government has reached a point where it has become a burden, not only to the individual citizen but also to the economy and business of the Nation. There is only one source of income open to the Government to meet its expenditures, namely, taxation. The larger the expenditures the heavier the taxes that must be levied to meet those expenditures. Consequently, the concern that we all have with respect to the cost of Government and the demand for a reduction in its expenditures.

The Republican Party prior to the national election of 1946 made the following pledge:

> Economy in Government spending must be achieved. Extravagant Government spending now advocated by the administration in every field can only lead to ruin. Bureaucracy, with its thirst for power and self-perpetuation, must be drastically reduced. The number of Government employees must be cut to an efficient minimum.

The Republican Congress elected in 1946 has kept that pledge.

When the Republican Congress convened in January 1947, it was faced with the tremendous job of changing the Government's fiscal affairs from a war to a peacetime basis. It was one of the most stupendous tasks that ever confronted a Congress. The Committees on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and the Senate are entitled to great credit for the admirable and painstaking job they did in bringing to the Congress appropriation bills striking out useless and wasteful expenditures.

The Congress, under the leadership of these two committees of Congress eliminated and prevented the spending of billions of dollars requested by the President in his budget recommendations.

The President submitted to Congress budget estimates calling for expenditures of $37,500,000,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948. He recommended another billion before the first session of Congress adjourned.

He submitted to the second session of the Congress an all-time high, peacetime budget calling for expenditures of nearly $40,000,000,000 for the fiscal year July 1, 1948, to June 30, 1949, and then increased that by several billions in additional recommendations.

On top of all this, he submitted a series of recommendations for new ventures in Government spending that would, if approved by the Republican Congress, have added $20,000,000,000 to annual Federal expenditures, forced higher taxes and expanded bureaucracy.

The magnitude of these figures and the increase in cost of Government that would result therefrom can be more fully understood when compared with the total Government expenditures in prewar years. As an illustration, expenditures for the fiscal year 1933 totaled $5,143,000,000; for 1934 they were $7,100,000,000; and for 1939 the Government spent $9,027,000,000. Even after the conclusion of the war the administration continued to increase expenditures for the ordinary operations of Government.

The Republican Congress not only called a halt on this trend toward increased expenditures, but reversed the upward and started a downward trend. We cut the President's fiscal 1948 budget estimates by $2,766,000,000; rescinded funds that otherwise would have been spent amounting to $442,500,000; made recoveries for the Treasury that the President did not recommend amounting to $911,700,000, and we made cuts that were effective in making savings in the operations of the previous fiscal year amounting to $359,740,563.

Thus the total savings to the Federal Treasury accomplished by the Republican Congress during its first session were approximately $4,500,000,000.

We continued the same program of cutting the President's budget and supplemental recommendations during the second session providing for the fiscal year 1949. From the regular departmental appropriation bills, deficiencies, supplementals, and so forth, the Republican Congress cut $2,741,481,291 from the amount requested by the President.

Thus, the Republican Congress has saved better than $7,000,000,000 and this does not include the rejection of the $20,000,000,000 that would have been necessary to carry out other recommendations made by the President.

These savings were made by eliminating useless and unnecessary expenditures, and not by destroying essential or necessary functions and operations of Government.

This record of financial achievement by the Republican Party is all the more noteworthy when it is realized that more than 80 percent of our national expenditures now go toward prevention of wars, foreign aid, aid to our own veterans and in liquidation of past wars. Furthermore, failures of the present and past administrations in foreign relations are reflected in higher Government expenditures for national defense and to provide aid for freedom-loving countries.

It is also important to note that the accomplishments of the Republican Congress in reducing the cost of Government and putting our fiscal affairs on a sound basis was done in the face of terrific opposition. Hence the urgency of having a Republican President who will cooperate with a Republican Congress, working together for efficiency and economy in Government.

Why Are You Paying High Prices?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, one of the most serious problems confronting this country is inflation with its resulting high prices. To stabilize the American dollar so as to bring about a sound economy, we must eradicate the real causes of inflation and not follow policies which would add fuel to the fire of inflationary pressures. We must cure the patient, not only give him palliatives to ease his symptoms. You cannot cure hemorrhage by continual blood transfusions, and you cannot cure inflation by profligate spending.

The real causes of inflation are well known. Basically they are the easy spending and credit policies of our Government with the resulting depreciation of the American dollar; and our attempt to feed and rehabilitate the world with American dollars and goods.

It does no good to cry over spilt milk but the record remains, whether justified or not, that the Government in 1933 did make available billions for public and private projects. The public debt increased by leaps and bounds. The Government did revalue and depreciate the dollar. When war came we had to win it, and to finance it we had to continue the same easy money and credit policies until our debt reached the astronomical sum of $279,000,000,000. Deficit spending was taken for granted.

But after the war instead of reversing these policies, the Democratic administration continued to spend and spend, tax and tax, elect and elect. This trend was not reversed until a Republican Congress was elected in November 1946. We ended the 1948 fiscal year by cutting $2,741,481,291.92 from the President's budget, and with a surplus in the Treasury of $8,419,469,843; at the same time reducing taxes by $4,800,000,000 and cutting the public debt $7,000,000,000. Yet we have not been able to change the fiscal policies in the executive field.

At the time of the Democratic Convention, when the President called the Congress into special session, he took credit for the high prices of farm products, high wages and prosperity but blamed the Republican Congress, which had only been in power 18 months, for the same high prices of which he was so proud. Apparently the President only sees the mote in the other fellow's eye.

At the very time he seemed so concerned about the high cost of living, he advocated spending billions upon billions on such inflationary measures as the St. Lawrence seaway, power projects, and many socialistic schemes, all of which would have created additional demands for already scarce material and consumer goods.

Marriner S. Eccles, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board—one of the President's own political appointees—put the situation aptly when he testified a few days ago before the Banking and Currency Committee, stating:

> The program—the President's—taken as a whole seems to me to be more of a political program than an economic one because there is in the program action called for which would be very inflationary.

Our memories are not so short that we cannot remember back to the days of the OPA, when Henry Wallace said that, regardless of the cost of producing the goods, wages could be raised 25 percent and it need not increase the price of the goods; nor when the President broke the Little Steel formula by increasing production costs and the price of steel. That was when the balloon went up, and there has been a vicious circle of inflationary trends ever since.

No one has forgotten the painful experiences of those days of black markets, empty shelves, lack of production, with confusion and inconsistencies almost resulting in economic chaos until Mr. Truman himself removed price controls on November 10, 1946, because, as he himself said:

> The Price Administrator has advised me that, with so much of the economy freed from price control, clinging to the rest would, in his judgment, lead to distortions in production and diversion of goods to an extent far outweighing any benefit that could be achieved.

Now he would have the Congress reestablish partial controls instead of complete controls, as some advocate, thereby having us return to the very situation which he ended as unworkable, namely, control of only a few items. How is it possible for him to ignore so completely what he said he had learned from experience, and what he called a police state?

If given the power, Mr. Truman would probably put controls on the price of meat and yet not place them on many other consumer goods. Every farmer knows that unless every item making up the cost of production is similarly controlled price control would not be successful. The cost of beef is dependent upon the price of grain, hay, and other items. No one can ask the farmer to raise beef, which takes a considerable time to produce, if he is faced with controls which might at any time change the price below the cost of production.

England never took off her controls after the war. What is the result? Yes, prices are lower, but why? In the controlled market meat is only 40 cents a pound, but the British Government pays a subsidy of 16 cents a pound. Bacon is 48 cents a pound, but there is a subsidy of 18 cents a pound. Butter is 30 cents a pound, but the subsidy is about 20 cents a pound. Eggs are 60 cents a dozen, but with a subsidy of 20 cents.

These subsidies, which would ordinarily be paid out of taxes by the British people, amount to almost one and one-half billion dollars, or about one-seventh of her national budget. Gifts from the United States of about $1,000,000,000 annually help pay for these subsidies. In other words, our taxpayers carry the load so that England may have lower prices.

But have these controlled lower prices solved England's problem? There each person can only buy 20 cents' worth of meat a week, 2 ounces of bacon a week, 3 ounces of butter, and only one egg a week. To get around such a scanty diet there are huge black markets selling these very same items at sky-high prices.

Although we raise only about 12 percent of the food of the world, we are asked to feed millions of people all over the world. The policy of our Government going into our markets and buying billions of dollars of steel, fertilizer, farm machinery, and other items in short supply has probably been the greatest single factor in keeping the inflationary spiral revolving.

We must not forget that the spending of $17,000,000,000 under the Marshall plan in the next 4 years will cost every man, woman, and child in this country $129.11. I am including a table which shows the cost of this program to the taxpayers of my district:

If existing export controls had been used in such a manner as to minimize the impact of excessively large demands by foreign countries for American goods in short supply prices of consumer goods would be much lower than they are today. But the President has not seen fit to minimize this impact.

The President has the power to cut the amount of Government spending in many fields, to limit Government purchasing in those fields where commodities are short, to limit bank credit and limit consumer credit. These and other powers which the President already has are sufficient to check inflation if he were but willing to use them.

The statement approved by the Republicans of the House of Representatives well summarizes the situation as follows:

The President's quarrel with the Eightieth Congress is not its failure to enact legislation, but a fundamental difference in Government philosophy between the President and Congress. The President would fix wages, fix prices, expand Government spending, increase Federal taxes, socialize and nationalize medicine and generally regiment the life of every family, as well as agriculture, labor, and industry, and his proposals would create an annual budget which could not be less than $60,000,000,000 which would make inflation inevitable and permanent.

In conclusion, while the President did not mention the foreign situation in his message to Congress at the special session, I feel I would be remiss if I did not call to your attention that the failure of the administration to negotiate peace has resulted in a most critical situation which forces us to spend $12,000,000,000 to $15,000,000,000 a year for defense, draft our young men, compete for critical materials which are ordinarily used for consumer goods, and remove manpower from peacetime production. This, too, has added impetus to the inflationary spiral.

As a majority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee and chairman of Subcommittee No. 1 on National Security, I fully realize the difficulty which has confronted our leaders in foreign policy, but the fact remains the job is left unfinished.

If the President, the Secretary of State, and their aides are so closely connected with the commitments, mistakes, and blunders of the past they are not able to bring about lasting peace, is it not logical to have a fresh approach to this all-important problem by choosing a President who is not under such a handicap or a victim of the bitterness of the past?

Let us get back to a strong and sound America which is necessary to world stability and peace. As has so often been said, there is nothing wrong with the United States that production and a sound fiscal policy will not correct.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, because of its application to fundamental principles of education so necessary in the world today, I hand to the Public Printer for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement made for the Senate by the Honorable GEORGE W. MALONE, United States Senator for Nevada, relative to the work of Hugh Roy Cullen, of Houston, Tex., and of Mr. Cullen's grandfather, who was a distinguished member of the Third Congress of the Republic of Texas more than 100 years ago.

The statement by Senator MALONE:

Mr. President, in these days of uncertainty and indecision in national and international affairs, it is heartening to find that more than 100 years ago a man stood before the Senate of the Republic of Texas and outlined to that body some of the fundamental truths and principles that are just as applicable today as when that man faced the legislative body of Texas on January 4, 1839.

One hundred and ten years ago the Honorable Ezekiel W. Cullen, grandfather of nationally recognized Hugh Roy Cullen, of Houston, Tex., and who at that early date was a member of the House of Representatives of the Third Congress of the Republic of Texas, said in support of an adequate school system for that important commonwealth 6 years before the admission of the Republic of Texas to the Union, that:

"Intelligence is the only true aristocracy in a Government like ours; and the improved and educated mind has, and will ever triumph over the ignorant and uneducated mind."

That fundamental truth, recognized by a great number of the Third Congress of the Republic of Texas more than a century ago, is just as true and as effective today as it was when the grandfather of Roy Cullen arose on the floor of the Texas Congress at that early date following the bloody revolution which separated the Texas area from Mexico and laid the foundation for the admission of one of the greatest States in the Union.

I have always had the greatest confidence in the understanding and reaction of the people of this Nation when they have the necessary information and evidence upon which such current decisions must ultimately be made.

The Honorable Ezekiel W. Cullen further said upon that occasion:

"The influence of education in the moral world is like light in the physical, rendering luminous what was before obscure. It opens a wide field for the exercise and improvement of all the facilities of man, and it imparts vigor and clearness to those important truths in the science of government, as well as of morals, which otherwise would be lost in the darkness of ignorance."

Mr. President, it is through men of the caliber of the Honorable Ezekiel W. Cullen, who have served this Nation through its trying periods and laid down these fundamental principles upon which the Nation has developed the highest standard of living in the world and is acknowledged to be the greatest Nation in the world today. The fundamental policies and principles upon which a great government must be founded do not change.

I, therefore, Mr. President, request unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point the address and report of the Honorable Ezekiel W. Cullen presented to the Third Congress of the Republic of Texas on January 4, 1839, which sets forth these and many other fundamental truths, policies, and principles upon which the very life of this Nation depends:

"The committee to whom was referred the subject of education as well as that part of the President's message relative to the same, have not been able to devote that time, and bestow that reflection upon the subject which the importance demands. Your committee, however, trusts that the report they now submit for your consideration will prove satisfactory; or, as has been justly remarked by the President: 'The influence of education in the moral world is like light in the physical, rendering luminous what was before obscure.' It opens a wide field for the exercise and improvement of all the facilities of man, and it imparts vigor and clearness to those important truths in the science of government, as well as of morals, which otherwise would be lost in the darkness of ignorance. Nothing is so essential in a free government as the general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence of every kind. Education confers private happiness; it gives political strength and importance; it exalts the mind, refines the passions, polishes the manners, and promotes virtue; it is the foundation of civil and religious liberty, and constitutes national strength and glory. For it has been truly said, that knowledge is power, and it is to the enlightened influences of education that England, France, and the United States of the North, are indebted for the proud and enviable station that they now occupy among the nations of the earth; and the want of education has no doubt been the principal cause of fair and lovely Greece, once the nursery of the arts and sciences, and proud Rome, once the mistress of the world, being in their present wretched and oppressed condition.

"Ignorance is the mother of vice and superstition; and with its concomitant train of evils, no doubt has rendered our enemies, the Mexicans, as weak and contemptible as they are.

"Your committee views it as one of the first and paramount duties of Congress to provide a system of general education; and although it is not in our power to carry into effect immediately a general system, yet we should lay the foundation while it is in our power, by making suitable appropriations of the public domain, and setting the same apart to enable us as soon as our situation will permit, to establish primary schools and colleges where every class can alike receive the benefits and blessings of education.

"Intelligence is the only true aristocracy in a government like ours; and the improved and educated mind has, and will ever triumph over the ignorant and uneducated mind, and our separation from Mexico, and consequent revolution, is to be attributed, in a great degree, to the difference between the Texans and the Mexicans, in their mental culture and improvement, and consequent powers and superiority.

"By referring to our Declaration of Independence, your committee finds the following, among other reasons assigned, for dissolving our connection with the Mexican Government, viz: It has failed to establish any public system of education, although possessed of almost boundless resources (the public domain). And to aggravate this just cause of grievance, it is declared to be an axiom in political science that unless a people are educated and enlightened, it is idle to expect the continuance of civil liberty, or capacity for self-government.

"Your committee, after calm and deliberate reflection on the subject, and aided by the light of history, see no cause to pollute the criminal negligence of the despotic Government of Mexico during our connection with it, in failing to appropriate the ample means at its command for the education and enlightening of its youthful population; nor are they, for a moment, disposed to question the truth of the axiom upon which this cause of grievance is based.

"Acquiescing, therefore, fully, both in the cause of complaint and in the justness of the axiom from which it arises, your committee has been led to inquire what has been done to vindicate the sincerity and consistency of the people of Texas in urging the above reasons for dissolving all connection with the hateful and intolerable despotism of Mexico, and resorting to the experiment of self-government? If we could not secure the education of our youth while connected with that people, for the want of power to control the disposition of the public domain, are we now that we have taken this very power into our own hands, so employing this domain or any portion of it, for the promotion of domestic education? Have we, as a people, acted as if we verily felt the grievance of which we complained, or the truth of the axiom, 'that unless people are educated and enlightened, it is idle to expect the continuance of civil liberty or the capacity of self-government?'

"What must an impartial world, to whom we felt bound to submit a statement of our grievances, think when they see none of that public domain, which we consider ourselves justly to have wrested from the oppressor, set apart for the purpose of educating those whose interests we complained had been grossly neglected, and see us making no practical application of one of the most certain maxims of political science? Does not a regard to the sincerity of our professions before the world—a regard to consistency and truth, as well as a regard to the interests of our country, demand the prompt attention and efficient action of Congress, in relation to this momentous subject?

"To excite such attention and to secure such action your committee begs leave further to suggest that, although not furnished with the requisite data for anything like an accurate estimate of the number of children now in the Republic, and of a suitable age to enjoy the benefits of good schools, or of the number absolutely destitute of such advantages, yet they are compelled to believe that the proportion of the latter class to the whole number now in the country is very great. Your committee sees it stated on what appears to be good authority that in the State of Pennsylvania, out of 400,000 children of a proper age to be enjoying the advantages of schools, only 250,000 are in the actual enjoyment of such privileges, i. e., three-fifths, or a little more than half the whole number of children. In the States west and southwest of Pennsylvania probably much smaller proportion are found in reach of school instruction. And all this destitution, notwithstanding the comparative age, and tranquillity, and dense population, and prosperity of those States. What then must be the absolute destitution of very much the larger portion of the youth of our country—scattered as they, and recent as has been the introduction of many of them—and exposed as they have been to all the vicissitudes attendant upon new settlements, and the struggles of our recent revolution?

"Though the present adult population of Texas perhaps contains as much, if not more, educated talent than the same amount of population in any other country so new on the face of the globe, yet this is no criterion by which to estimate the present advantages of our native and emigrating youth. But a small portion of the educated talent as yet in our country is of native cultivation. Most of what we now possess of this indispensable material has been lured hither by the new and promising field so suddenly opened for its employment by our revolution. Few of the youth born and fostered on our own soil know anything of the advantages of the school. Those now growing up without education,as well as those of the same character, who, with their parents, we soon expect to join us here, will soon be beyond the reach of such advantages unless something is done, and that speedily, to meet their wants. For be it remembered, that the disproportion between the educated and uneducated children in our country will greatly increase unless very prompt and efficient measures are devised and prosecuted to prevent that increasing disproportion. This disproportion between the adult and youthful parts of your population will decrease as the difference between married and unmarried emigrants to our country increases. And this will be the case as our country becomes secure from the fear of Indian and Mexican depredation, for we have thrown open our doors very wide. Already our invitations abound almost to the ends of the earth. We have offered a wide field to the enterprising—a noble theater to the aspiring—and a secure asylum to the oppressed. Our invitations have been heard and accepted by many. Already are the currents of emigration setting this way; not only from all parts of the United States but also from England, from Ireland and Scotland, and from Protestant Germany. Put these currents will necessarily float in upon our soil vast numbers of uneducated children to swell the numbers already here and still destitute of the means of instruction. And these children, whatever may be their character and accomplishments, will soon be invested with all the privileges and responsibilities of citizens, of voters, and of parents. But shall they receive the knowledge requisite to fit them to sustain the dignity of citizens and to meet the responsibilities of the voter and the parent? Shall they be qualified by education of the proper kind—education of the feelings as well as intellect, to take, and maintain, and carry out expanded views of their personal, social, civil, and religious obligations? Such education as shall render them competent to self-government, and for want of which they will be but the groveling slaves of their mean and despicable passions, or the pliant tools of the wily and ambitious demagogues.

"Our country has boundless sources of national wealth still dormant in its soil, its forests and its minerals. Intellectual capabilities for developing these sources, will be attracted hither by our invitations and our pledges; but what will avail all our resources of wealth without the skill to bring them out; or, if discovered and developed, what would be their advantage without the knowledge to appropriate them to their legitimate ends? And whence can this knowledge and skill be obtained but from the moral and mental discipline which alone give right reason its proper predominance over the low and vulgar passions which are cherished by ignorance.

"How is civil liberty to be continued, or self-government sustained, by those who know nothing of their principles? Upon the practicable application of the axiom already quoted does it depend whether our Government shall be a strong, and energetic, and happy, and permanent one—a praise among nations; or, a poor, weak, rickety, despicable, short-lived thing—scoffed and condemned by the enemies and pitied by the friends of rational liberty.

"And whence is this necessary moral and mental discipline, and the elementary knowledge necessary to qualify the children of freemen to appreciate the privileges and meet the responsibilities which they must soon inherit, except in institutions conducted by those who have made the human mind their study? As but few parents are qualified, or if they were are unwilling to take the time and trouble to educate their children, it follows, of course, that if their children are educated at all, it must be by means of schools of some kind.

"Now, that there will be schools as population flows into our country, and neighborhoods are formed, there can be no doubt.

"But few parents will be found who will not be willing to make some effort to have their children instructed. But what shall be the general character of our institutions of elementary instruction? Shall they be such as will really subserve the interests and answer the demands of education? Shall they be conducted by those who do not only know the value, and something of the capabilities of mind, but who also know how to elicit and give a proper direction to those capabilities? Or shall they be, as has too often and lamentably been the case, but engines for crushing the youthful intellect, and repressing every noble aspiration of the opening mind, by being entrusted to the control of ignorant or vicious teachers? The character of our schools, and the results of all future efforts in the cause of popular education, your committee thinks, will be very materially affected by the course which the present Congress shall adopt. And the vital importance to the future well-being and permanency of our Nation must be our apology for the length of our report. We wish not merely to secure some action, prompt, and liberal, and efficient, but also intelligent and substantially beneficial to our posterity and to the world. And may we not learn something, and profit something too, in relation to our duty on this subject, from what we have all seen in our parent land? And is not the present the time to profit by our experience and observation as to the defects and injurious tendencies of most of the common schools of which most of us know anything? Surely now is the time, if ever, to profit in this way—now, while our Government and our institutions are in their infancy, and society is in its forming state.

"To secure the right kind of education for our youth, it is absolutely necessary that the right kind of teachers be secured. The moral character and literary qualifications of the instructors of the children of our country are two points to which too much attention cannot be directed. The relation which teachers of youth sustain, both to the taught and their parents, and through these to the whole community, involves obligations on the teacher's part of the very highest moment. For, if the children entrusted to his care are blessed with kind, and faithful, and intelligent parents, it is of the utmost importance to the children that the parental influence be not counteracted by the moral delinquency of those who are called in to aid the parents in training their offspring for the discharge of the active duties of life. And if the children be so unfortunate as to have parents of a different character—either ignorant of parental duty or indifferent to its vigorous and persevering discharge, much more is it important that this defect should be as far as possible remedied by well-conceived and well-directed efforts of their teachers. In every case, then, it is of the first importance that instructors of children should be disposed, as well as qualified, to educate the feeling, as well as the intellect, of those committed to their care. But there is no reason to expect this from persons of indolent, or irregular, or licentious habits, or of men of mercenary impulses—by persons whose views and aims are bounded by the narrow horizon of interest or passion, seldom or never looking to, or incapable of appreciating the dignity of the vocation which brings them into contact with the germs of thoughts and feelings, in minds upon the proper culture of which the usefulness of individuals, the happiness of families, yea, the interests of nations, and the destinies of eternity, may, in many important respects, so materially depend. And yet, have we not all seen persons of this description by the recklessness or parsimony of parents and guardians of youth, thrust into this interesting and responsible vocation, or induced to seek it that they might obtain a piece of bread, and a shelter, and a coat.

"But the teaching profession needs equally to be guarded against the intrusion of ignorant and incompetent, as well as vicious aspirants. Persons who themselves have not learned to think, how shall they teach others to think? Can those who have received no severe mental training be expected to furnish such a training to others? Such teachers, or rather empirics, may keep youth about the vestibule of knowledge, but can never conduct them beyond the threshold of mental accomplishment—and it is idle to expect such a result from those who themselves have never passed the threshold. What we want, then, are teachers who will appreciate the responsibility of dealing with beings just forming their character for personal happiness and relative usefulness. Teachers who shall be qualified to train both the intellect and heart of those who are just beginning to think and feel on the momentous and complicated interests of human life—of domestic and social and civil and religious privileges and duties.

"But to secure such teachers, the teaching profession must take a more elevated stand in public estimation. Its importance to the whole community must be more generally felt and acknowledged. This will require a corresponding elevation of the standard of professional qualification in the instructors of youth. Such an elevation as will demand a degree of native talent, and a severity and extent of mental discipline and professional training on the part of the teacher of youth by no means inferior to that required by any of the learned profession. In order to do this, inducements must be held out sufficient to make the teaching profession to be sought and pursued by those whose talents and accomplishments would entitle them to a far higher rank in the public estimation than has usually been accorded to the mere schoolmaster. This cannot be done until quack schoolmasters are discountenanced—until they are regarded with the same disgust and odium which ought to drive the empiric doctor and pettifogging lawyer from every intelligent and refined community.

"Congress has thought it proper to protect the community, and the medical and legal professions, by special enactments requiring candidates for public favor to sustain satisfactory examination, or to exhibit suitable credentials before persons competent to judge of professional qualifications—and it is not so much the fault of the laws as of the guardians of those laws that so many unworthy and incompetent persons are permitted to insinuate themselves into the professional ranks, and, to tamper with the lives, and property of the people—and may not the magnitude of the interests devolving upon the instructors of our youth as reasonably demand a similar protection of our National Legislature? A board of censors for particular districts, similar to our boards of medical censors, by whom all persons wishing to engage in the business of public instruction should be closely and thoroughly examined and recommended, would seem to be one means of enhancing the reputation of the teaching profession, and of guarding the public confidence against so frequent abuse as it has been wont to suffer.

"But in order to secure teachers of competent talents and accomplishments, such as shall bring their profession up to an equality in public estimation with the legal, clerical, and medical professions, something more substantial must be granted them than legal protection, or the honor their true position in society justly demands for them. The emoluments of a vocation so laborious and responsible, and requiring talents and accomplishments, by no means more common or easily attained than those of any of the learned professions, should bear some proportion to those of any of these professions.

"Until this is the case, men who may be every way qualified for the business of instruction, if they engage in it at all, it will only be as a stepping-stone to the more lucrative of the profession. They will occupy this merely as a vantage ground while they survey the more promising fields of literary or professional pursuit; and will only occur till they can secure something to liquidate past debts, and to pay their way while preparing for some more lucrative vocation. It cannot be expected that ardent young men, whose preparatory course has been as protracted and expensive as that of others, will choose the business of instructing youth, at a salary of $800 or $1,000 annually, while the same talents and accomplishments, if devoted to the pursuit of medical or legal practice, promises from $3,000 to $4,000. With a difference of pecuniary advantages in view, it cannot be expected that those who are really qualified for the instruction of youth will continue in such a business longer than they can avoid it.

"Then it becomes a question of great interest, how shall competent teachers be suitably compensated in our country? Shall the matter be left to the ability and discretion of every neighborhood and district to furnish its own teachers; and if they are rich and liberal, or sufficiently numerous, and desire it, to find a good teacher and pay him well, or if they be few and poor, however solicitous they may be to secure good teachers for their children, yet be obliged to employ those who will serve them for small salaries; or, if they care nothing about the matter, shall nothing be done to enlighten them on the subject of parental duty, and to secure for their children, among whom may be found many capable of becoming ornaments to their Nation and blessings to their kind, and the requisite instrumentalities for involving and training their latent capabilities?

"Or shall liberal appropriations of the public means be secured to every neighborhood, which, together with what the neighborhood may be able to furnish, may be sufficient to secure the services of competent teachers for all the neighborhoods in our Republic?

"Or shall liberal appropriations to a number of the most eligible and accessible points secure the establishment of suitable literary institutions, at which either a primary or more extensive education may be furnished at as little expense as possible to all classes of the community who may be at all inclined to avail themselves of the benefits of such institutions?

"For our country, this latter plan seems the most desirable. Owing to the scattered condition of our population, but few neighborhoods can afford, unassisted, to sustain a well-qualified teacher; of course many children must either be sent from home or remain destitute of all the advantages of schools.

"But let such schools be established as the wants of the country may require, at suitable points where boarding can be furnished cheap, and tuition gratis, to those who may be unable to pay both for board and tuition. Let great care be taken in the selection of locations, and of teachers, and of superintendents. Let these be well paid by the public, and the public will not lose by educating its own youth at home, where it can be done, if the proper exertions are made.

"Your committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following bill.

"E. W. CULLEN, Chairman."

Mr. President, the foundation laid by the Honorable Ezekiel W. Cullen more than a century ago in the Republic of Texas has been ably carried forward by Mr. Hugh Roy Cullen and his wife Lillie, of Houston, Tex., through gifts and contributions of more than $100,000,000 to religious and educational institutions, for the construction of hospitals, colleges of medicine, and general educational purposes.

Mr. Cullen is a member of the Board of Regents of the University of Houston—and in addition matched dollar for dollar the amount contributed by the colored people of Houston, Tex., for a university devoted entirely to their education. This university is now a part of the University of Texas.

They have devoted their lives to the development of the State of Texas and the Nation, in the interest of creating employment and business opportunities for the youth of our country.

Mr. President, this Nation cannot fail to continue to grow and expand its influence for good throughout the world when the third generation of Americans, as represented by the Roy Cullens of Houston, Tex., continue to carry on.

Mr. Ezekiel Cullen laid the foundation in his report for the school system in the Republic of Texas—and Mr. Hugh Roy Cullen, his grandson, is continuing the work 110 years later.

SUMMARY OF WORK AND REMARKS BY SENATOR GEORGE W. MALONE

The second session of the Eightieth Congress ended on June 20, 1948. At this time I want to give a short summary of my contribution to the legislative work of this Congress and outline the main reasons for the stand I have taken on the major issues. This summary is based on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in which all debates as well as pertinent speeches and letters are reprinted.

ON THE $6,000,000,000 BUDGET CUT

On February 26, 1947, I took the floor to announce my wholehearted support for the attempt to reduce the Federal budget by $6,000,000,000. I also voiced my support for the bill, introduced by the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. ROBERTSON, proposing an independent audit of all the agencies of the Federal Government for the last 14 years. I cited as an example of the expansion of the Federal budget the appropriations for the Department of Commerce, which had amounted to less than $45,000,000 in 1939, and had risen in the intervening years to the point where the request for the fiscal year 1947–48 amounted to $199,000,000. In that speech I made the following statement:

"It is my present opinion that such a reduction as is proposed can be made without impairing or injuring in any way the proper support of the armed services and efficient peacetime budget for the operation of the United States Government."

ON THE PORTAL-TO-PORTAL PAY BILL (H. R. 2157)

On March 21, I took the floor to voice my support for the portal-to-portal pay bill, relieving employers of the suits for back pay by placing a 2-year limit on the applicability of such suits. In support of the bill, I made the following statement:

"Mr. President, to claim back pay for time expended not previously considered compensable by either employee or employer is so patently not in the public interest as almost to preclude serious discussion."

This bill was later enacted into law and prevented very serious economic dislocations which might have arisen due to the billions of dollars which might have been payable for the accumulated portal-to-portal pay over a period of many years.

ON THE AMENDMENT TO THE ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1946

On March 25, 1947, I spoke on the floor of the Senate on the amendment to the Atomic Energy Act of 1946. This amendment proposed to displace the present Atomic Energy Commission and establish an Atomic Energy Control Board, consisting of the Secretary of State as chairman, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, plus two members to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

This amendment, which was introduced by Senator ECTON for himself and Senators MCCARTHY, OVERTON, THOMAS, and myself, was referred to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. The committee took no action.

I supported this amendment in the belief that the danger of Communist expansion which we were trying to halt through our Greek-Turkish aid program required the Secretary of State to be a more important figure in the control of atomic energy. In this speech I analyzed our program of "containing" Russia, and I pointed out certain fallacies and dangers inherent in this approach:

"Our own generation has experienced two devastating world wars. Our people were never properly informed of the approach of either of them, or of the great principle and policy upon which the decision to enter them was made.

"This time they have a right to know. They have the right to be fully and completely informed of not only the great overall plan of which our entry into Greece and Turkey is a part, but they have a right to know what the alternative to such a plan might be, what would be the consequences of our refusal to enter into the European and Asiatic internal conflicts which have continued periodically throughout all recorded history.

"An argument used against the containment program is that it will drain us of human resources, mental energies, and most of our physical resources of mine, forest, and field; and that we are playing into the hands of the Russians by exhausting ourselves.

"We want peace and we are ready to sacrifice for peace. The trouble seems to be that the Russians, truly Asiatics, are fired with a fanatic zealousness for communism which to them is religion. They think it is their destiny to convert the future world to the system of cooperative living and the elimination of competition."

To keep that peace, and to keep America strong, I advocated putting into the hands of the Secretary of State, the control of atomic energy, since this is the greatest national security and peace-enforcement weapon of all time.

ON THE NOMINATION OF DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

I participated in the very extensive debate on the nomination of David E. Lilienthal to the Atomic Energy Commission. I based my opposition to his appointment on the fact that no investigation of the nominee had been requested of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I cited the Atomic Energy Act, which required such investigation. In this connection I stated:

"It comes then as a considerable surprise to find that no Federal Bureau of Investigation report has ever been ordered, or made, in the case of any of the candidates for appointment to the Atomic Energy Commission, including Mr. Lilienthal. Since this Commission could become the most powerful body in the world, within a matter of months or years, such investigation and clearance would seem to be doubly important."

I threw my support to the motion of Senator BRICKER, of Ohio, to recommit the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal. This motion was later defeated.

ON GREEK-TURKISH AID (S. 938)

During the debate on Greek-Turkish aid, on April 21, 1947, I warned the country that it would be dangerous to embark on a policy which might lead us into war and which might lead to further huge expenditures.

"It is not the cost of the first skirmish which must be considered, but the total preparations which must, inevitably, be involved."

I pointed out the cost of aid to Greece up to date, including the UNRRA help, loans, and so forth. In our foreign policy, so I suggested, we are propping up the British Empire and supporting the totalitarian regime of Greece, a regime which does not have the confidence of the Greek people.

"If, in the alleged name of freedom, the United States is to directly associate itself with such destructive processes as those to which I am calling attention, we shall earn, not the love and fealty of these people, but their hatred. We shall then be in the unenviable position of attempting to force the allegiance of these peoples to our common cause at the point of guns. The British are discovering how ineffective that is in India, Egypt, Palestine, and elsewhere. We shall undergo an identical experience."

"I do not claim for a moment that we should sit inert in a world beset with difficulty and danger. I only claim that what we are doing is either too little or too much, that we have no right to back fascist dynasties against the wishes of the peoples concerned, and that, if it is our intention to operate independently of the moral principles upon which our Nation was founded, we shall lose the support of the peoples of the world who now are looking to us for leadership out of this great morass."

"I claim that it will be necessary to make a general master plan in support of our security, in which our objectives will be made really clear, the total expenditures estimated, and the pathway down which the American people are to travel completely shown."

I sounded the warning that we had been forced into two world wars without any clear idea of where we were going:

"Now is the time to stop, look, and listen; and if we are going into a third world war, let our action be taken after full consideration and understanding that it is in furtherance of an American policy formulated by Americans and for Americans."

ON THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT ACT (S. 1126)

Another important issue which concerned our country was the enactment of the Labor-Management Act. On May 9, 1947, I offered an amendment to the Federal Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 which would preserve the balance of collective bargaining power between employers and employees. This amendment required the employer to accept and establish a union shop if three-fourths of the employees voted for the establishment of a union shop. In proposing the amendment I said:

"I am ready to vote for legislation which will regulate employees in the same way that employers are regulated. I shall not vote to destroy either one of them. That is my reason for offering the amendment."

The amendment was extensively debated and finally rejected. Believing, as I did, in the preservation of balance between labor and management, I voted against passage of the bill.

The following are excerpts from the Senate debate on May 9, 1947:

"Mr. MALONE. We are making it unlawful for the employer to agree with the employees on a closed shop.

"Diverting at this point, if the Senator [TAFT] will permit me further to comment, many employers, especially in the newspaper business, like the closed shop. Many editors in my State like the closed shop, because when they ask for a certain type of worker they can obtain a qualified worker without any further conversation.

"I will not object to the outlawing of the closed shop if provision is made for the preservation of the collective-bargaining power through the union shop.

"The point on which I heartily disagree with the Senator from Ohio is this: When we leave the question open for bargaining—and naturally there is no reason for leaving it open unless it is thought that some employers would not want it—I do not know the employees in the Senator's State, but in my area they will still get the union shop, even though we shall again have strikes, picket lines, rioting, and everything else we have gone through in the past 10 or 15 years. Men will quit their jobs and walk out when refused the union shop under this legislation, and they will ultimately get the union shop. So long as we know that they will ultimately get it, as the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] has so ably said, why not eliminate that particular bone of contention and concentrate on things which we think are necessary subject for collective bargaining, namely, wages, working conditions, and other important matters?

"Mr. REVERCOMB. That is not interfered with by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada. His amendment simply provides, and I think it is entirely sound, that if three-fourths of the employees desire a union shop—and a union shop is recognized upon a majority vote in the bill as it is now written—that they shall have it. If I may say it again, by providing for such a decision by the employees we will remove one of the greatest causes of contention between the employer and the employees. Such a provision will not interfere with collective bargaining. Once the men vote to have their union shop, they proceed then with collective bargaining upon another issue. It seems to me that if we are to have peaceful relations the most definite way is to define the rights of both sides and to remove from contention most of the issues which may arise.

"As I previously stated, the amendment of the able Senator from Nevada appeals to me as one which would remove a great contention in collective bargaining between the employer and the employees; and it would not do a wrong to the employer when it permits the employees, through a three-fourths vote, to say, 'We want a union shop.' * * *

"It seems to me, as a practical matter, that if three-fourths of the employees of a plant want a union shop they will either get a union shop or there will be a serious dispute and labor clash. Why not provide, if three-fourths of them want it, that they may have a union shop, and remove the issue completely between employer and employees? That is the feature of the amendment which appeals to me.

"Mr. MALONE. If we go far enough to say to free people in America, including both employees and employers, "If you want a closed shop you cannot have it," I agree with the Senator that we should go one step further and provide a fair opportunity for a fair substitute in which necessary protection and collective bargaining power can be provided and preserved.

"I point out to the able Senator that what he is doing is simply trading the closed shop for an opportunity to bargain for something which, from the employees' standpoint, never could be a satisfactory substitute. But I am willing to vote for it if a proper substitute through the union shop can be provided, because I think it will remove the criticism that qualified workers have in the past been prevented from obtaining jobs. But under the present legislation we simply provide that the employer may hire anyone he wishes to hire and could continuously feed nonunion employees into a plant and gradually get rid of union employees, such as when a union man quit his job, or there was reason for letting him go, the new employee would not need to join the union. In a very short time there would be no union. So I repeat what I said when I offered the amendment, that I will vote for any just regulation of unions and corporations alike, but I will not vote to destroy either."

In an address on July 26, 1947, included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I said:

"The Taft-Hartley labor legislation is wrong in principle. In the first place, the Government should not be in the business of regulating either the employer or the employees beyond seeing that they obey the laws of the land as everybody else is required to do. The principle of the Wagner Act was wrong in the first place, and the mere fact that we passed another act of a slightly different character on the same principle does not make it right. Under the principle of Federal board control the swing of the pendulum could continue to vibrate with the political philosophy and fortunes of the party in power for generations. It should be decided upon basic principles and then left alone.

"The Taft-Hartley labor act, together with the Wagner Act, should be repealed. There should be no Government labor boards with authority to direct either the employer or the employees to do anything.

"In their place there should be enacted a simple statement of national policy which in effect would lay down the principle that:

"Employees and employers alike shall have the right to self-organization, to form, to join, or assist organizations to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection.

"The Federal Government could very well continue the principle of the conciliation board—having no authority whatsoever, except to cooperate with both parties to a dispute—and then only when invited to sit in—and perhaps to hold hearings and make public their findings. Any necessary authority should be vested in the States. They alone have the power to keep the peace.

"The maintenance of free collective bargaining and the integrity of contracts between employers and employees is the only solution for that age-old problem between the man who hires the work done and the man who works with his hands. And that should be the scope of the Government statutes."

When the question of overriding the President's veto of the bill arose I took the floor again (June 23, 1947) and gave the reasons for my stand:

"Mr. President, the solution, then, does not lie in superimposing another layer of complicated Federal laws and machinery on top of an act which itself, for the most part, should be repealed. The solution lies in the defeat of the administration in 1948, so that the Government may assume, in relation to worker-management disagreements, the role of making the rules and fairly administering them.

"I am therefore constrained to make my position crystal clear. I am not prolabor or promanagement. I am pro-United States. As I have repeatedly stated, I will vote to regulate both the worker's bargaining unit and management, but I will not vote to break or unduly weaken either one.

"Mr. President, I believe in less Government meddling, not more, as applied to worker-management relations and all other Government functions in this Nation. It is time we stopped the labor-management pendulum from swinging back and forth and determine where that old dong ought to hang."

I voted not to override the President's veto of the bill, but it was passed again with a two-thirds majority.

ON THE ITALIAN PEACE TREATY

During the debate on the ratification of the peace treaty with Italy, I expressed my objections (June 5, 1947) to ratification of that document on the grounds that its provisions would throw the Italian Nation into the hands of Russia, and that the reparations granted to Russia and its satellites would bring slavery to hundreds of thousands of Italian workers laboring to process the goods for Russia and its satellite nations. We would have to assume the burden of supporting them while they labored with supplying Russia and other iron-curtain countries with $360,000,000 of reparations through their work of processing raw materials. In that vein, I made the following statement:

"Italy is not self-supporting but is in chaos, and this treaty furthers the chaos. Moreover, since the United States has participated in a huge loan to Italy this year, we are in the neat position of underwriting these reparations to be furnished to the Soviet Government, including the war material already referred to. It is also of interest, in reference to this treaty, to realize that we have broken our word to the Italians, who were assured by both Churchill and Roosevelt that they would not be subject to any of these humiliations and punitive actions. On the liberation of Rome, June 5, 1944, Roosevelt asserted the right of a free Italy opposed to fascism to enter the community of nations on equal terms."

AMOUNT OF ITALIAN LABOR REQUIRED AS REPARATIONS IN PEACE TREATY

"Article 74 of the pending treaty provides that Italy shall pay the Soviet Union and the states of Albania, Ethiopia, Greece, and Yugoslavia a total of $360,000,000 in reparations during a period of 7 years. These reparations are to be paid out of Italy's current production through the countries concerned furnishing the raw materials and Italian wage earners furnishing labor valued at $360,000,000 without pay or subsistence of any kind. * * *

"Mr. President, the pending Italian treaty, including the provision for the payment by Italy of $360,000,000 to four foreign nations as reparations, definitely sets a 7-year slave-labor policy for the Italian Nation, and I shall show that it could cost this Government $1,000,000,000 during that period to support the 198,000 Italian laborers who could be required in discharging Italy's obligations. In addition, the necessary processing of raw materials to fulfill the obligations undertaken through the approval of this treaty could well require more than 18,000 highly paid Russian foremen to supervise the 7 years' work, and their salaries could be deducted from the increased value of the manufactured products. Thus, the amount of required work to discharge the reparations obligations could well be greatly increased.

"Mr. President, this was the way the pyramids were built. In my humble opinion, the United States of America cannot afford to be a party to such an agreement. Certainly the slave-labor provisions of this treaty have little resemblance to the ringing slogans 'making the world safe for democracy' and 'the four freedoms' coined for World Wars I and II."

In the course of the debate I gave a careful analysis of the cost to this country of agreeing to the terms of peace, with the huge reparations to go to the four nations behind the iron curtain.

ON THE PRESIDENT'S VETO OF THE TAX-REDUCTION BILL

On the the question of overriding the President's veto of the tax-reduction bill (H. R. 3950) I went on record as follows (July 18, 1947):

"If we, by excessive taxation, remove the incentive for venture capital to exert its expanding influence on our economy, we are killing the goose that lays the golden eggs—we are throttling the very thing we are striving to nourish.

"We are justly proud of our productive capacity, but we must not let this pride blind us in realizing from whence it comes.

"Within our large businesses and corporations the supply of capital is provided by the thousands upon thousands of small investors who have bought a few shares of stock—accepting a degree of risk comparable to the expected gain.

"I do not suggest such a tax cut without full realization of the economic necessity of also reducing the Federal debt, maintaining a strong foreign policy, providing for an adequate national defense, and for the necessary cost of Government. The tax cut here proposed will, in my opinion act as a stimulant—not a deterrent—to the objectives. The urgency of a tax cut at this time is predicated on the very nature of our free-enterprise system."

The tax cut did not become effective, however, since less than two-thirds of the Senators voted to override the President's veto.

On March 22, 1948, we passed H. R. 4790—our third tax-reduction bill for the Eightieth session—this time over the veto of the President of the United States.

An excerpt from my debate on the tax bill at the time of its passage follows:

"Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, the long-established administration tax policy of siphoning off wage and income increases through taxes for the alleged purpose of preventing inflation has effectively dried up the sources of risk capital, but has notoriously failed to prevent inflation. This policy, if followed to its logical conclusion, means that ultimately all capital expenditure must come from Government sources, since no private capital would be available for such investments.

"It is the same general policy adopted by the administration in regard to the so-called strategic and critical minerals and materials production—a policy that we are a 'have not' nation, and must import such minerals and materials from the low-wage foreign countries. Then the administration proceeds to adopt a selective free-trade policy, through the Reciprocal Trade Act, thereby putting our high-wage, high-living-standard workers in direct competition with the low-wage, low-living-standard European and Asiatic workers, and bringing about the very scarcity which the administration predicted in the first place.

"The chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, Mr. Emil Schram, has said that the market for risk securities has dried up. That has been caused by the very policies instituted to siphon off the wage increases and the other increases in income, the money so obtained to be used, presumably, for increased expenditures for our own Government, and for foreign expenditures. In the last few years, the administration seems to have had a policy, culminating notably in the Marshall plan, to make up the trade-balance deficits of all the countries of Europe. If we do that, we shall, presumably also have to make up the trade-balance deficits of all the other countries of the world—not only their trade-balance deficits with us, but their trade-balance deficits arising from other sources. If these policies continue, it seems to me there is no question but that eventually we shall have to appropriate money for business purposes in this country, just as is being done today in England and elsewhere. In other words, such a policy will bring about the very thing that those responsible for the policy, say they are trying to prevent.

"Furthermore, if we are setting a precedent as admitted by a spokesman for the Marshall plan—of making up the trade-balance deficits from all sources of all of the European countries each year—we will then have to include the Asiatic countries—and permanently adopt the selective free-trade policy through the Reciprocal Trade Act—and going into a world trade organization with 57 nations, each with one vote, with the announced purpose of dividing the production and consumption of the world—then we will be one economic world and financing it all.

"Mr. President, I am supporting this bill and only wish that time had been available to reorganize the entire structure of the legislation to provide risk capital and an incentive for such investments.

"It is well known that mining, for example, is a speculative enterprise; then when risk capital is not available and our high-wage living standard workers are put into competition with the low-wage European and Asiatic countries, then the result is the drying up of the mines of this Nation. About 90 percent of the operating mines have closed for these reasons."

THE WORK OF THE NATIONAL RESOURCES ECONOMIC SUBCOMMITTEE

On July 26, 1947, I had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a preliminary statement of the work of the National Resources Economic Subcommittee. This statement gave an outline of the work accomplished to date. This committee was created in February of 1947 to "make a full and complete study and investigation of the factors affecting minerals, fuels, forestry, fisheries, and reclamation projects," to report the results of its study, and to make recommendations. The United States Department of the Interior made an inventory of the United States minerals position early in 1944. This study was presented to the committee and became a part of the published hearings.

"The committee is collecting all available data to show the relative self-sufficiency of the United States in metals and minerals, the domestic compared with the foreign costs of production of these minerals, and a study of the reasons for the differences in cost."

The preliminary statement treated of the results of the hearings and the position of the United States in regard to certain resources. The committee, of which I am chairman, will hold further hearings on the factors affecting the production of minerals, agriculture, fuels, forestry, and fishery products, which include reciprocal trade treaties, tariffs, subsidies, quotas, empire preference rates, and the manipulation of foreign currencies, including the sterling bloc.

The committee has already published the Minerals Position of the United States, and is now preparing, through hearings and research, a report on the Fuels Position of the United States, which should be published early in 1949.

ON INTERIM AID FOR FRANCE, ITALY, AUSTRIA (S. 1774)

During the prolonged debate (November 26, 28, December 1, 1947) on interim aid to France, Austria, and Italy, I joined with seven other Senators in proposing an amendment which, in the main, provided for the sending of relief supplies to the recipient countries and to make the supplies available to the people without charge. I gave examples of the abuse which was going on with the sale of American relief goods in the recipient countries, when the respective governments were selling the goods under the provision to deposit the receipts in a revolving fund.

Another of the provisions of the amendment was to cut the appropriations from $597,000,000 to $400,000,000, and at this time I had the following to say:

"The reasons for the amendment are clear. There are two things we wish to do: First, prevent the goods from being turned into money by the recipient countries and used for the support of the governments and persons currently in power; and second, we wish to prevent the goods from going immediately into the black markets, white markets, free markets, or whatever they may be called, with the result that hungry people who are working for the current wage rates cannot purchase them, and certainly the unemployed cannot secure them. We provide for a reduction of the $597,000,000 appropriation to $400,000,000. We believe $400,000,00 to be sufficient."

This amendment was not passed. Then I propose to force the recipient countries to deposit their own currencies, received from the sale of United States supplies to their peoples, in the United States Treasury. This suggestion, however, was not accepted either. In my arguments I pointed out how untenable the financial position of the recipient countries was, due to their policy of artificial valuation.

Despite the fact that I did not like the provisions of this bill, I voted for it, in order to help alleviate any possible distress and hunger in the three European countries.

ON THE EUROPEAN RECOVERY PROGRAM (H. R. 4840)

During the several days' debate on the Marshall plan, in early March of 1948, I took issue with it on various counts. I pointed out the lack of a definite foreign policy and advocated a return to the Monroe Doctrine: to define the areas and countries of the world which were essential to our security to protect. Then I went on to show that we were leading to bankruptcy by taking on ourselves to balance the total payments deficit of the Marshall-plan countries.

Nations like England and France, whose recovery has gone beyond the industrial production of prewar days, were to be allowed to finance a tremendous industrial expansion at our cost. A repayment of the money lent to the Marshall-plan countries would be impossible through the imports of strategic minerals and raw materials without dealing our own domestic industries a death blow. I attacked the fuzzy thinking which led to the feeding of the hungry and the defense of this country all in one program. Those two issues are not part of the same problem and should be considered separately. I pointed out that the proposal of the Joint Congressional Air Policy Board for 35,000 planes would just cost the amount of the Marshall-aid program with some funds left over to aid the hungry people over the next winter. The whole plan should be put on a loan basis in the form of a Reconstruction Corporation loan with strict supervision and investigation. In the proposed program we would be financing the nationalization of foreign industries.

I further introduced data showing the conditions of foreign trade of the European countries with the nations behind the iron curtain. Specifically, I called attention to the fact that Great Britain's trade agreements with Russia called for considerable exports of iron and steel products, war surpluses, and fabricated goods. Goods, which, of course, are in short supply in Europe, are thus going to Soviet Russia, and perhaps strengthening her war machine.

Excerpts from my statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 8, 1948, follow:

"PEACE AND SAFETY OF THE UNITED STATES

"1. The peace and safety of this Nation is seriously threatened, through the complete absence of a definite foreign policy, telling our own people and the nations of the world what we consider will threaten our ultimate peace and safety, and the complete absence of a military organization spearheaded by an air corps to enforce our pronouncement.

"2. The basic subject of foreign policy has never been discussed with the American people, through two world wars, and now the Marshall plan is in the same category. The basic subject at issue (as it was in 1823 when the Monroe Doctrine was established to protect South America and the Western Hemisphere from encroachment from the European empire-minded nations) is what areas—and naming the nations in the European and Middle East countries, including Asia and the South Seas—is it necessary for us to currently protect for our own ultimate safety? Until this decision is made no plan to make it effective can be intelligently discussed.

"I challenge the State Department to name the nations of the 56 member countries of the United Nations Organization, whose integrity we must currently protect for our own ultimate safety, to tell the world and the American people the truth, so that any empire-minded nations may be apprised of our intentions and thus avoid what could well develop into a third devastating world war, and that our own people may prepare for their own defense, through rebuilding our military organization spearheaded by an air corps that could keep any other nation on the ground in the event of war.

"HUNGRY PEOPLE — COMMUNISM — REHABILITATION OF INDUSTRY

"3. It is impossible to consider the feeding of hungry people—the stopping of communism—and the rehabilitation of industry as one subject. We only confuse ourselves.

"As a result we mix our emotions with the facts and become unwilling victims of the greatest propaganda machine ever established in Washington; let us take them one at a time:

"(a) Feeding emergency hungry people of Europe or of any other area is a matter of charity and must be so considered apart from other considerations. The Congress of the United States has appropriated nearly $1,500,000,000 during the last 12 months for that purpose alone, and has appropriated $24,000,000,000 and handed it to the nations of the world without hope of repayment since the close of World War II in 1945.

"The December 1946 appropriation of $597,000,000 is expected to last into March of this year; and the Congress is ready to consider further reasonable gifts for food, until Europe completes its third crop, to the extent that our own resources will withstand the impact without further inflation.

"(b) Stopping communism through protesting the integrity of the nations of the world that we decide, after full discussion and study, we must currently protect for our own ultimate safety, is a matter of our own integrity and frankness with our own citizens—and with the nations of the world.

"If we should decide, after full consideration of our experience through two world wars—and our improved methods of defense and offense—that a threat to the integrity of any member nation of the United Nations Organization, by any other nation would constitute a threat to our ultimate safety—then President Monroe's exact words could be utilized in announcing an extension of the established Monroe Doctrine, leaving out any reference to the Western Hemisphere, and say, in effect, to the world and to the American people that—

" 'We owe it therefore to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system as dangerous to our peace and safety.'

"We should then build at once a military force, spearheaded by an air corps that would bear silent evidence to all concerned that we were ready and able to enforce the extended dectrine, just as we have enforced the original Monroe Doctrine covering the western hemisphere for more than 125 years, and which kept us out of a major war for more than 75 years."

My opposition to the Marshall plan was also based on figures showing that $17,000,000,000 proposed was more than the total assessed valuation of the 11 Western States; furthermore, I submitted figures indicating that the ERP nations had assets in this country amounting to almost as much as the 4-year figure for the whole program. We were supporting socialist experiments and we could not expect repayment of a single cent of the money expended for the ERP.

In summing up my arguments against enactment of the ERP I said:

"Truth and integrity are the commodities badly needed in the world today. If the United Nations, our State Department, and the Congress of the United States, would bend their efforts toward reestablishing the integrity of private investments by the other 56 member nations of the United Nations, then many of the pressing industrial problems would be automatically solved. The United Nations is dead at this time, but if we should extend the Monroe Doctrine to include the areas and nations which we must currently protect for our own ultimate safety, then we would immediately revive that organization."

ON FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION (S. 472)

During the debate on the bill providing Federal assistance to States and Territories in financing a minimum education program, on April 1, 1948, I took the floor of the Senate in opposition to passage of the bill. My arguments were based on several points.

"Mr. President, I am in accord with the thought that the Federal Government must offer cooperation and assistance in the field of education, but I do not believe the manner in which such cooperation is to be extended through the pending legislation has been thoroughly explored, and I doubt the advisability of adopting the presently proposed legislation."

The following editorial is from the April 7 issue of the Carson City (Nev.) Appeal, Carson City, Nev.; Arthur N. Suverkrup, editor and publisher:

"CONGRATULATIONS FOR MALONE

"All Nevadans who believe the fundamentals of the republican form of government guaranteed by the Constitution of these United States certainly should applaud the action of the State's junior United States Senator, GEORGE W. MALONE.

"Last week Senator MALONE followed the only course consistent with his oath of office and with the fundamentals of good government and continued freedom when he cast his vote against a measure which would result in federalized education.

"Of course, the measure against which Senator MALONE voted was disguised so that it purported to be a measure for aid to the schools.

"The very last place where Federal usurpation of the rights of the individual and of the State should strike is in the schools.

"If the schools of the Nation are to remain the bulwark of these United States against totalitarianism, they must be kept ever free of the most faint vestige of Federal domination.

"Senator MALONE, in opposing this vicious so-called aid measure, rightfully called attention to what the Supreme Court of the Nation has to say on the subject of what Federal aid actually means.

"The Court, as quoted by Nevada's champion of State rights, and individual rights, said:

" 'It is consistent with due process for the Government to regulate that which it subsidizes.'

"That sums up the entire matter so that it can readily be understood. It shows the pitfalls which await the Nation if those who constantly harp for Federal so-called aid to the schools are to have their way.

"Nothing could be more dangerous to a free nation than to have its educational program directed and controlled by the whims and fancies of bureaucrats, many of whom in recent years have openly embraced foreign ideologies.

"Consider for a moment the implications if by some remote chance of an unkind fate the Nation should be saddled with the shame of a President of the caliber of Henry Wallace with his twisted and un-American ideas.

"Control of the schools must be retained as nearly as possible at the individual level. The residents of each and every community are better able to judge the educational needs of their children than anyone else.

"State aid for the schools with State domination of the curriculum is bad enough. It is unthinkable that Federal domination will be permitted.

"Surely Nevada has reason to be proud of Senator MALONE's stand on this issue.

"Other grounds upon which Senator MALONE based his opposition to the federalization of the schools are equally sound.

"He points out that there has not been 'enough consideration given such legislation as to ways and means of assisting the individual school districts without setting a precedent where undue Federal influence might ultimately be exerted in the State educational field.'

"Surely that statement reveals clear thinking in the best tradition of a free nation.

"The Senator then points out that, 'while all of the States were to receive benefits and all of the States were to pay into the fund, the best information indicated that our own State would contribute annually $135,000 more than it received.'

"That, too, is a most logical argument.

"It could have been carried even further by pointing out that never does any State receive the full benefit of taxes paid into the Federal Treasury which supposedly are returned in the form of grants, subsidies, or aid items.

"Administration eats up much of the income.

"The tax moneys which Nevada would pay toward the Federal subsidization program could be expended with greater benefit to the school children of Nevada if they were paid in the form of local, county, or State taxes. There would be less waste through bureaucratic maneuverings.

"That $135,000 annual loss which Nevada would accept under the plan would go a long way toward providing better education for the State's children—a great deal more benefit than would accrue even if the entire sum returned to Nevada.

"To return to Senator MALONE's well-thought-out statement in opposition to the subsidization plan he points out that 'several suggestions have been made for Federal participation that would be entirely separated from direct appropriation for the educational fund. One coming from Nevada's own Earl Wooster, superintendent of schools in Reno, suggests a 50–50 matching of funds in the construction of school buildings where the Federal participation would cease when the building was completed and would set no precedent for funds going directly into the educational system.'

"All must admit there exists in many parts of the Nation, and even in Nevada, an urgent need for new school construction. Many persons feel such construction at this time is uneconomic because of inflated building costs. But it is a need which must be met.

"Federal grants for construction which would cease when construction was completed would give little room for centralized domination of curriculums. But it must be admitted it would be an opening wedge and, therefore, is not desirable.

"As the Senator says, 'The danger, of course, in any continuous participation through Federal funds direct into the educational system, would be a greater and greater dependence upon those funds and an acceptance later of Federal direction of their expenditure.'

"Surely the freedom-loving, State's-right-minded people of Nevada must agree with Senator MALONE in every phase of his opposition.

"Nevada's schools and the schools of each and every community must be kept public and must be kept free of insidious encroachment."

For one thing, I voiced my fear that the presently contemplated appropriations for aid in education would finally lead to huge expenditures in this field, and when a future administration got around to suggesting what should be taught in the schools—the economy of the States would be dependent upon such subsidies that they could not object; secondly, I quoted from a recent Supreme Court decision which asserted the right of the Government to regulate that which it subsidized. This could lead to increasingly strict control of education by the Federal Government, and would ultimately take the jurisdiction over the education of its citizens out of the hands of the States. I also pointed out that the legislation would cost our State twice as much as it was to receive under the plan. In the final vote, however, the bill was passed over the opposition of 22 Senators.

ON FEDERAL HOUSING LEGISLATION (S. 866)

During the debate on the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill (S. 866) I took the floor in opposition to the measure. I based my reasoning on the fact that administration policies have led to the housing shortage, by obstructing measures which would have led to a more abundant supply of materials. As another factor the increase in prices may be cited. I opposed the bill also for the reason that there was an abundance of public housing acts, including the FHA.

In this vein I made the following statement:

"We often forget, in the press of new legislation, what has gone before—and the mere fact that little of the previous legislation was successful seems to give added impetus to the new proposals instead of combing out and coordinating the old."

I submitted some material showing the duplication of effort in some of the United States housing agencies, and I pointed out that it was time to review the various laws enacted for public housing and to coordinate the efforts made.

Finally I suggested that the FHA was the logical agency to carry on the work. In the first place, the FHA did not cost the Government any money, and, secondly, it had accomplished a lot in making housing available.

"It is admitted that the Federal Housing Act needs some amendments. I shall briefly outline some of the amendments which, in my opinion, will be helpful. It is my current conviction that it will be best for the Congress to work on legislation which it can enact, and which will result in the construction of the needed housing in a business-like way instead of creating overlapping agencies because of new legislation in addition to the existing public housing acts already on the books."

The three amendments which I suggested for making the FHA more effective concerned an increase in the amounts for modernization loans, the recognition of changes in construction-cost levels, and the extension of some of the special provisions of the Housing Act for another year. I submitted these recommendations in the belief that they would help overcome the housing shortage without creating new agencies, and new laws, without giving free enterprise in housing construction a chance. These suggestions were not considered, however, and the housing bill passed the Senate.

HOUSING LEGISLATION — SPECIAL SESSION—EIGHTIETH CONGRESS—JULY 26, 1948

The following are the principal provisions in the housing bill passed by the Senate August 6, 1948:

1. Enactment of section 207 of title II, which authorizes the FHA to guarantee loans for States or municipalities and nonprofit corporations which are building rental housing.

2. Reenactment of section 608 of title VI, with a provision for an additional $800,000,000 authorization for insurance of loans on large-scale rental units, with a maximum cost limitation per unit of $9,000.

3. Reenactment and amendment of section 609 of title VI to make loans more easily available for the manufacturers of prefabricated housing.

4. The addition of section 611 to title VI, which provides for construction loans of 80 percent on homes with a value of $7,500 or less, where at least 25 homes are being built in the same project.

5. Title II of the National Housing Act is amended largely in line with the amendments contained in the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, with the exception that 95 percent buyers' loans are authorized on homes costing $6,300 and 85 percent construction loans authorized in such cases.

6. Reenacts the provisions for veterans' cooperatives provided in the recently passed housing bill, and increases the cost limitation from $1,350 per room to $8,100 per unit, except where the size of families, etc., makes the per room limitation of $1,800 more desirable. The valuation is based upon current costs rather than long-term value.

(In order to make this veterans' cooperative section of value it will be necessary for the Housing and Home Finance Administration to furnish considerable technical advice to the co-op members.)

Provision is also made for 90 percent guaranteed loans on nonveteran cooperatives.

7. Title I, class 3 loans, which are principally for construction in rural and semi-rural areas, are increased from $3,000 to $4,500. There is also an increase in the construction covered by these loans in the amount of $350,000,000.

8. The recently passed secondary market for GI home loans and FHA insured mortgages is increased from 25 to 50 percent of mortgages acquired subsequent to April 30, 1948.

9. There is established within the H and HFA a division, the sole function of which shall be to work toward the standardization of building codes and measurements.

10. A yield insurance program which guarantees the equity investor 2¾ percent annual income on his money on condition that rents are set to yield no more than approximately 3½ percent annual income on the investment.

11. Provides for the orderly eviction of over-income families from the present public-housing units.

12. The salary of the H and HFA Administrator is increased to $16,500 and the heads of the constituent agencies to $15,000.

The principal objective of this bill is to channelize building material into the building of lower-cost homes.

ON THE INTRODUCTION OF AN IMPORT FEE

On April 28, 1848, I introduced a bill (S. 2582) for Senator BUTLER and myself, substituting a flexible import fee for the fixed tariffs on imports, this import-fee system to be administered by a reorganized Tariff Commission called the Foreign Trade Authority, a bipartisan body composed of six members. In introducing the bill, I said the following:

"Many of my colleagues have supported the trade-agreements program in the past, because it was the only proposal which provided a method whereby tariff duties which were too high could be corrected without throwing the entire schedule of tariff rates open for general congressional debate. It is important that any new system provide a means whereby there can be prompt individual adjustment of tariff rates which get out of line, without resorting to a general periodic rewriting of the entire tariff by Congress. This the bill does.

"The legislation would leave to every country in the world the power of self-determination with respect to its own wage-living standards, but would provide a definite incentive for the other 56 members of the United Nations to raise their wage standard of living, since they would immediately be given credit for such advance through a corresponding reduction of the import fee; and when any nation reached our own wage-standard of living free and unrestricted trade would be the immediate result.

"The bill, in short, provides for every stated objective of the trade-agreements program on an even more liberal basis than the limited-rate changes which are possible under that program, but it does so without tying the hands of the United States in such a way as to prevent us from making changes in our rates except upon the advice and consent of our competitors abroad."

The bill was read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ON A 70-GROUP AIR FORCE

During the debate on H. R. 6226, providing for a 70-group air force, which took place on May 6, 1948, I restated my position that we did not have a foreign policy, and pointed out that a strong air force should have been provided for before adopting the Marshall plan. I stated, as follows:

"In my judgment, we must rebuild our military organization and spearhead it with an Air Corps that will convince any ambitious nation that we are prepared to resist expansion. We must be ready to expand our production immediately in the event of an emergency and know that our planes will be equal or superior to those of any nation on earth."

I further stated in my debate on the 70-group appropriation on May 6, 1948:

"Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I cannot let this opportunity pass without supporting the able report of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] on the airplane-procurement program.

"In the first place, I wish to call attention again to what I have previously said on the floor of the Senate, relating to the complete absence of any foreign policy in this administration. In the first place, neither the State Department nor the President of the United States has indicated in any manner whatsoever what areas and nations in Europe, Asia, and the south seas we must currently protect for our ultimate safety. As a result, neither our own people nor the nations of the world know what we will fight to protect.

"I wish to support the statements by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY]. However, we are just 2 months late with this debate. This subject of our own defensive and offensive organization should have preceded the Marshall-Bevin plan. Our own safety should come first. If we had considered such a plan as is now before the Senate, the Marshall plan as such would have been unnecessary.

"I wish to quote briefly from a 25-minute address which required 2 days for me to deliver before this body because of the running debate on March 4 and 5. In that speech I quoted the statement of President Monroe in 1823, when he laid down what was later known as the Monroe Doctrine, a doctrine which would be perfect at this time. President Monroe said:

" 'We owe it, therefore to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part'—meaning the European nations—'to extend their system to the Western Hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.'

"At that time I suggested that we could simply leave out 'Western Hemisphere,' and it would still be a perfect doctrine. We should name the areas and nations which we must currently protect for our own ultimate safety.

"I further stated:

" 'We should then build at once a military force, spearheaded by an air corps that would bear silent evidence to all concerned that we were ready and able to enforce the extended doctrine, just as we have enforced the original Monroe Doctrine covering the Western Hemisphere for more than 125 years, and which kept us out of a major war for more than 75 years.'

"I further stated at that time:

" 'The Congressional Air Policy Board has recommended a long-range military plane-purchase program which would provide a 35,000-plane striking force, costing $16,800,000,000, over a 5-year program. The President's Air Policy Board's recent report closely parallels this document.' "

The bill was passed with an overwhelming vote in favor of it.

"The two committees made practically the same report.

"I further stated on the 5th of March:

" 'The Armed Services Committees of Congress should immediately check these reports, and, if found correct, recommend their adoption and the appropriation of the necessary funds by the Congress of the United States for the entire 5-year program.

" 'Congress could apply the Marshall-plan 4-year funds of $17,000,000,000 to the $16,800,000,000 5-year plane-purchase program and have approximately enough left to continue the necessary European nations' feeding program until they raise a third crop, and to furnish the necessary funds to the RFC or the World Bank for the rehabilitation of the European nations' industry under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation rules as applied to American citizens.'

"Mr. President, this is not the first time this question has been before the Senate. We have already appropriated $17,000,000,000 for the European recovery program—at least, we have authorized an appropriation of $17,000,000,000. In my opinion, just as my friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] has said, it will have no effect whatever, and no relation to what we are about to do here; we must still rebuild the military organization at great expense, despite the large gift loans amounting to $41,000,000,000 since the close of World War II.

"The military forces and administration heads testified before committees—and their testimony was headlined all over the country—that unless we adopted the Marshall plan we would require a large Air Corps and large military force, indicating, by implication, that if we had the Marshall plan we would not need a plan for the large Air Corps.

"We are not equipped here to determine the size of the military organization and Air Corps necessary to convince the nations of the world that we mean business.

"Russia is not the only country stepping out of bounds—other countries are expanding, and such expansion is dangerous. England is going into South America, and beyond, in the Antarctic. The Netherlands is expanding in the East Indies, using our material and the money we lend them to do their expansion work throughout the East Indies.

"We have no effective United Nations Organization for the very simple reason that the major nations do not want one until they have reestablished their empires—and we seemingly do not have the gumption to realize that we are the only nation that can put strength in the United Nations.

"Mr. President, in my judgment, we must rebuild our military organization and spearhead it by an air corps that will convince any ambitious nation that we are prepared to resist such expansion. As the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] has indicated, we should name the nations and the areas which we intend to protect. We have not yet done that. We should do that for two reasons: First, so that the nations of the world may know what we will fight about—what areas in the world we intend to protect. Few believe that either the Kaiser or Hitler would have started a world war if they had known that we would be in the fight, but we not only denied we would fight but, upon investigation, no one believed we would fight—so we had to fight. * * *

"Mr. MALONE. I thank the Senator again, and I think he is absolutely correct.

"Mr. President, twice in my lifetime it has been my lot to see American boys being murdered in a war without proper preparation. For instance, I myself took a battery of field artillery to France in 1918. Just after the Armistice, we received our nice, shiny American-made 4.7 field artillery, but before that we used French 75's.

"What was the situation in the Second World War? In 1942 and 1943 I visited various military posts and installations. For instance, we landed by airplane at Nome, Alaska, in 1942. Apropos of what the Senator from New Hampshire has just stated, let me point out that just before we reached Nome, a Russian plane had taken off. We were informed that when that plane landed, the Russians threw a guard around it, and no one was permitted to examine the plane or study it in any way. However, the Russians who landed from the plane inspected everything the United States had at that point, including all our fortifications, although such fortifications were very meager. Our country had practically nothing there in the way of adequate military equipment for defense.

"Today we realize that such a situation may confront us a third time. Let us not let our young men walk into this thing unprepared again. When you send an American boy into battle with an airplane that flies a little slower than that of the enemy, or with a shorter range, that is not war, it is just plain murder.

"Again I say to the Senate that we have taken up the wrong program first. We should have taken up the air program before the Marshall plan was considered. The Marshall plan will not stop communism, but this program, if it is handled correctly, will stop communism if a definite foreign policy is inaugurated.

"We need a training program for our country which will furnish the proper kind and proportion of physical and technical training for our young men. Not only must they be trained, but for those who passed the proper aptitude tests there must be additional technical training available—perhaps through high school, college, and into the laboratories in the field of electronics and related sciences.

"Mr. President, adequate technical training cannot be accomplished in a few months. Such training will require a considerable period of time and must not be neglected."

ON THE MINE INCENTIVE BILL, S. 2756

On May 26, 1948, I introduced for myself and for Senators WILEY, ECTON, CAIN, WATKINS, THOMAS, HATCH, MCFARLAND, and CHAVEZ, a mine incentive-payment bill.

This bill had grown out of my conviction, expressed in an article in the January 2, 1947, issue of the Engineering News-Record, that—

"It is time that we direct our best thoughts along the lines of utilizing our vast resources for the benefit of our people and raising our living standards through the creation of additional employment, business opportunities, and taxable wealth to help carry the necessary tax load."

During the hearings conducted by the National Resources Economic Subcommittee, of which I am chairman, it had become evident that it was necessary to provide incentive payments for the exploration, development, and production of strategic metals and minerals, which we may require for national defense, and must have for an expanding peace economy. The bill was introduced to provide for these aims. In introducing the bill I said:

"We must have at all times a healthy and productive domestic mining industry which can be expanded in times of need.

"If a real conflict were to be waged in Europe and even if we were not a party to it, the sea lanes would be closely patrolled by submarines and airplanes to prevent any assistance from us, and we would be isolated and our industries ruined unless we were able to produce a reasonable part of our needed supplies in this country.

"The stock piling of ores for defense purposes is one of the principal intentions of the bill. The administration is talking war. We are in a very unsettled condition. As a matter of fact, the Second World War has not as yet been declared officially over, and a large proportion of our mines have closed down. We cannot possibly stock pile enough material with which to fight a war. We must have producing mines to augment the supply."

In support of the bill I introduced a wealth of material into the RECORD, giving statistics on the imports, prices, and production of the strategic minerals and metals, besides giving outlines of their uses, and a statement of their occurence.

The bill was referred to the Public Lands Committee and, finally, came up in the Senate on the last day of the second session, but failed to pass in the rush of last-minute business.

ON DRAFT LEGISLATION AND SELECTIVE SERVICE

On June 9, 1948, the Senate debated the bill providing for the common defense by increasing the strength of the armed forces of the United States (S. 2655). I proposed an amendment to the bill which would have substituted selective service, as incorporated in the House bill 4278, after about 12 to 18 months, when there would be no further need for the draft. With this amendment the legislation became substantially the two-title bill supported by the American Legion and other veterans' organizations.

I made my stand clear in regard to military training, with the statement:

"Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, for 30 years, from 1919 to 1948, veterans' organizations of the Nation have advocated universal military training. Fourteen million men and women wore the uniform of the United States in World War II.

"During the 30-year period, 1919 to 1948, such legislation has never been brought before the Congress of the United States for a vote.

"Military service, in a time of emergency, is the price of citizenship. Nevertheless, our entire experience from the Civil War to the present time has proven conclusively that our citizens will not volunteer in sufficient numbers. We tried twice in the past 30 years to keep out of wars without training. Let us try it once with training.

"Twice in my lifetime, Mr. President, I saw our young men being murdered because of insufficient preparation: Once, in 1918, in France, and again in 1942 and 1943, in Alaska, in the Aleutians, and in the South Seas. Insufficient preparation and training for the men going into the front lines, and insufficient equipment, with planes that fly a little slower, and guns that shoot a little shorter—is not war, Mr. President, that is murder. I do not care to be party to sending American boys into war without proper equipment and without proper training.

"Under this amendment technical training for sizable groups of citizens, chosen through aptitude tests is available. There is provision for seeing them through technical schools and into the laboratories. They would receive initial training in these professions, and make their living in these professions, if there were no emergency. But, if there were an emergency they would then be ready.

"We should not send men into war without the necessary specialized training for the job to which they are to be assigned, and it is impossible to secure such training within a few weeks or months or even years in the science and technical fields. It has to be done when time is available."

I felt that the draft bill would serve the immediate needs of the Nation, but that the universal military training bill would be a superior instrument for providing training. The combination is what is called the "two title" bill by the American Legion, Veterans' of Foreign Wars, and other veterans' organizations.

During the lengthy debate I pointed out the need for adequate training, in these days of highly mechanized warfare, and for the maintenance of adequate military personnel to act quickly in case of an emergency.

My amendment was defeated by a small majority, however, and the draft bill, as proposed, was agreed upon by a conference committee, and later approved in the Senate.

ON THE VANDENBERG RESOLUTION (S. RES. 239)

On June 11, 1948, the Senate debated the Vandenberg resolution, reaffirming the policy of the United States to achieve international peace and security through the United Nations.

I objected to the resolution because of certain sections which gave an implied approval of any regional treaties and defense arrangements which the United States might enter, an approval that was not necessarily justified, since the Senate had the right and the duty to ratify any such treaty and arrangement by separate and independent action. In this vein I said the following:

"We have already indicated our position through ratification of the United Nations Charter in the regular way. The alternative I would offer is that we follow the Constitution of the United States and not commit ourselves in advance. The Constitution provides that the President shall make the treaties and shall send them to this body for ratification. At that time, when the Senate considers the proposed treaties, prior to ratifying them, all the evidence is supposed to be available to the Senate. It is not available now.

"I submit that if we take the initiative in this matter and urge the President of the State Deparment to do certain of these things, then we shall be morally bound to follow whatever they do.

"The main purpose of this resolution, it seems to me, is to give the green light for a mutual military aid pact with Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, and Luxemburg. Once negotiated by the President, this military pact will be submitted to the Senate for ratification. Once ratified, the United States is compelled to go to war if any other nation attacks any one of these five."

Further, I outlined the constitutional questions involved in a course which could lead the United States to making war without Congress' approval, which might well be the result of such military treaties or pacts. I called for full discussion before going into such pacts, and denied the wisdom of making any prior moral commitment.

The resolution was finally adopted, and I did not vote on it, having been paired with Senator ROBERTSON. I would have voted in the negative, however, for the reasons outlined above.

ON THE EXTENSION OF THE TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT (H. R. 6556)

The extension of the Trade Agreements Act for a period of 1 year seemed to me to be the only alternative to passing the flexible import-fee bill which I had introduced earlier in the session. I had frequently attacked the amendment to the Tariff Act of 1930, the 1934 Trade Agreements Act, during debates on the floor of the Senate.

My attacks had been based on the contention that the operation of the act had been one of selective free trade (selections by the State Department) which resulted in trading off certain industries to foreign competitors, working with cheap labor.

The extension of the act, as it was finally enacted, contained certain restrictions in regard to the procedure for further tariff cuts. These restrictions would result in a healthier and more constructive approach to foreign trade.

"In my opinion some method must be worked out that will provide for the automatic adjustment of the import fee or tariff to correctly represent at all times the difference of the cost of production between this country and the foreign competitor, on each specific product; and when any nation has reached approximately our wage-living standard, then free and unrestricted trade is the immediate and automatic result."

Through the extension of the 1934 Trade Agreements Act for 1 year—the Marshall plan appropriations for the second year and the international trade organization can be studied in connection with their cumulative effect on the economy of this Nation.

In this connection I said in debate on May 6, 1948:

"Mr. President, I want to again call attention to the long-range plan to redistribute the wealth of this Nation.

"The three steps projected by the economic one-worlders for that purpose are:

"First. The established policy of exporting American money to make up the annual trade balance deficits—from all sources—of the European, Asiatic, and South American countries. Our chief export is money. The occasion may be the UNRRA, $3,000,000,000; the Greek-Turkey, $400,000,000; the English gift-loan of $3,750,000,000; or the Marshall-Bevin plan of exporting $17,000,000,000 to Europe, but the master-minded policy is the same, the economic equalization and the redistribution of the wealth of the 57 nations of the world, starting with the United States of America. This is a definite part of the international policy as supported in Senate debate, the English and Marshall-Bevin-plan gift loans are simply successive moves in establishing the first step of the policy.

"Second. The selective free-trade method of dividing the production of this country with the nations of the world through the Trade Agreements Act, known by the catch word 'reciprocal trade,' is the second step in the economic one-world plan. Through the Trade Agreements Act industries selected by the State Department are frankly traded to one or more nations for a fancied advantage in furnishing them a market for their goods to secure money—dollar exchange—presumably to buy our processed and manufactured products.

"Third. The International Trade Organization—ITO—through which 57 nations, each with one vote, will meet each year and frankly allocate the production and markets of the world between such nations, presumably finally on a population and cost of production, without regard to the differential of production cost due to the difference in the standards-of-living basis, thereby completing the job of international redistribution of the wealth of this Nation.

"This Organization is to be the final leveler of the wage-living standards of the world.

"International conferences and world wars are incidents, and even time is unimportant in the plan of the internationally minded 'one economic world' group.

"The 'one economic world' group prematurely launched the 'one political world' idea in the 1940 Presidential campaign. The emphasis has now shifted back to economics through the three definite policies; and when the 'one economic world' goal is reached, the 'one political world' is expected to follow in the natural course of events.

"What is the answer?

"A. A definite international policy, naming the areas and nations we must currently protect for our own ultimate safety and rebuilding our military organization, spearheaded by an air corps that can keep any nation on the ground until such time as the United Nations can take over, or the major problems of the world have been settled.

"B. A flexible import fee under a flexible import act representing the differential of the cost of production between this Nation and where our competition is located on each specified product—in place of the selective free-trade program under the 1934 Trade Agreements Act.

"The standard of living of the nations of the world cannot be lifted up overnight through redistribution of the wealth of this Nation or a division of our markets or of our production. Any such continuous plan or policy simply means a pronounced lowering of our own wage-living standards and a diminished market for your products. The will to raise their wage-living standards is a prerequisite to any improvement—and must come from the inside in any nation—it cannot be poured in from the top.

"Most of the Asiatic and European countries have had access to the same necessary raw materials that we have so efficiently utilized for centuries—some of them, like China, for 5,000 years of recorded history—and have never changed their standard or manner of living perceptibly in all history.

"While this country, starting with their bare hands 300 years ago, has risen to the highest wage-living standard in all history, most of our improvement has occurred during the past 150 years.

"More on this subject will come later—and has a definite connection with the subject under discussion today."

ON AGRICULTURAL LEGISLATION

The long-range farm program passed the Senate, and I supported it. I believe that some support of agricultural prices and other raw materials are necessary for continued prosperity in the United States, at least until a workable, flexible import fee bill can be enacted into law. The source of new income arising out of our production cycles, both industrial and agricultural, are the basis of the strength of our economy; and to maintain that strength adequate price levels comparable to our wage standard of living are one of the prime requirements. The legislation, including Senate 2318 and House bill 6248, June 19, 1948, provides:

Senate: The Senate passed S. 2318, providing for a long-range farm program. S. 2318 had as its objective a long-range program which would maintain agricultural income in balance with the income of other economic groups, through support prices, marketing of surpluses, marketing quotas, acreage controls, etc.

House of Representatives: The House passed H. R. 6248, which was primarily a revision of the Price Stabilization Act of July 1, 1941, known as the Steagall amendment.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE AGREEMENT

The two bills, S. 2318 and H. R. 6248, were considered by the conference committee and the compromise for all practical purposes was the acceptance of both bills. Under the agreement, which was accepted by Congress, H. R. 6248 will be in force until June 30, 1950, on the basic farm crops produced in the year 1949. S. 2318 will go into effect on January 1, 1950, and will apply to farm products produced in the crop year 1950.

PROVISIONS OF H. R. 6248

H. R. 6248 was made title 1 of the conference committee agreement and authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to stabilize prices of agricultural commodities and amends section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, reenacted by the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937.

The provisions of title 1 provide:

1. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed through any instrumentality or agency within or under the direction of the Department of Agriculture by loans, purchases, etc.—

(a) To support prices received by producers of cotton, wheat, corn, tobacco, rice, and peanuts marketed before June 30, 1950, if producers have not disapproved marketing quotas for such commodity for the marketing year in the calendar year in which the crop is harvested. The price support authorized shall be made available as follows:

(1) To cooperators at the rate of 90 percent of the parity price for the commodity as of the beginning of the marketing year.

(2) To noncooperators at the rate of 60 percent of parity on that part of the commodity which would be subject to penalty if marketed.

(3) To support until January 1, 1950, a price to producers of commodities with respect to which the Secretary of Agriculture by public pronouncement pursuant to provisions of the act of July 1, 1941, as amended, requested an expansion of production, of not less than 60 percent of parity nor more than the level at which such commodity was supported in 1948, except that Irish potatoes harvested before January 1, 1949, milk and its products, hogs, chickens, and eggs shall be supported at 90 percent of parity.

In carrying out the provisions of this subsection the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the authority to require compliance with production goals and marketing regulations as a condition of eligibility for price support.

(4) The policy of Congress in regard to farm products which are not specifically mentioned is that the leading and purchasing operations of the Department of Agriculture shall be carried out until January 1, 1950, so as to bring the price and income of producers of other agricultural commodities to a fair parity relationship with the commodities specifically mentioned.

2. From any funds available to the Department of Agriculture or any agency operating under its direction for price support operations, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to use such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of section 1.

3. Amends section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act as reenacted by section 1 of the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937 as follows:

(a) Whenever the President has reason to believe that any article or articles are certain to be imported into the United States under such conditions and in such quantities as to render or tend to render the program of price supports ineffective, he shall cause an immediate investigation by the United States Tariff Commission to determine such facts through public hearings after due notice to interested parties.

(b) If on the basis of such investigation the President finds that such imports do render or tend to render the program of price supports ineffective, he shall by proclamation impose such fees not in excess of 50 percent ad valorem or such quantitative limitations as may be necessary to prevent their rendering price supports ineffective. Provided that no proclamation under this section shall reduce such imports more than 50 percent of the total quantity imported during a representative period as determined by the President.

(c) Such fees and limitations shall be treated for administrative purposes as duties imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930, but such fees shall not be considered as duties for the purpose of granting any preferential concession under any international agreement of the United States.

(d) Any fees or limitations proclaimed under subsection (c) can be suspended or terminated by the President whenever he finds and proclaims that such imports no longer render the support price program ineffective. Any decision of the President as to facts regarding such imports shall be final.

(e) No proclamation under this section shall be enforced in contravention of any treaty or other international agreement to which the United States is or hereafter becomes a party.

4. Provides that this title shall take effect January 1, 1949, and that section 3 in regard to import fees and quantitative limitations shall take effect upon the date of enactment of this act.

PROVISIONS OF S. 2318

H. R. 6248 or title I of the conference committee agreement replaced titles I and II of S. 2318; titles III and IV of S. 2318 were added to H. R. 6248 and were made titles II and III of the conference committee agreement. They provide as follows:

"Title II. Amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. Section 201 amends section 301 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. It provides for a new flexible parity formula on a transitional basis in period preceding determination of price supports. It defines carry-over of basic farm commodities, normal supply and total supply as a basis of price supports."

"Parity" of income is defined as that "gross farm income from agriculture which will provide the farm operator and his family with a standard of living equivalent to those afforded persons dependent upon other gainful occupation" or when applied to an agricultural commodity as the average income for such a commodity during the 10 years preceding determination of its parity prices as related to other agricultural commodities.

Section 202 amends section 302 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 as follows:

(a) The Secretary of Agriculture, through the Commodity Credit Corporation is authorized to support prices of agricultural products to producers through loans, purchases, payments, and other operations.

Except as otherwise provided in this section the amounts, terms, and conditions shall be determined by (1) supply, (2) support prices for other commodities, (3) availability of funds, (4) perishability of commodity, (5) its importance to national economy, (6) ability to dispose of surpluses, (7) the need of offsetting losses in the export of market, and (8) the ability and willingness of producers to keep supplies in line with the demand. The Secretary may require compliance by the producer with acreage allotments and marketing practices.

(b) The level of support prices is based on the total supply in a graduated table that ranges from a support price of 90 percent of parity if the supply is 70 percent of total supply (carry-over plus estimated production plus imports), to 75 percent of parity if total supply equals 100 and 60 percent of parity if total supply equals more than 130 percent of total supply.

(c) If acreage allotments are in effect at the beginning of the marketing year the producer shall have price supports equal to 120 percent of the minimum support price of 60 percent of parity.

(d) In the event that producers have disapproved marketing quotas on any basic commodity the support price shall be 50 percent of the parity price at the beginning of the crop year for such commodity.

(e) The price support for corn producers outside of the established Corn Belt shall be 75 percent of the price support for cooperators in the Corn Belt, which has been established as the "commercial corn area."

(f) Notwithstanding other provisions in this section, the support price to cooperators in a tobacco program providing for marketing quotas shall be 90 percent of parity.

(g) The support price of any other agricultural commodity than basic commodities shall not exceed 90 percent of parity, and in the case of wool not more than 90 percent of parity, or less than 60 percent, as the Secretary may determine as being necessary to maintain a supply of 350,000,000 pounds of shorn wool. Basic commodities are defined as corn, cotton, wheat, rice, tobacco, and peanuts. Nonbasic commodities are all other commodities than those defined as basic.

(h) No producer shall be held liable for losses sustained through the sale of collateral held for commodity loans other than losses due to fraud, deficiency in grade or quantity.

(i) The Commodity Credit Corporation shall not sell any commodity owned by it for less than the price as determined by grade or a price halfway between the support price, if any, and the parity price of such commodity, or 90 percent of parity, whichever price is the lowest.

This provision shall not apply to (a) sales for new uses, (b) peanuts sold for oil, (c) for seed or feed, (d) to prevent spoilage, (e) to prevent fraud, (f) sales of wool, (g) for primary purposes.

Sections 203, 204, 205, and 206 provide for marketing quotas for corn, wheat, cotton, and rice, respectively, in any marketing year when the price of these commodities has been below 66 percent of parity for 3 months preceding the close of the marketing year.

Section 207 amends minor sections of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938.

Section 208 provides for marketing quotas on tobacco.

MISCELLANEOUS

Title III, section 301, amends section 32 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1935 in regard to funds.

Section 302 amends Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937 in regard to establishing prices for specific commodities, such as milk, to be handled under marketing agreements. Secretary of Agriculture given authority to establish such prices as may be required to obtain the necessary production to assure the needs of the public.

Section 303 sets the effective date of titles II and III of the conference committee agreement as of January 1, 1950.

SUMMARY OF LEGISLATION

The act contemplates a support price for agricultural products at 90 percent of parity for the balance of 1948 and for 1949. In 1950 support prices may be reduced to 60 percent of parity and such steps as may be required to balance supply with current needs. The legislation recognizes the need of maintaining farm prices at a proper level and that such prices may need protection against imports from other nations.

AMENDMENTS TO THE SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE ACT (S. 2897)

As my last action in the second session of the Eightieth Congress, on the day before adjournment, I introduced a bill (S. 2897) to amend certain provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, and section 3 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. The Senate being in the last-minute rush before adjournment, I did not make a speech, but had my statement inserted in the RECORD. In this statement I gave the reason for introducing the bill:

"The bill which I am introducing is designed to curb the abuses which have arisen in the administering of the securities acts and to encourage the investment of private venture capital in new enterprises, particularly new mining enterprises."

In my reasoning I traced the decline in the investment of venture capital to the restrictive policies practiced by the Securities and Exchange Commission under its rules and regulations, and to the tremendous increase in the tax burden. I introduced statistics showing the decrease in venture capital investment, and the rise in taxation over the last few decades.

I summed up my stand in the following words:

"The further expansion of prosperity in the United States and the progressive utilization and development of our rich natural resources can only be achieved by reversing the restrictive, burdensome policies of the past 15 years, and substituting therefor a policy for the encouragement of private enterprise and of encouragement for the exploration and development of all of our basic natural resources."

The proposed changes in the law would facilitate the issuance of stock by the mining industry without abrogating the power of the SEC to any great extent. The changes would enable venture capital to go forth and develop the necessary resources to reach the goal of our national stock pile. They would limit the extra-legal rights of the SEC to conduct inquisitorial investigations. Contrary to the practice followed until now, that the evidence and testimony against an issuer is not made available to him, the changes propose to enable the entrepreneur to defend himself on legal grounds.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Finance, and will be considered when Congress convenes.

On Federal Taxation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, there seems to be considerable controversy as to the wisdom of reducing personal income taxes at this time. I notice that those who decry a cut in personal income taxes are, in some instances, those who have been indoctrinated with the New Deal philosophy and practice of tax, spend, and tax. It is my opinion that there is no more reason for not reducing Government expenditures and cutting taxes now than there would have been in refusing to do so following World War I. The program of economy then adopted blazed the way for prompt and substantial reductions in individual income taxes. The rates were so high in 1918 that they had arrived at the point of diminishing returns.

In this connection it will be recalled that the Federal normal tax rate on individual incomes in 1918 was 12 percent—6 percent on the first $4,000—with a personal exemption for a single person of $1,000, a $2,000 exemption for a married person, and a credit for each dependent of $200. I repeat that this high rate of taxation, reduced exemption, and low credit for dependents had reached the point of diminishing returns. This situation, in the face of an unbalanced budget, a national debt in excess of $26,000,000,000, and 6,000,000 unemployed, presented a serious problem that called for a courageous program of retrenchment and a realistic tax approach. The same arguments against tax reduction were made then that are heard now. I have referred to the high normal tax rate on individual incomes, the low exemptions, and low credit for dependents which existed in 1918.

The first step in cutting the Federal normal rate on individual incomes was taken under the Revenue Act of 1918 for the year 1919–20. The Federal personal normal income-tax rate was reduced to 8 percent—4 percent on first $4,000. The personal exemption for a single person, a married person, and the credit for dependents remained the same. In addition to the normal tax the surtax rates ranged from 1 percent to a top rate of 65 percent on net income in excess of $1,000,000 with surtax exemption of $5,000.

The next revenue act was the 1921 act for the years 1921–23. The exemption for a married person was increased from $2,000 to $2,500 where the aggregate income of husband and wife did not exceed $5,000, and the credit for each dependent was increased from $200 to $400. In addition to the increased exemption for married persons and for dependents the surtax rates were amended applicable for 1922–23. A surtax exemption of $6,000 was provided and the surtax rates ranged from 1 percent on the first $2,000 to 50 percent on net incomes in excess of $200,000.

The second step in cutting the normal rate on individual incomes under the Revenue Act of 1924 was taken. Under this act the tax rate on the income of individuals was reduced to 6 percent—2 percent on first $4,000, 4 percent on second $4,000. The personal exemption for single persons and for married persons and the credit for each dependent remained the same. But the 1924 act increased the surtax exemption to $10,000 and the surtax rates ranged from 1 percent on the first $4,000 of net income to 40 percent on net incomes in excess of $500,000.

It should be mentioned, as well as stressed, that under the provisions of the Revenue Act of 1924 the tax for the year 1923 was reduced 25 percent.

The third step in cutting the normal rate on individual incomes was under the Revenue Act of 1926 covering the years 1925–27, which reduced the rate to 5 percent—1½ percent on first $4,000, 3 percent on second $4,000—while at the same time increasing the exemption for a single person to $1,500 and the personal exemption for a married person to $3,500; the credit for each dependent remained at $400. The 1926 act continued the surtax exemption of $10,000 and reduced the surtax rates. The top rate was reduced from 40 to 20 percent, and the top rate applied to net incomes in excess of $100,000.

The Revenue Act of 1928, while it did not change the rates or exemptions, increased the earned-income credit limit from $20,000 to $30,000.

The fourth reduction in the personal income-tax rate was under a House joint resolution enacted into law December 16, 1929, and taking effect as of January 1, 1930. The House joint resolution reduced the rate for 1929 on individual income to 4 percent—one-half of 1 percent on first $4,000, 2 percent on the second $4,000—the exemption for single persons, married persons, and the credit for dependents remained the same. Thus in four revenue acts following World War I there were four substantial reductions in the individual income-tax rates; also a 25-percent cut in the tax for 1923. In addition to all this tax relief there were two increases in personal exemptions for both single and married persons, and one increase in credits for each dependent.

It is noteworthy in the light of these reductions in individual income-tax rates, increased personal exemptions to both the single and married persons as well as the increased credit for dependents, that there were no Federal deficits in any year from 1921 to 1931.

But more extraordinary than all this, the record shows that notwithstanding all of this relief to individual income taxpayers, there was ample revenue to not only conduct the affairs of the Government in a high state of efficiency, but sufficient revenue to pay $1,000,000,000 each year for 10 years on the national debt.

The period of all this tax relief, to which I have referred, was one of full employment, large production, debt retirement, and Nation-wide prosperity.

During the 15 years of the New Deal there have been adopted a great many tax proposals which have been inconsistent with our economic law. The country in the last election has repudiated these policies and expressed itself in favor of a return to a sound and constructive tax system. One of these theories is that a reduction of excessive and oppressive individual income tax rates will of itself result in a heavy loss in revenue. The advocates of such a theory overlook the important fact that the yield from an income tax depends upon the amount of income which is subject to tax. If the individual rates are so high as to discourage production and expansion, interfere with business initiative, and deter venture capital, the tax yield on the income which could have been produced under fair and reasonable rates will be lost to the country. As will be shown, the tax on this increased income may go a long way toward offsetting any theoretical loss in revenue due to decreased rates. Excessive taxes dry up the source from which the revenue stems, encourage tax evasion, and make the tax less and less productive. The enemies of the income tax are not those seeking to reduce its oppressive and excessive rates, but those who insist that such rates remain on the statute books regardless of their effect on production, expansion, and initiative, in order to soak the rich. I believe that a reduction in the individual income tax will lend encouragement and stimulation to the production of income. This is illustrated by the experience in the twenties: when the war rates of the First World War were reduced. As has been pointed out, the first reduction occurred for the year 1921 under the Revenue Act of 1921.

In 1921, business and industry were faced with depressing influences arising as an aftermath of the First World War, and the country was passing through the trying period of liquidation and readjustment. Net income had declined from the all-time high of twenty-three billion seven hundred million to nineteen billion five hundred million for 1921. In the opinion of the Ways and Means Committee, the exacting of excessive taxes contributed in no small degree to the depression. For the year 1921 the reduction was limited to increasing the marital exemption from $2,000 to $2,500, where the aggregate income of husband and wife did not exceed $5,000, and increasing the credit for dependents. For the year 1922 there was a reduction in rates in all brackets, the top surtax being reduced from a top rate of 65 percent to a top rate of 50 percent. Other reductions followed in 1924, 1926, 1928, and 1929. The following table based upon Statistics of Income for 1941 published by the Treasury Department shows what was accomplished through these tax reductions:

1922	21.3
1923	24.8
1924	25.6
1925	21.8
1926	21.9
1927	22.5
1928	25.2
1929	24.8
Tax:	Millions
1921	719
1922	861
1923	661
1924	704
1925	735
1926	732
1927	831
1928	1,164
1929	1,001

It will be noted that the net income increased through 1924 but decreased in 1925, although the tax yield for 1925 was greater than for 1924. The reason for this is explained by the following statement taken from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1927:

> The sources of the income returned for the calendar year 1925 as compared with 1924 clearly illustrate the effect of the new revenue act. The total national income was undoubtedly greater in 1925 than in 1924, due to increased prosperity, but the income actually returned for individual income-tax purposes was less, due to the entire exemption of over 40 percent of the 1924 income-tax payers. The income returned on account of wages and salaries was about $3,875,000,000 less; from individual businesses about $1,100,000,000 less; from rents and royalties about $538,000,000 less; and from interest and investments about $467,000,000 less. On the other hand, increased income was returned from dividends and from sale of property. Dividends increased about $214,000,000, while the gains from the sale of property, including that returned as capital net gains, increased about $1,418,500,000. The largest reductions in net income reported for tax purposes, in the income from wages and salaries and in the income returned on account of individual business, were in the lower tax brackets. The reductions in returns from rents and royalties and interest and investment income were almost entirely in the lower brackets. The greatest beneficiaries of the 1926 act were, therefore, people of small incomes, wage earners, salaried men, and men operating small individual business enterprises.

Mr. Speaker, it will also be noted from the table that the tax for 1923 was less than the tax for 1922. This was due to the 25-percent reduction in the income tax for 1923 provided in the Revenue Act of 1924. This loss in revenue was recouped by the increase in tax yield during later years.

Our capital gains also increased during this period. Prior to 1921, capital gains were subject to ordinary normal and surtax rates. Beginning with the Revenue Act of 1921, capital gains were subject to a flat rate of 12½ percent, where the asset sold had been held for more than 2 years.

The following table, taken from Statistics of Income for 1941, shows the increase in capital gains:

Capital net gains from sale of assets held more than 2 years:
1922	$249,000,000
1923	305,000,000
1924	389,000,000
1925	940,000,000
1926	913,000,000
1927	1,081,000,000
1928	1,880,000,000
1929	2,347,000,000

A table is inserted in the Appendix giving a break-down of the net income during the periods 1922–29. As has already been pointed out, the drop in wages and salaries was due, not to the lack of income in national income but to the fact that a large part of such income was made exempt from the income tax due to raising the personal exemption and credit for dependents.

While there was substantial tax reduction during the period 1921 to 1929, inclusive, there was also a sufficient surplus to provide an annual reduction in national debt which, in 1920, stood at twenty-four billions. By 1930 the debt had been reduced to sixteen billions. This is shown by the following table, taken from the Secretary's report:

June 30:	Total gross debt
1919	$25,482,034,410
1920	24,297,918,412
1921	23,976,250,608
1922	22,964,079,190
1923	22,349,687,758
1924	21,251,120,427
1925	20,516,272,174
1926	19,643,183,079
1927	18,510,174,266
1928	17,604,290,563
1929	16,931,197,748
1930	16,185,303,299

There are some who advocate that any surplus which may arise should all be applied to the payment of the national debt. While I am a great believer in debt reduction, I feel that it is also important that the Government deal fairly with its taxpayers, who, in the third year after the war, are still burdened with heavy war taxes.

TAX REDUCTION—1. THE REVENUE ACT OF 1945

The Revenue Act of 1945, effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1945, provided substantial tax relief for corporations for the first time in 17 years and the first for individuals in 13 years.

This act provided for a reduction in the corporate-tax burden by repealing the wartime excess-profits tax, the capital-stock tax, declared value excess-profits tax, and by reducing the corporate surtax.

Individuals received relief under this act in that the same $500 per capita exemptions that then applied for surtax purposes were made applicable for the normal tax, and the surtax rates were reduced three percentage points in each surtax bracket. Provision was also made for a 5-percent reduction in both the normal and surtax computed under the new rates and exemptions. The combined normal tax and surtax under prior law was limited to 90 percent of net income. This limitation was reduced to 85.5 percent.

All service pay of enlisted personnel of the armed forces was excluded from taxable income and for commissioned personnel a $1,500 exclusion was provided. For enlisted personnel, this was made retroactive to December 31, 1940, and for commissioned officers, December 31, 1942.

The use tax on motor vehicles and boats was repealed, effective July 1, 1946.

The Revenue Act of 1945 became law at a time when the Federal Government had just completed the fiscal year 1945 with a deficit of $54,000,000,000. The deficit for the fiscal year 1946 was estimated at $21,000,000,000, and the Treasury indicated that in the fiscal year 1947 the deficit would range between five and eight billion dollars. Government economists were also predicting a major recession with 8,000,000 unemployed, for whose relief the President had asked an appropriation of $300,000,000.

The revenue loss from all the provisions in the act were estimated to reduce Federal revenues by $5,900,000,000 in a full year of operation. Subsequent to the enactment of this tax reduction, Federal receipts actually increased, the public debt was reduced, and our national income reached a level never before experienced. Federal receipts, national income, and the reduction in the public debt for the fiscal years 1947 and 1948 are as follows:

[In billions of dollars]

	Federal receipts	National income	Reduction in public debt
1947	43.3	193	11
1948	44.7	[1] 212	6

2. INDIVIDUAL INCOME-TAX REDUCTION ACT OF 1947 (H. R. 1)

H. R. 1, the first major individual income-tax reduction bill in 15 years, was reported out by the Committee on Ways and Means on March 24, 1947, and subsequently passed the House and Senate. The bill provided for a graduated percentage reduction ranging from 30 percent on the tax on the lowest incomes to 10.5 percent on the highest incomes in the then present individual income tax. This bill was retroactive to January 1, 1947. President Truman chose to veto this tax-reduction bill and his veto was sustained by the House on June 17, 1947, by a vote of 268 to 137.

3. INDIVIDUAL INCOME-TAX REDUCTION ACT OF 1947 (H. R. 3950)

H. R. 3950 was the same tax-reduction bill as H. R. 1 except that the effective date was changed from January 1, 1947, to July 1, 1947. This bill passed both the House and the Senate but was also vetoed by President Truman on July 18, 1947. The House of Representatives voted this time to override the veto but in the Senate it was sustained by a vote of 57 to 36.

4. REVENUE ACT OF 1948 (H. R. 4790)

The Revenue Act of 1948 was reported out by the Committee on Ways and Means on January 27, 1948. The bill provided tax reduction, relief and equalization for individual income-tax payers. The Senate amended the bill as passed by the House, the most important amendment reduced the percentage tax reductions approved by the House. The House accepted the Senate amendments and the bill as sent to the President contained the following provisions:

A. INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAXES

First. Personal and dependency exemptions were increased from $500 to $600.

Second. Provided percentage tax reductions as follows:

Percentage reductions in individual income taxes provided by the Revenue Act of 1948

Income after deductions and exemptions	Tentative tax [1]	Reductions in tentative tax [1]	Reductions in prior law tax
$0 to $2,000	$0 to $400	17 percent	12.6 percent.
$2,000 to $136,719.10	$400 to $100,000	17 percent of the tentative tax on the first $2,000 of surtax net income plus 12 percent of the tentative tax on the excess.	12.6 percent of the present law tax on the first $2,000 of surtax net income, plus 7.4 percent of the present law tax on the excess.
$136,719.10 and over	$100,000 and over	17 percent of the tentative tax on the first $2,000 of surtax net income, plus 12 percent of the tentative tax on about the next $134,700 plus 9.75 percent of the tentative tax on the excess.	12.6 percent of the present law tax on the first $2,000 of surtax net income, 7.4 percent of the present law tax on about the next $134,700, plus 5 percent of the present law tax on the excess.

[1] More correctly, tentative normal tax and surtax. The term "tentative" refers to the tax computation before the 5-percent reduction provided by prior law or the percentage reductions provided under this act.

Third. Husbands and wives were permitted to split their income for tax purposes.

Fourth. The maximum standard deduction was increased to $1,000 for married couples and $1,000 for single persons.

Fifth. An additional $600 exemption was granted to taxpayers who are 65 or over, and if both husband and wife are over 65, they both receive the additional exemption.

Sixth. An additional $600 exemption was granted to taxpayers who are blind. Both husband and wife receive this additional exemption if they are both blind.

B. ESTATE AND GIFT TAXES

First. The 1942 amendments to the estate and gift taxes which provided special rules in the case of community property were repealed.

Second. Provision was made for estate and gift tax "splitting" of noncommunity property.

C. CAPITAL GAINS TAX

First. Provision was made to give taxpayers in community-property States as nearly as possible the same basis for determining gain or loss on capital assets sold after death as given taxpayers in common-law States.

H. R. 4790 was returned to the Congress by President Truman without his approval and with which veto message he stated:

It is a matter of deep regret to me that I am compelled to take this action.

He also stated:

The tax reduction provided by this bill is inequitable as well as untimely.

On April 2, 1948, both the House and the Senate voted by overwhelming majorities to override this veto and H. R. 4790 became law in spite of the Democratic administration's disapproval.

The opponents of this bill argued that it would produce a deficit. It is highly unlikely that this gloomy forecast will prove to be correct. National income is now at an extremely high level, $220,000,000,000 as compared to $199,000,000,000 a year ago. The present level is in fact the highest that has yet been attained. Moreover, the trend is upward. The tax reduction contained in H. R. 4790 has helped to produce this high level of prosperity and will assist materially in its maintenance just as the tax reductions of the 1920's helped to produce and maintain the prosperous business conditions of that period.

The high level of national income which now exists and which may reasonably be anticipated during the coming fiscal year means a continued high level of Government income. Even with the very high level of Federal expenditures which we are being called upon to finance, it is reasonable to anticipate a substantial surplus in the fiscal year 1949. After full allowance for the immediate effect of the tax-reduction bill of 1948 on collections, it is anticipated that the surplus for the fiscal year 1949 will be in excess of $5,000,000,000. This will permit the retirement of a similar volume of national debt, thus continuing the record of sound postwar finance which was begun by the Revenue Act of 1945.

EXHIBIT 2. CAPITAL GAINS

The following data taken from the report of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation for 1927 show the following:

Profits and losses on sales of assets reported by 4,063 individuals with a net taxable income of $100,000 and over in 1916

Year	Profits on sale of assets	Percent profit to total income	Losses on sale of assets	Percent losses to total deductions
1917	$28,836,826	2.79	$19,150,961	13.40
1918	7,937,991	.92	65,072,240	32.44
1919	36,687,447	3.99	124,253,174	45.90
1920	10,910,541	1.33	216,116,946	56.75
1921	10,596,216	1.57	160,121,432	48.76
1922	95,245,772	12.06	87,032,461	33.97
1923	78,345,775	9.99	101,958,153	36.71
1924	101,089,611	12.34	53,784,450	33.99

The following table is prepared from the returns of 75 individuals who reported a net income in excess of $1,000,000 each for the year 1924. The table covers the years 1917 to 1925, both inclusive:

Year	Profits on sale of assets	Percent profit to total income	Losses on sale of assets	Percent losses to total deductions
1917	$2,803,233	2.58	$16,110,792	4.48
1918	1,723,990	1.87	23,955,447	22.47
1919	2,924,452	2.72	36,330,430	43.20
1920	1,243,069	1.22	42,964,016	58.00
1921	437,977	.44	41,459,237	49.54
1922	12,060,266	9.35	44,077,158	43.78
1923	14,732,561	11.27	40,761,119	32.39
1924	53,627,261	28.38	34,615,459	18.82
1925	62,822,952	31.07	45,230,895	19.05

The first table shows that from 1917 to 1920, both inclusive, 4,063 individuals reported gains in the aggregate amount of $84,772,805 and losses aggregating $424,593,321, the net result being approximately $340,000,000 more of losses than gains. In the same period of time the 75 individuals of great wealth reported $8,694,744 in gains and $119,361,285 in losses.

These were years of high values and great activity in the sale of property, yet in each year the losses were greatly in excess of the reported gains. Undoubtedly the very high surtax rates forbade the taking of profits and encouraged the taking of losses. Beginning in the year 1922 a large increase in reported profits is discernible, which amounts in both tables to a substantial excess over losses in 1924, the first year in which the present method of taxing capital gains and treating capital losses went into effect. While some allowance must be made for the great prosperity enjoyed in 1924 and 1925, the statistics support the conclusion that the capital gains tax has removed the restraint exercised by the surtax rate on profit taking.

The same trend in the relation of gains to losses is indicated in the following table prepared for this committee covering the returns of all individual taxpayers. Statistics of losses are not available and the losses stated below are estimated from selected actual figures:

Actual profits and estimated losses on sale of assets regardless of time for which such assets were held

Year	Actual profits on sales of assets	Percent profit to total income	Estimated losses on sale of assets	Approximate percent loss to total deductions
1917	$318,170,617	2.63	$110,720,384	12.50
1918	291,185,704	1.64	571,468,120	31.38
1919	999,364,287	4.45	1,175,140,997	45.58
1920	1,020,542,719	3.82	1,680,304,149	56.87
1921	462,858,673	1.98	1,832,641,653	48.85
1922	991,351,580	3.99	1,251,989,891	35.41
1923	1,172,154,628	4.00	1,619,082,743	36.15
1924	1,513,714,092	5.12	896,906,462	22.45
1925	2,932,228,840	11.60	655,078,024	19.05
Total	9,701,571,140		9,739,332,423

It is pointed out that in all three tables set forth in the preceding pages the ratio of gains to total income shows a marked increase in each case beginning with the year 1922, coinciding with the introduction of the capital gains rate of tax. Although the full effect of this rise may not be attributable entirely to the reduction of the rate, it is significant that the remarkable activity of the stock markets did not take place until some time later. A fair inference may be drawn that the lowering of the rate largely contributed to bring activity in the sale of property.

EXHIBIT 3. ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDED JUNE 30, 1927, PAGES 10–11

Individual income tax: The Revenue Act of 1926 made sweping changes affecting the taxation of individual incomes by increasing the personal credit exemption for single persons 50 percent and that for married persons and heads of families 40 percent, by increasing the earned income credit and by decreasing the normal and surtax rates. More than 44 percent of the individual taxpayers were relieved from income-tax payments. In 1924, 4,459,698 individuals returned taxable net income, whereas in 1925 the number fell to 2,501,166, a decrease of almost 2,000,000. Under the new law the rates of normal tax were reduced from 2 percent, 4 percent, and 6 percent to 1½ percent, 3 percent, and 5 percent, respectively. Surtax rates were cut from a maximum of 40 percent to a maximum of 20 percent. The earned-income provision was so extended as to apply to a maximum of $20,000 of such incomes as compared with the limit in the former act of $10,000.

It was very naturally anticipated that these changes would result in considerable loss of revenue. In fact, the report of the Ways and Means Committee submitted to the House estimated a reduction of $46,000,000 in normal tax paid and a reduction of $98,575,000 in returns from the surtax. As a matter of fact, however, the individual returns for the calendar year 1925 showed a larger tax than did those for 1924. The individual income tax returned for 1924 was $704,265,390, and for 1925, $734,555,183, an increase of $30,289,793. As estimated, there was a very large falling off in the normal-tax return. Before the deduction of earned-income and capital-loss credits, the normal-tax returns decreased $41,434,565. On the other hand, surtax returns decreased only $4,687,627, while the capital-gains tax increased $63,967,907. There was a net gain of $22,845,715, to which must be added $6,067,280, representing a decrease in the earned-income credit, and $1,376,798, representing a decrease in the capital-loss credit.

The results are attributable to several causes: First and most important was the increased prosperity of the country as exemplified by the increased income from certain sources, despite the reduction in number of returns. The income from dividends returned, which were $3,250,913,954 in 1924, rose to $3,464,624,648 in 1925, despite fewer returns and the reductio in total income returned. More important than any other changes was the enormous increase in the income reported from the sale of property, both under the capital-gains section and under the general provisions. Income from the sale of property under the general provision reported for 1924 amounted to $1,124,565,658, while in 1925 this figure had jumped to $1,991,659,499, an increase of $867,093,841, or 77 percent. In addition, income under the capital net-gains section increased from $389,148,434 to $940,569,341, an increase of $551,420,907, or 142 percent, and the tax from $48,603,064 in 1924 to $117,570,071 for 1925. In fact, the increased revenue from the capital-gains tax more than offset the loss of $46,122,192 in normal and surtax returns.

In the second place, the entire decrease in taxable incomes occurred in the classes not in excess of $5,000, while for those in excess of $5,000 it materially increased. The number of taxable returns with income of less than $5,000 decreased 55 percent, while the number in excess of $5,000 increased 18 percent; in excess of $25,000, 32 percent; in excess of $100,000, 67 percent; in excess of $300,000, 104 percent; and in excess of $1,000,000, 176 percent.

The Treasury Department has always contended that in the long run the taxation of income at moderate rates would be more productive than at very high rates. The soundness of this contention appears to have been amply borne out by the tax returns under the law of 1926, for both the calendar years 1925 and 1926.

The sources of the income returned for the calendar year 1925 as compared with 1924 clearly illustrate the effect of the new revenue act. The total national income was undoubtedly greater in 1925 than in 1924, due to increased prosperity, but the income actually returned for individual income-tax purposes was less, due to the entire exemption of over 40 percent of the 1924 income-tax payers. The income returned on account of wages and salaries was about $3,875,000,000 less; from individual businesses about $1,100,000,000 less; from rents and royalties about $538,000,000 less; and from interest and investments about $467,000,000 less. On the other hand, increased income was returned from dividends and from sale of property. Dividends increased about $214,000,000, while the gains from the sale of property, including that returned as capital net gains, increased about $1,418,500,000. The largest reductions in net income reported for tax purposes, in the income from wages and salaries and in the income returned on account of individual business, were in the lower tax brackets. The reductions in returns from returns and royalties and interest and investment income were almost entirely in the lower brackets. The greatest beneficiaries of the 1926 act were, therefore, people of small incomes, wage earners, salaried men, and men operating small individual business enterprises.

What a Managed Currency Has Done to China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN SANBORN
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, 12 years ago, China was forced to abandon her traditional monetary policy of silver money and emulate us by adopting a managed currency. Since that time China's money has steadily depreciated until today it requires 10,000,000 Chinese dollars to buy one American dollar. Resources accumulated over 150 years under constitutional government, free enterprise, and a protective tariff kept us from suffering China's fate, but in reality the American people have lost more under the Marxist formula of managed currency than China. The dollar, and all fixed-dollar-value securities including savings, pensions, and life insurance have lost 63 percent of their value in the 14 years we have operated under a system of "managed currency," and if the dollar continues to depreciate at the rate it has during the past 14 years, our currency will be just as worthless as China's in a few years.

China had no alternative except to adopt a managed currency; it was forced on her by the western powers including England and the United States. In the late 1920's England, through the Bank of India, withdrew from circulation all silver money in India and replaced it with paper currency and coins of pewter-silver. This silver was then dumped on the market; China was unable to absorb it at once, and as a result, the price of silver dropped from 65 cents per ounce to 26 cents per ounce. This wiped out 60 per cent of the purchasing power of more than half of the people of the world, for silver was the money of the Orient and the Middle East.

You will recall that just prior to the drop in the price of silver, our Northwest was sending shiploads of wheat and flour to China, and the South was sending great cargoes of cotton. But when the price of silver dropped this business stopped, and wheat rotted at the northwest ports and China ports, because the money to pay for it had been destroyed just as effectively as if we had dumped $10,000,000,000 in the ocean.

To carry on business, China was forced to pay 5 ounces of silver for what she had previously bought for 2 ounces, and China's silver was drained away just two and one-half times as fast as it would have been normally, and soon her silver reserves required to support her currency had been dissipated.

In 1934 the Congress of the United States passed the Silver Purchase Act raising the price of silver to 45 cents per ounce. Most of those supporting this legislation sincerely believed that this would help China, but it was much like locking the barn door after the horse had been stolen, and actually hurt China more than it helped, since she would be forced to buy silver at 45 cents to restore any monetary reserves which had been depleted at 26 cents. There was nothing China could do but follow the United States and other western powers into a venture in managed currency, with the disastrous results noted above.

A managed currency is nothing more or less than fiat currency, printing-press money, which can work only through collectivism or a completely Government-controlled economy. This means complete coercion of individuals with rationing, controlled production, and price fixing, and all the attendant evils of black markets. That is why the administration is demanding controls; managed currency cannot work any other way.

So long as we continue on a monetary policy of managed currency, we are playing right into the hands of Communist Russia and all other totalitarian states, for so long as Russia can operate on printing-press money, she can sell her gold to the world at the highest price offered. But once we adopt a sound monetary system, Russia will have to use her gold as a reserve to back her currency if she expects any other country to accept it. Does it not seem pretty stupid to rail about Communists while continuing to supply them the tools with which they work and the vehicles on which they have ridden to power—a debauched currency and unsound economy, both of which are being perpetuated under the Bretton Woods scheme, which actually encourages devaluation and currency manipulation?

To send our money or goods to any country, until we have first adopted a sound monetary system, except as is required to prevent hunger and want, is just operation rat-hole and will delay, rather than hasten, world recovery.

Once we adopt a sound monetary system which other countries, of necessity, will have to subscribe to, billions of dollars in gold and silver will come out of hiding and flow back into the banks of the respective countries where it will serve as a 40 percent monetary reserve for the issuance of sound, stable, redeemable currency.

After that is done, there is a possibility that other countries may need an additional $10,000,000,000 to put their economic houses in order, but rather than loaning them ten billion, we would loan them four billion in gold and silver which would serve as a 40 percent reserve for the issuance of ten billion of sound redeemable currency. To insure that this gold and silver was used for the purpose intended we could earmark it to the credit of the countries to which it was loaned, and keep it right here in the United States.

Since China's money has depreciated so that it is practically worthless, the Chinese Government might well repudiate it, and start anew. A $2,000,000,000 loan of gold and silver would serve as a redeemable reserve for $5,000,000,000 sound currency and, give China a stable government. The 400,000,000 Chinese people are thrifty and industrious, many of them are skilled artisans, and with sound money they can develop a sound economy and pay this loan back in a few years. But until we first give the world a sound monetary system, there is not a chance in the world that we will ever receive $1 repayment of the billions of dollars we are now dumping into other countries.

SILVER IS THE POOR MAN'S MONEY

Silver is the poor man's money because gold cannot be coined in small enough denominations. So long as the international bankers can manipulate the price of silver, the rich will get richer and the poor get poorer. But in reality, they only think they are getting richer, for money is not wealth; it is only the measure of the value of goods and services. It is only production that creates wealth—wealth is homes and clothing, steamships and railroad cars, refrigerators, radios, sewing machines, food, and other necessities. When a people are ground down by a cruel monetary and economic system so that they must exert all their efforts to eke out a bare existence like millions of the Chinese people have been forced to do, they are unable to create any new wealth, and the entire world suffers accordingly. Civil or political freedom without economic freedom is a hollow shell.

The United States is the one power on earth that can give the world a sound monetary system and thereby break the economic chains of millions. Have we the courage to meet our responsibility, or will we permit the international racketeers to drag our own people down to the average world standard of living along with the Hottentot and the coolie? Yes; it can happen here if we neglect to do something about this monetary situation.

The Washington Times-Herald of August 6, 1948, carried an article by the eminent journalist and authority on Chinese matters, George E. Sokolsky, which is hereto appended. As stated above, I feel very confident that the Members of Congress who supported the Silver Purchase Act believed they were helping China, but it is very possible that certain members of the New Deal administration had other motives as suggested by Mr. Sokolsky, and recent exposures of Communist spies in Government Departments gives substance to Mr. Sokolsky's charges. His article follows:

THESE DAYS
(By George E. Sokolsky)

Much of China's current troubles are monetary, arising from the debasement of her currency which was the direct result of the American silver policy. China's currency was based on silver and the United States artificially raised the world price of silver in such a manner that that metal flowed into this country and left China with nothing but paper money.

This was as effective an attack upon China as anything the Japanese did during the entire fighting war.

Many of us so said at the time, although one of the arguments for this policy, out of which speculators made fortunes, was that it aided China.

The American Government sent experts to China to assist her in fiscal matters. The State Department and the Treasury were involved in this expert advice. Subsequently, the United States sent other experts to China to advise Chiang Kai-shek on the conduct of the affairs of that country.

Among the advisers was Lauchlin Currie, Canadian-born, who became one of President Roosevelt's "anonymous secretaries," and is now on Miss Elizabeth Bentley's list of accused. I am not prejudging Mr. Currie's activities in China nor is it fair to accuse him of crimes of action or misdemeanors of judgment until all the evidence is in—including his own. But I call attention to the fact that this column has been critical of him, of Owen Lattimore, of General Stilwell, and George Marshall, and of John Carter Vincent, of the State Department, all so-called experts and authorities, for many years.

This is the time to make a full investigation of our relations with China on three questions:

1. Who was responsible for our silver policy; why did we undertake this utterly uneconomic business; who profited by it; what harm has it done to China?

2. What quantity of paper money was shipped from the United States to China; who printed that money; who placed the orders in this country; who instructed the flying of those banknotes over the Hump while vital materials were delayed in Burma and India; who profited from these transactions; were they designed to aid China or so utterly to destroy her economy that the Communist—that is, the Russian—conquest of the country would become inevitable? Further, were payments for these banknotes, printed by a number of American firms and contracted for by Americans, paid out of Chinese funds or from funds borrowed from the United States? Were any American officials involved in this debasing transaction?

3. Why did we pursue a policy of trying to force Chiang Kai-shek to associate himself with the Chinese Communists in spite of the fact that we have in the records of the State Department, the Department of Commerce, Army and Navy intelligence, and the files of newspapers, ample evidence, from 1924 to 1948, of the effort of Soviet Russia to conquer China by means of the Chinese Communist Party? Why did the spokesmen of our Government try to give the impression that the Chinese Communists were not part of Soviet Russia's international apparatus, when since 1920 there has been a full record of the attendance of the Chinese Communists at every session of the Third International, published in the Comintern paper, Inprecorr, giving their speeches, debates, discussions, and reports? Who ordered this false and malicious propaganda to be spread before the American people?

Why was this policy continued after Yalta where the Russians disclosed their purposes; after Potsdam which left nothing to the imagination; after the Russians seized Manchuria and half of Korea and broke all her treaties with us? Why was it pursued by the OWI, the OSS, the State Department, and even by George Marshall after the Russians had disclosed their aims in Asia? Who gave the orders?

If Congress will go to the roots of the matter, investigating these questions, the truth will disclose itself. And that truth will be that somewhere in the directing line, on the high level of policy, were powerful Americans who were working to hand China over to Soviet Russia, which would have given that country, in short time, the whole of Asia, and made America subject to Russia's will.

Synopsis of Federal Taxes on Income Since the Adoption of the Sixteenth Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a synopsis of the Federal income taxes imposed on the income of individuals and of the normal, excess-profits, and war-profits taxes imposed on the income of corporations since the adoption of the sixteenth amendment. In the case of individuals, the special treatment of gains and losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets after 1921 is included:

[1] For 1917 and earlier, the calendar year; for 1918 to 1932, inclusive, the calendar year and fiscal years ending therein; for 1933, the calendar year and fiscal years beginning or ending therein; and for 1934 and later, the calendar year and fiscal years beginning therein. In the case of a rate change during a fiscal year ending in the period 1918 to 1933, inclusive, the tax was prorated. Proration is also provided for in the case of fiscal years ending after June 30, 1942, and in the case of fiscal years ending in 1944.

[2] In the statute effective for 1944 and subsequent years, the term "personal exemption" is no longer used to describe this credit against net income; it is supplanted, for normal tax purposes, by the term "normal tax exemption."

[3] For the years 1934 to 1940, inclusive, the credit was allowed "for each person (other than husband or wife) dependent upon and receiving his chief support from the taxpayer if such dependent person is under 18 years of age or is incapable of self-support because mentally or physically defective." For the years 1941, 1942, and 1943, this allowance was qualified by the provision that "if the taxpayer would not occupy the status of head of a family except by reason of there being 1 or more dependents for whom he would be entitled to credit * * * the credit * * * shall be disallowed with respect to 1 of such dependents."

[4] $2,000 in the case of net incomes in excess of $5,000.

[5] The tax for 1923 was reduced 25 percent by the 1924 act.

[6] Not including the defense tax, which was 10 percent of the combined normal tax and surtax but not to exceed 10 percent of the excess of the net income over the combined nortax unal and surtax.

[7] In the case of a joint return, the exemption is $1,000, except that if the adjusted gross income of one spouse is less than $500, it is $500 plus the adjusted gross income of such spouse.

[8] The tax for 1946 and 1947 computed at this rate was reduced by 5 percent under the Revenue Act of 1945.

[9] Under the Revenue Act of 1948, an additional $600 exemption is granted for each taxpayer if he is blind and an additional $600 if the taxpayer has attained the age of 65 before the close of his taxable year. In the case of a joint return, the additional $600 exemption also applies to the spouse of the taxpayer if the spouse has attained the age of 65, and an additional $600 if the spouse is blind.

[10] The combined tentative normal tax and tentative surtax was reduced by the Revenue Act of 1948 as follows:

If the aggregate is—	The reduction shall be—
Not over $400	17 percent of the aggregate.
Over $400 but not over $100,000.	$68 plus 12 percent of excess over $400.
Over $100,000	$12,020 plus 9.75 percent of excess over $100,000.

Surtax, individual—Personal exemptions and credits for dependents in effect for surtax purposes during 1934 and subsequent years

Act	Year [1]	Personal exemption [2]		Credit for each dependent [4]
		Single	Married [3]
1934	1934–35	$1,000	$2,500	$400
1936	1936–37	1,000	2,500	400
1938	1938	1,000	2,500	400
I. R. C.	1939	1,000	2,500	400
	1940	800	2,000	400
	1941	750	1,500	400
	1942–43	500	1,200	350
	1944–47	500	[2] 1,000	[2] 500
	1948	[5] 600	[5] 1,200	600

[1] The calendar year and fiscal years beginning therein. Prior to 1934, no personal exemption or credit for dependents was allowed for surtax purposes.

[2] In the statute effective for 1944 and subsequent years, the term "personal exemption" is no longer used to describe this credit against net income; it is supplanted, for surtax purposes, by the term "surtax exemption."

This surtax exemption is $500 each for the taxpayer, the taxpayer's spouse (in case of a joint return or, if the spouse has no gross income and is not the dependent of another taxpayer, in the case of a separate return), and each of the taxpayer's dependents whose gross income for the calendar year in which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins is less than $500. No surtax exemption is allowed for a dependent who is married and has made a joint return for a taxable year beginning in such calendar year.

[3] For the years 1934 to 1943, inclusive, a head of a family was allowed the same personal exemption as a married person living with husband or wife. Effective for 1944 and subsequent years, a head of a family, as such, is allowed no surtax exemption.

For the years 1934 to 1943, inclusive, if a husband and wife made separate returns, the personal exemption could be taken by either or divided between them. Effective for 1944 and subsequent years, a married person making a separate return is allowed a surtax exemption of only $500, unless the spouse has no gross income and is not the dependent of another taxpayer, in which case the surtax exemption is $1,000.

[4] For the years 1934 to 1940, inclusive, the credit was allowed "for each person (other than husband or wife) dependent upon and receiving his chief support from the taxpayer if such dependent person is under 18 years of age or is incapable of self-support because mentally or physically defective."

For the years 1941, 1942, and 1943, this allowance was qualified by the provision that "if the taxpayer would not occupy the status of head of a family except by reason of there being one or more dependents for whom he would be entitled to credit * * *, the credit * * * shall be disallowed with respect to one of such dependents."

Effective for 1944 and subsequent years, the statute defines the term "dependent" to mean "any of the following persons over half of whose support, for the calendar year in which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins, was received from the taxpayer:

(A) a son or daughter of the taxpayer, or a descendent of either,

(B) a stepson or stepdaughter of the taxpayer,

(C) a brother, sister, stepbrother, or stepsister of the taxpayer,

(D) the father or mother of the taxpayer, or an ancestor of either,

(E) a stepfather or stepmother of the taxpayer,

(F) a son or daughter of a brother or sister of the taxpayer,

(G) a brother or sister of the father or mother of the taxpayer,

(H) a son-in-law, daughter-in-law, father-in-law, mother-in-law, brother-in-law, or sister-in-law of the taxpayer.

As used in the above definition, "brother" and "sister" include a brother and sister of the half-blood and "for the purposes of determining whether any of the foregoing relationships exist a legally adopted child of a person shall be considered a child of such person by blood. The term 'dependent' does not include any individual who is a citizen or subject of a foreign country unless such individual is resident of the United States or of a country contiguous to the United States."

[5] Effective for 1948, an additional $600 exemption is granted to the taxpayer if he is blind, and an additional $600 exemption if the taxpayer has attained the age of 65 before the close of his taxable year. In the case of a joint return, the spouse of the taxpayer is entitled to the additional exemption of $600 if the spouse is blind and the additional exemption of $600 if the spouse has attained the age of 65.

In the case of a rate change during a fiscal year ending in the period 1918 to 1933, inclusive, the tax was prorated. Proration is also provided for in the case of fiscal years ending after June 30, 1942, and in the case of fiscal years ending in 1944.

[2] For 1933 and prior years, the entire net income; for 1934 and subsequent years, the net income after credit thereagainst of the personal exemption and credit for dependents.

[5] The tax for 1946–47 computed at these rates was reduced by 5 percent by the Revenue Act of 1945.

[6] The combined tentative normal tax and tentative surtax was reduced by the Revenue Act of 1948 as follows:

If aggregate is—	The reduction shall be—
Not over $400	17 percent of the aggregate.
Over $400 but not over $100,000.	$68 plus 12 percent of the excess over $400.
Over $100,000	$12,020 plus 9.75 percent of excess over $100,000.

[2] In the case of a joint return by husband and wife if the Victory tax net income of one was less than $624, the aggregate exemption of both was limited to $624 plus the Victory tax net income of that one.

[3] The amount of the tax was limited to the excess of 90 percent of the net income over the sum of the normal tax and surtax.

[4] In the case of a separate return by each spouse, the maximum was $500.

1938	1938	Same, with the additional exception of property, used in the trade or business, of a character which is subject to an allowance for depreciation. [2]	Short-term: Not over 18 months.	100	Net short-term gain (the excess of the short-term gains for the taxable year over the sum of the short-term losses for the taxable year and the net short-term loss of the preceding taxable year, brought forward to the extent not in excess of the net income for such preceding year) receives no special treatment. ("Preceding taxable year" includes none beginning before 1938.)	Net short-term loss (the excess of short-term losses over short-term gains) is treated as a short-term loss in the succeeding taxable year (for the purpose only of determining the net short-term gain for such year), to the extent not in excess of the net income for the taxable year.

Net capital loss (the excess of losses over the sum of gains—each to the extent taken into account in computing net income—plus the smaller of $1,000 or the net income computed without regard to capital gains and losses) in any taxable year beginning after 1941 is treated as a short-term capital loss in each of the 5 succeeding taxable years, to the extent of the excess of such net capital loss over the total of any net capital gains [3] of any taxable years intervening between the taxable year in which the net capital loss arose and such succeeding taxable year.

See footnotes on following page.

[1] For 1921 to 1932, inclusive, the calendar year and fiscal years ending therein; for 1933, the calendar year and fiscal years beginning or ending therein; and for 1934 and later, the calendar year and fiscal years beginning therein.

The Revenue Act of 1921, the first to provide for special treatment of capital gains and losses, applied to such gains and losses from sales or exchanges consummated after Dec. 31, 1921.

[2] In taxable years beginning in 1934 or later, gains or losses from short sales of property are considered as from sales or exchanges of capital assets. Gains or losses attributable to the failure to exercise privileges or options to buy or sell property are considered as gains or losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets held for 1 year or less under the 1934 and 1936 acts and as short-term capital gains or losses under the 1938 and subsequent acts.

In taxable years beginning in 1934 or later, amounts received by the holder upon the retirement of corporate (including Government) evidences of indebtedness are considered as received in exchange therefor.

In taxable years beginning in 1938 or later, if shares of stock in a corporation or rights to subscribe for or to receive such shares become worthless during the taxable year and are capital assets, the loss resulting therefrom is considered as a loss from the sale or exchange, on the last day of the taxable year, of capital assets.

In taxable years beginning in 1938 or later, if evidences of indebtedness issued by a corporation (including a Government) with interest coupons or in registered form are ascertained to be worthless and charged off during the taxable year, and are capital assets, the loss resulting therefrom is considered as a loss from the sale or exchange, on the last day of the taxable year, of capital assets.

In taxable years beginning in 1942 or later, if the gains from sales or exchanges of "property used in the trade or business," held for more than 6 months, plus the gains from the compulsory or involuntary conversion of such property and capital assets held for more than 6 months, exceed the losses from such sales, exchanges, and conversions, such gains and losses shall be considered as from sales or exchanges of capital assets held for more than 6 months. If such gains do not exceed such losses, neither are considered as from sales or exchanges of capital assets. (For the purpose of this provision, neither the percentage limitation on gains and losses taken into account nor the income and gains limitation on allowable losses is applicable; and losses upon the distribution, in whole or in part, theft or seizure, or requisition or condemnation of "property used in the trade or business" or capital assets held for more than 6 months are considered losses from a compulsory or involuntary conversion.)

In taxable years beginning in 1943 or later, if a nonbusiness debt becomes worthless within the taxable year, the loss resulting therefrom is considered a loss from the sale or exchange, during the taxable year, of a capital asset held for not more than 6 months.

In taxable years beginning in 1944 or later, at the election of the taxpayer, the cutting of timber (for sale or use in the taxpayer's trade or business) by the taxpayer who owns or has the contract right to cut the timber (provided he owned or had the contract right to cut if for a period of more than 6 months prior to the beginning of the taxable year) is considered a sale or exchange.

[3] Net capital gain is the excess of the sum of capital gains plus the smaller of $1,000 or the net income (computed without regard to capital gains and losses) over capital losses. Net capital gain and net capital loss for the taxable year are computed without regard to any net capital loss carry-over to that year. For the purposes of the net income limitations on net capital gain and net capital loss, adjusted gross income is substituted for net income if the tax is measured by adjusted gross income.

A net short-term capital loss for the last taxable year beginning in 1941 (computed without regard to any carry-over from the preceding taxable year), in an amount not in excess of the net income for such taxable year, is treated as a short-term capital loss for the succeeding taxable year, to the extent of the net short-term capital gain of such succeeding taxable year. This treatment is in consideration of the carry-over from taxable years 1941 previously allowed.

[1] For 1909 to 1912, inclusive, the calendar year; for 1913 to 1932, inclusive, the calendar year and fiscal years ending therein; for 1933, the calendar year and fiscal years beginning or ending therein; for 1934 and later the calendar year and fiscal years beginning therein.

In the case of a rate change during a fiscal year ending in any of the years 1916 to 1933, inclusive, the tax was prorated. Proration is also provided for in the case of fiscal years ending after June 30 in 1942, and in the case of fiscal years ending in 1944.

[2] Net income, the excess of gross income over deductions, varies under the several acts by reason of variation in the character of items excluded from gross income or allowed as deductions. Credits against net income are indicated in this column.

Dividends received from domestic corporations have been treated as follows: From 1909 through Feb. 28, 1913, net income was "exclusive" of such dividends; from Mar. 1, 1913, through 1917, they were not excluded or deducted from gross income or credited against net income; from 1918 through 1935, they were deducted from gross income; and for 1936 and subsequent years, credited 85 percent against net income, the credit not to exceed, during the years 1938 to 1941, inclusive, 85 percent of the adjusted net income, or, in 1942 and subsequent years, 85 percent of the adjusted net income reduced by the credit for income subject to excess-profits tax.

Adjusted net income, for 1938 and subsequent years, is net income minus the credit for interest on obligations of the United States and corporations organized by the United States.

[3] Although the sixteenth amendment was not adopted until 1913, the excise tax imposed by the Tariff Act of 1909 is included in the table, as essentially like the taxes imposed directly on income by subsequent legislation. Section 38 of that act imposed on corporations an annual "special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business * * * equivalent to 1 percent upon the entire net income * * * over and above $5,000 * * * exclusive of * * * dividends * * * ."

[4] The net income minus the credit for interest (if included in gross income) on United States obligations and for 85 percent of dividends received from domestic corporations.

[5] Special class net income is the adjusted net income minus the credit for dividends received. That credit is 85 percent of the amount of dividends received from domestic corporations subject to the income tax; it may not exceed, however, 85 percent of the adjusted net income, which is the net income minus the credit for interest on obligations of the United States and corporate instrumentalities thereof.

[6] This first $25,000 is made up of: First, interest subject to credit; second, dividends subject to credit; and third, the excess, if any, of $25,000 over such interest and dividends.

The portion of the net income in excess of $25,000 is made up of: First, any interest subject to credit which is not included in the first $25,000; second, any dividends subject to credit which are not included in the first $25,000; and third, any balance of net income.

[7] See the second and third paragraphs of the note, above, designated (3).

[8] Normal tax net income means the adjusted net income minus the credit for dividends received.

Adjusted net income means the normal tax net income minus the credit for interest on obligations of the United States and corporate instrumentalities of the United States.

[9] Normal tax net income here means the adjusted net income minus the credits for income subject to excess-profits tax and for dividends received.

[1] For 1917 to 1921, inclusive, the calendar year and fiscal years ending therein; for 1940 and thereafter, the calendar year and fiscal years beginning therein.
In the case of fiscal years beginning in 1916 and ending in 1917, the tax is proportioned to the 1917 portion of the fiscal year. In the case of fiscal years ending in any of the years 1918 to 1921, inclusive, the tax is the sum of the taxes computed on the basis of the two calendar years involved, proportioned to the calendar year portion of the fiscal year. In the case of fiscal years ending in 1922, the tax is proportioned to the 1921 portion of the fiscal year.

Proration is also provided for in the case of fiscal years ending after June 30 in 1942, and in the case of fiscal years ending in 1944.

[2] Any corporation the net income of which is less than $3,000 is exempt from the tax, however.

[3] Proration is on the basis of the net income attributable to Government contracts, which determines the portion of the tax payable on the basis of the 1918 rates. Net income not so attributable determines the portion payable at current year rates.

[4] Repealed for taxable years beginning after Dec. 31, 1945, by the Revenue Act of 1945.

The American Farmer: Your Friend and Mine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD G. ROHRBOUGH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ROHRBOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to say a word in behalf of your friend and mine, the American farmer—the neighbor up the hollow or on the next mountaintop, the taxpayer who squares his account with the Government each year and prays it to let him alone, the man who works from sunup to sundown and leaves the squabble about the 40-hour week to others.

Politicians in their speeches sometimes refer to him as "a little guy" but he's every bit as important in normal times as his city cousins and right now his job is even more vital.

He has been called upon for the most—yet considered perhaps least—in administration demands for wage and price controls. The basic battle in the world today is against hunger. Who's going to do more about this situation than the American farmer? What he brings forth from the soil is tremendously important to the economic, political, and financial condition of the world.

Yet it has been proposed by the administration that we kick him around a bit. The President would tell him how much he may charge for farm products and how much he must pay someone to help him with his chores.

It is my opinion that at this time more would be lost than gained by taking this advice. Everyone stands to lose under what President Truman himself not so long ago described as police-state methods. The farmer would suffer most.

I grew up on a West Virginia farm. Perhaps that is why I feel called upon at this time to answer these charges that it is the farmer who is to blame for inflation.

Perhaps it is true, as the administration contends, that farm income has gone up more than that of any other principal occupation. But if farm income has increased, even to a considerable extent, was there not plenty of room for it to increase? Through the years, farm profits have been almost nonexistent. Who is there to deny that the farmer was entitled to a better return upon his investment and greater reward for his backbreaking toil?

The farmer, his wife, and his children punch no time clocks. They work until the job is done. That is how, during the last 6 years, they have been able to balance the diet of one-third of the world's population with only one-twelfth of its producing land.

Yet I have heard it charged in Washington that it is the farmer who must answer for the high food costs when it is a well-known fact that the farmer receives only a little more than half of what the consumer pays for the food he buys.

It is much easier, of course, to blame others than oneself. Perhaps that is why it is not politically palatable to agents of government, who have acquired the habit of buying their way out of hot spots with inflation money, to look at the inflation picture in a more objective fashion.

It will require the strictest economy in Government to release any considerable amount of the one-third of the people's incomes which Government now takes, either directly or indirectly, for its own spending.

Secretary of Agriculture Anderson has estimated that price controls under OPA cost the people 10 cents out of every dollar. The restoration of price control at the present time on this basis would cost the American people $12,000,000,000 per year.

More important, there is a real danger that if the weight of Government were thrown against present agriculture price levels, a depression would follow.

In addition to greater economy in Government, the situation calls for measures to encourage private capital and private enterprise to work and produce the greatest possible quantity of goods and services.

Deficits in the years since 1931 total approximately $6,000 per family. Can we place the blame for this at the farmer's door? I think not.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that the National Resources Economic Committee—created by the United States Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee to study and report upon the factors affecting production—published a very complete report on the minerals position of the United States in 1947, which has already been reprinted on account of the wide demand for the work.

The special committee headed by Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, of Nevada, has announced that the studies and reports, which will include fuels, timber and wood products, agriculture, iron and steel, fisheries and manufacturers, will be kept up to date.

Mr. Speaker in that connection I hand to the Public Printer for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the data and information under the heading, "Additional information and data submitted by the Special National Resources Economic Committee—Bring up to date data already published through the minerals position of the United States report," prepared under the direction of the able Senator from Nevada:

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION AND DATA SUBMITTED BY THE SPECIAL NATIONAL RESOURCES ECONOMIC COMMITTEE—BRINGING UP TO DATE DATA ALREADY PUBLISHED THROUGH THE "MINERALS POSITION OF THE UNITED STATES" REPORT

Data and information is herewith submitted for the RECORD bringing up to date insofar as is possible at this time the 1947 "Minerals Position of the United States" report on strategic and critical minerals:

INDUSTRY STOCKS

Producers' (smelters and refiners) stocks of crude and refined copper totaled only 273,000 tons at the end of 1947, or 27 percent less than the average inventories held in the period 1935–39, when consumption was less than half of that for 1947.

Fabricators held 423,432 tons of refined copper (including in-process metal and primary fabricated shapes) at the end of 1947, compared with 300,543 tons at the end of 1939. At the 1947 rate of consumption, however, working stocks were 293,859 tons at the end of 1947 compared with 184,833 tons in 1939. There was an excess of 104,922 tons of booked orders over stocks on hand at the end of 1947.

RESERVES

Extensions of known ore bodies in the United States since the domestic estimates were made, particularly in the San Manuel deposit, Arizona; Yerington, Nev.; the White Pine mine, Michigan; and because of the new Butte development, Montana, are believed to have offset production since that time, so that present reserves are believed to be little changed from the totals reported, although the grade of the reserves is somewhat lower.

DOMESTIC RESERVES

There has been no significant change in domestic lead reserves since preparation by the Bureau of Mines and Geological Survey of the estimates published in the hearings of the Senate National Resources Economic Subcommittee of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, at the first session of the Eightieth Congress. Any considerable increase in reserves as a result of the gain in market price of lead since data for these hearings were compiled has been largely eliminated by a parallel rise in operating costs.

INDUSTRY STOCKS

Consumers', dealers', and producers' stocks of mercury at the end of 1947 totaled 19,300 flasks and were 20,900 at the end of March 1948.

IMPORTS

Imports of mercury for consumption were 12,958 flasks in 1947 of which 3,498 were from Spain, 3,107 from Japan (more than 60 percent of which was Italian metal reshipped), 1,783 from Mexico, 2,900 from Italy, 1,400 from Yugoslavia, and 270 from Chile.

RESERVES

More mercury has been mined since January 1944 than was estimated to be in reserve at $100 a flask when the estimates were made. The price was above $100 in 1944 and 1945 but below that level thereafter. At the prevailing price of $75 the present small production is threatened and whether or not there are any reserves at the current price level is questionable. Little, if any, of the reserves estimated to be available at $195 and $300 a flask are believed to have been mined. The stimulation of mining and exploration by the high war prices resulted in the development of many extensions of known ore bodies and in some new discoveries, notably the Cordero, Nev., ore deposit.

STOCKS

Because of the very small stocks, current absence of domestic mine production, and large unsatisfied demand, tin has remained one of the only two metals still subject to Government allocation.

INDUSTRY STOCKS

Domestic consumers had 831,898 short tons of metallurgical manganese ore on hand December 31, 1947. This quantity was sufficient to last about 7½ months at the 1947 consumption rate. Dry-cell manufacturers had 29,426 tons, also equivalent to a 7½ months' inventory. Chemical manufacturers had 19,223 tons, a year's supply.

RESERVES

It is estimated that there are in the United States about 10,000,000 long tons of material which could be used as a source of manganese at a base price of $1 per long-ton unit. Approximately 2,000,000 long tons of metallurgical manganese could be recovered from these reserves. Most of the ore is in four districts: Butte and Philipsburg, Mont.; Three Kids, Nev.; and Batesville, Ark. In addition to this material extremely large reserves of low-grade material containing 1 to 10 percent manganese occur in the United States from which manganese could be obtained by known processes at high cost. A table showing estimated reserves of manganese ore in the United States is attached.

XIII. CHROMITE

INDUSTRY STOCKS

Stocks of chromite on hand in domestic consumers' yards on December 31, 1947, totaled 411,066 short tons. At the 1947 rate of consumption this would last approximately 6 months. The inventories of various grades were as follows: metallurgical 191,103 short tons, sufficient to last 6 months at the 1947 consumption rate; refractory 144,381 tons, a 5½-month supply; chemical 75,582 tons, a 6½-month supply.

RESERVES

The only know reserves of metallurgical lump ore in the United States occur in California, Oregon, and Alaska. The total does not exceed 25,000 tons. There are no known reserves of strictly refractory-grade ore, although some domestic ore might serve for refractory purposes. Data for reserves of low-grade material from a report by the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey are attached. There have been no significant changes in these figures recorded since their preparation.

The over-all reserve position of tungsten, insofar as quantity is concerned, has not changed materially from that set forth on pages 300–303 of the hearings before a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate, Eightieth Congress, first session, 1947. Since that report was prepared, however, a large reserve in Idaho has been exhausted, but reserves in Pine Creek, Calif., and in North Carolina have developed favorably.

INDUSTRY STOCKS

Stocks of strategic chrysotile asbestos held by industry on December 31, 1947, were 2,337 short tons or 9 months' supply at the 1947 rate of consumption. Amosite stocks were 2,181 short tons or 5 months' supply.

Stocks of nonstrategic grades are not definitely known but indications are that they are low.

SOURCE OF IMPORTS

The Union of South Africa supplied 100 percent of our imports of strategic amosite and Southern Rhodesia supplied 100 percent of our strategic chrysotile.

In 1947 Canada supplied 94 percent of our total asbestos imports. Southern Rhodesia and the Union of South Africa combined supplied 5 percent.

RESERVES

Because of the generally inadequate data on the extent of chrysotile deposits in the United States, or the quality or grade of the contained asbestos, estimates of reserves are only approximate. On the basis of present information it is believed that the United States reserves of chrysotile asbestos of all grades total about 750,000 short tons, of which not more than 4,000 tons consist of long fiber.

XVI. BAUXITE

Bauxite, being important as aluminum ore and in the manufacture of abrasive and chemicals, is listed as a strategic material because of the limitations of the domestic ore and the consequent dependence on imports. Much of the domestic bauxite is of high silica content and only the Hurricane Creek, Ark., plant of the five domestic alumina plants is equipped to process it economically. In addition, domestic bauxite of the proper analysis for use in abrasives is becoming increasingly scarce, thereby creating a supply problem for that industry, aggravated by the fact that the imported material also fails to meet specifications.

INDUSTRY STOCKS

At the end of 1947 stocks of domestic and foreign bauxite at consumers' plants totaled 411,000 long tons and producers' stocks were 290,000 tons. All of the above figures are preliminary, on a dried equivalent basis. In addition to the industry stocks there were 2,785,526 long dry tons of high-silica bauxite in a War Assets Administration stock pile in Arkansas.

SOURCE OF IMPORTS

Of the 1,821,580 tons of bauxite imported in 1947, 1,660,823 tons, or 91 percent, came from Surinam; 108,562 tons (6 percent) was from British Guiana; and the remaining 52,195 tons (3 percent) was from the Netherlands East Indies, principally Bintan.

RESERVES

Domestic reserves of bauxite were estimated by the combined staffs of the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey in 1944 at 36,341,000 long tons. This included all material containing not more than 15 percent SiO_2, not more than 6 percent FeO, and not less than 40 percent Al_2O_3, recoverable bauxite on a mined and dried basis, existing in deposits 8 feet or more thick. Later information has not altered the above estimate materially. It may be presumed then that, on the same basis and allowing for mining during the past 3 years, domestic reserves now total about 33,000,000 tons.

However, it should be noted that ore of a higher iron content is usable at Hurricane Creek, and this fact may permit the increase of the above reserve figure by as much as 50 percent.

THE "BUY AMERICAN" CLAUSE OF THE STOCK PILE ACT

AUGUST 4, 1948.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In your messages to the second session of the Eightieth Congress you stressed national defense. In your message to the current special session you have stressed anti-inflation. National defense requires that strategic metals and minerals be produced in large quantities in wartime and stock piled in peacetime.

I therefore wish to call to your attention that, under existing legislation, you have the power (1) to enable the mining industry to provide large quantities of metals for defense purposes and (2) to curb inflationary trend of metal prices through exercise of the specific authority given you by congressional action.

Statutory authority: Your authority, which was created as the expressed intent of Congress, lies in the "buy American" clause of the Stock Pile Act, which governs the expenditure during this fiscal year of $600,000,000 for procurement of metals. On July 23, 1946, you signed S. 752 (Public Law 520; U. S. C., title 50, sec. 98-98f) usually referred to as the Stock Pile Act. At the time of signing this act you stated that you did so with reluctance because it required that purchases be made in accordance with title III of the act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1520; U. S. C., title 41, secs. 10a, 10c), popularly called the Buy American Act.

In your public statement of July 23, 1946, you pointed out that it gave the American producer a preference over the foreign producer and that the "buy American" provision therefore was not in accord with our foreign economic policy. In spite of your references, however, the "buy American" clause has been ignored in the administration of the Stock Pile Act.

The Buy American Act reads:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, and unless the head of the department and independent establishment concerned shall determine it to be inconsistent with the public interest, or the cost to be unreasonable, only such unmanufactured articles, materials or supplies as have been mined or produced in the United States * * * shall be acquired for public use."

I should like to point out that whatever our foreign policy may be the Buy American provision is the law of the land and has been so recognized by the different departments of Government. Congress reaffirmed this policy which became law on March 3, 1933, by including it in the Stock Pile Acts of 1939 (Public Law 117) and 1946 (Public Law 520). Pursuant to the Buy American Act it has become the declared policy of the Bureau of Federal Supply (Circular No. 37, as amended) to pay a differential of 25 percent in favor of domestic materials on purchases where the foreign bid exceeds $100, although the statute sets no limit.

Since the passage of Public Law 520, the Government has purchased considerable, though insufficient, quantities of metals for stock piling, principally outside the United States, but there has been no determination that the purchase of an equivalent quantity from domestic sources is inconsistent to the public interest or the cost is unreasonable.

Accordingly, under the Buy American Act, domestic producers should have been given an opportunity of supplying the stock-pile requirements. With the help of the price differential permitted under the act, the difference in the standards of living in competing countries and the United States could have been adjusted and made domestic production possible.

Congressional policy: It is quite apparent that insertion of the Buy American provision in the Stock Pile Act was consistent with congressional policy in stimulating the development and production of strategic and critical materials required for a national emergency. During World War II under the War Powers Act, the Government paid premium prices to obtain additional production of copper, lead, and zinc. In 1947 you called the attention of Congress to the critical situation in Europe, and Congress, in order to assure the production of needed materials, passed legislation to extend the premium price plan for two more years or until June 30, 1949.

You saw fit to veto this bill—H. R. 1652. Similar legislation was introduced by myself and others in the second session of the Eightieth Congress. The legislation was approved by committees in both Houses and was debated on the Senate floor but was not finally voted upon because of the lack of time for proper consideration in the closing hours of the session. Neither of these two bills should have been so necessary if the full purpose and intent of Congress as expressed in the Stock Pile Act had been put into practice and carried out. The fact that the vetoed bill and such additional legislation which I have mentioned have not become law does not change the expressed congressional intent nor diminish your authority.

National defense needs: Stock-pile requirements of most metals are far from fulfillment. Furthermore, stock piling alone is not enough protection; an adequate supply of metals in time of war is dependent on both a stock pile and a going concern or productive-mining industry. Through use of the Buy American Act we can keep our mines producing and through the maintenance of an active industry we can encourage exploration and development to find new ore bodies and increase known reserves of the necessary strategic and critical minerals.

We must have metals for defense; we must strive for a permanent production which can be expanded for war emergencies, because it is impossible to stock pile enough; we must find new mines. We have done none of these things during the past 2 years, and without Government aid the mining industry cannot do them for us in direct competition with the low-wage nations of the world.

Anti-inflation measures: In a tight market, such as the present copper, lead, and zinc markets, each purchase exerts pressure for higher prices. Purchases for stock pile at market prices during shortages increase the pressure and are undoubtedly an important factor in the recent sharp increases in nonferrous metal prices. But since, in mining, price determines the grade of ore which can be mined profitably, an increase in price increases production only where there are submarginal grades of ore. Thus, production can be increased by premium payments for new production if this method is preferred to the import fee method of equalizing the costs of production, without causing price increases on all production to consumers.

In the past, application of the Buy American Act to purchases for stock pile would have reduced the pressure on the market and would surely have prevented such sudden large price increases. In the future, application of the Buy American Act could create a producer's development incentive payment applicable only to the high-cost producer; this would not be a roll-back or consumer's subsidy. Failure to obtain additional production for the stock pile according to the legislative direction, has thus contributed to the present inflation, and continued failure will help push the inflation spiral upward.

Deterioration of industry: Since the abandonment of the premium-price plan there have been serious depressions in many mining areas, notably the tri-State region of Missouri, Kansas, and Oklahoma. As existing mines exhaust their higher grade ores, this situation is becoming more widespread. Purchasing for stock pile under the Buy American Act could greatly benefit these regions and preserve their skills and organizations for times of emergency.

Recommendations: With the existing shortages of many critical and strategic minerals, I suggest and recommend that you initiate at the earliest possible moment such steps as may be required to successfully implement the law as it now exists and thus carry out the intention of Congress in providing a stock pile of critical materials for common defense from domestic sources so far as possible.

In my opinion, further legislation is not necessary to define more clearly the intent and will of Congress in the disbursement of the funds appropriated for stock-pile purchases.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE W. MALONE,
United States Senate.

Additional data and information will be submitted as available on any policy change affecting the production of the strategic and critical minerals—and to keep the 1947 "Mineral Position of the United States" report published by the National Resources Economic Committee up to date.

Record of Accomplishments of Present Republican Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the Eightieth Congress has made a record for constructive legislation that will prove beneficial to the welfare of the Nation and its people.

It has been no easy task. The problems, both domestic and foreign, have been difficult of solution. They are the outgrowth of 16 years of deficit spending, of war and reconstruction policies based upon controls and regimentation, of foreign aid that has been expensive without producing results commensurate with the amount expended, and principles and policies that in many instances were totally foreign to our American way of life. In many instances it would seem, from revelations recently come to light, that these policies were even administered by individuals whose loyalty to America was open to question.

Naturally, it has been impossible in the short space of time that has intervened since the Eightieth Congress was convened in January 1947, to correct all of the conditions that are the outgrowth of the policies that prevailed under the preceding administration. Furthermore, Congress has unfortunately been handicapped by opposition from the President. It is remarkable that so much has been accomplished by the Congress under existing and adverse circumstances. Consequently, all that is necessary to be done has not been done. There is much more to be done. It will be done by the next Congress when, as a result of the election in November, there will be cooperation between the President to be elected and the Congress. This is one of the fundamental needs of our country today. The problems are too serious to be the subject of differing political viewpoints. We need unity and understanding between the President and Congress. There is every indication that this will be the result that will follow the next election.

Certainly it can be expected that the next Congress, recognizing the need, will strive to meet the responsibility that will be theirs. As an indication of this willingness I will make a short summary of what the present Congress has already done, believing that it gives proof that the Congress is anxious and willing to meet and solve the problems that now beset us. Given the necessary time and cooperation of the President it will do so.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF REPUBLICAN CONGRESS

Among the many accomplishments of the present Republican Congress are the following:

REESTABLISHED COMPETITIVE ENTERPRISE

It liberated our people from the paralyzing effect of 76,000 rules, regulations, directives, and orders, thereby making it possible for the energy and capacity of our people to actively and freely engage in business without the handicaps that had curtailed production and discouraged private enterprise. The fact we now have all-time highs in employment, production, and wages, and a record $200,000,000,000 annual income is a justification of the course pursued by the Republican Congress that no one will deny.

BALANCED FEDERAL BUDGET

For 16 years the Government had operated on a deficit basis. It spent billions of dollars more each year than it received. All of this was added to the national debt, which at the close of the war amounted to approximately $270,000,000,000.

The fiscal year of 1948, however, instead of being closed with a deficit had a surplus of approximately $8,500,000,000, seven times larger than at any previous time in our history as a nation. This was the first full year under a Republican Congress. This magnificent accomplishment was attained by cutting down Federal expenses and building up our national income as a result of the judicious laws passed by the Republican Congress.

CUT NATIONAL DEBT

Under the Republican-controlled Congress the spendthrift budgets presented by the President were cut down by the Congress. Upward of $7,000,000,000 was eliminated in proposed expenditures, and hold-over wartime appropriations were canceled. All of this made it possible to reduce the national debt by $7,000,000,000. A very sizable reduction for 1 year, and with more to follow each succeeding year.

CUT IN TAXES

When the Republican Congress took over in January 1947, the people of the Nation were paying the same high taxes that they did during the war. But with peace and reduction of war expenses the people had a right to expect a reduction in taxes. This, however, had not been forthcoming until the election of a Republican Congress. As a result of Republican policies and laws passed by the Republican Congress, taxes have been reduced $4,800,000,000 per year. This was done despite three Presidential vetoes.

The bill as passed directly benefits the wage earners and the low-income group. Under its provisions 7,400,000 wage earners in the lowest brackets were removed entirely from the tax roll; married couples are allowed to divide income for tax purposes, thereby allowing additional exemptions, reducing the income bracket, and decreasing the amount of tax to be paid. Additional exemptions were allowed to those over 65 years of age and to certain handicapped persons. As further evidence of the effort to benefit the lower income groups, it will be found that 71 percent of the tax relief goes to those with incomes less than $5,000. With the help of a Republican President, a Republican Congress can and will make additional tax cuts next year.

IMPROVED LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Work stoppages had become one of the most serious obstacles to recovery. The money loss to workers had become stupendous, in many instances causing distress to the workers and their families, and, not infrequently adversely affecting not only the public welfare, but also union workers in other industries not parties to the particular labor dispute. Thoughtful citizens and workers alike had come to realize that something should should be done to remedy the situation. Something was done. The Republican Congress, with the assistance of the Democrats in Congress, enacted over a Presidential veto a fair and workable labor-management law, a law that respected democratic principles. It sought no harm to the legitimate rights of employer or employee. It has done no injury to the rights of either while recognizing the rights of each. Since the enactment of this law there has been more peace and contentment in our labor relations than before its enactment. At the same time more satisfactory wage and working conditions have found expression in the labor-management contracts entered into since the enactment of the new law. While there may be some changes that should be made in the law, yet, as a whole it has worked well. It has brought about not only more satisfactory relations between labor and management, but also it has brought the labor unions under the control of the workers who compose the union. It protects the right of all union members as against arbitrary actions of labor bosses, safeguards the right of the worker to strike, does not curtail or hamper the right to bargain collectively, establishes constitutional rights for both employer and worker, and protects the public welfare.

FOREIGN AID

Recognizing the necessity to aid foreign nations in distress as the result of the war, and, to offset the aggressive onslaughts of communism against these nations, the Republican Congress has appropriated $9,579,657,128 for relief to impoverished humanity in foreign countries. It has set up an Economic Cooperation Administration to direct and control the funds appropriated for foreign relief and reestablishment of national economies. We joined the International Refugee Organization and gave $71,073,900 to carry on its work—enacted a bill to admit 205,000 displaced persons in the next 2 years and permit 15,000 refugees already in the United States to remain.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

To make certain that our Nation is ready to meet any emergency that may arise as the result of the disturbed conditions throughout the world, Congress has unified the National Military Establishment, appropriated approximately $48,000,000,000 to strengthen and modernize our military forces—land, sea, and air; adopted a temporary selective service system; authorized $178,000,000 for merchant marine expansion, and revised Army regulations to provide completely fair treatment under Army law for officers and enlisted men.

VETERAN BENEFITS

Passed 188 bills to meet needs of all war veterans, including increased compensation for disabled veterans with and without dependents; increased compensation for dependent survivors of war dead; increased subsistence payments to World War II veterans in institutional training; increased allowances for student GI's; increased proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training; cashing of GI terminal-leave bonds; higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans; and aids for veterans' housing. The record made by the Eightieth Congress in behalf of veterans is one of which we all may be proud. It is a guaranty of continuing desire and intention to meet the needs of our veterans of all wars, their survivors and dependents.

HOME BUILDING

Housing has been and continues to be one of the most outstanding needs of the Nation. As a result of the war, when the building of homes was impossible because of the necessity to put our all into the war effort, and with the scarcity of building materials and labor that has existed since the war, and unwise policies, the problem gradually got out of hand. However, under laws enacted and policies adopted by the Republican Congress, there has been a steady, indeed remarkable, growth in the number of houses and dwelling apartments that have been built. In 1948 it is estimated that approximately 1,000,000 new dwelling units will have been provided. This exceeds any year for building of homes in the entire history of the Nation. It is hard to realize the truth of this in view of the shortage that still exists. But the fact remains that we are rapidly making progress of a substantial character.

The laws passed by Congress at the session just closed will add greatly to the acceleration of the construction of homes under $5,000 and $6,000 for purchase or rental, and will also greatly aid our veterans in obtaining living quarters. The great need that still remains, and for which adequate legislation is due for passage in the next session of Congress, relates to housing for the low-income groups. For the benefit of these groups, unable because of financial inability to either purchase or rent at the high prices now prevailing, a public housing, low-rent, and slum-clearance program should be enacted.

COST OF LIVING

The high cost of living affects all of us. None can escape it. It is the result of many elements in our economic life. It cannot be eradicated by a stroke of the pen, nor by any single piece of legislation. Our economic life is too complicated and too involved to enable a remedy to be so easily applied. One of the most important elements that has produced the present condition is the fact that for upward of 16 years we had deficit spending by our Government. This spending of billions and billions of dollars beyond our income over a long period of time added very materially to our public debt, and created forces of inflation. Then the war with its tremendous expenditures had a very important effect, not only from the standpoint of suddenly raising wages, but also because of the shortages in consumer goods. There was no way for the people to spend their earnings for articles they wanted except by competition with each other. This sent prices still higher. Furthermore, it was necessary for us to finance in large part the war, provide the food, clothes, and all the necessities of life for millions of people outside our own domain. This created shortages and sent the prices higher for grains, meat, clothes, and all that is necessary to sustain life. Since the war the continued sending of our money, goods, and commodities of every description abroad to assist in foreign rehabilitation has likewise made its contribution to high prices. All of this has created an upsurge that is irresistible. It cannot be stopped overnight nor in any short time.

The Congress before adjournment passed a law to control credits. It is hoped that this will help some in preventing prices going higher. It is not a cure-all, but at least it gives promise of some relief, or it would not have had the support of Democrats and Republicans alike, the vote being almost unanimous. There is much more to be done. Careful studies are being made by trained economists. The results of their studies and those being conducted by committees of Congress will be the basis of additional remedies to be applied when the next Congress comes into session next January. It may be even sooner than that. There is a possibility that Congress will meet shortly after the November elections, when these important problems can be considered and decided under circumstances less political than during the present election campaign. We must meet and solve the problem of the high cost of living. The economic welfare of the Nation, as well as the welfare of our people, demand it.

FARM AID

The Congress has passed laws, the direct purpose of which is to make certain that the farming industry is maintained in a healthy and satisfactory condition in relation to the general economic condition of the Nation. It has passed a long-range agricultural program; provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress; appropriated more than $500,000,000 for soil conservation; provided for the greatest rural road-building program in history; provided stability of agriculture through a new, workable Crop Insurance Act; chartered Commodity Credit Corporation, and greatly expanded Government aid in campaigns against livestock foot-and-mouth disease and crop deterrents, such as weeds, insects, and other pests. A complete study of the whole agricultural situation is under way with the understanding that it will be brought before the next Congress for enactment.

CARE FOR NEEDY AND AGED

The Republican Congress expanded social security. It passed over a Presidential veto a bill increasing the monthly payments for the needy aged, the blind and dependent children, thereby adding $184,000,000 annually to social-security payments received by 3,500,000 needy dependent children, the aged, and the blind.

PROMOTION OF HEALTH

Established a National Heart Institute within the United States Public Health Service to conduct a widespread study and research into the diseases of the heart and circulation. It provided $500,000 for the research institute to combat these diseases, known as America's No. 1 killer. The importance of this work can be readily understood when it is realized that these diseases affect 1 person in 16, cause 1 out of every 3 deaths and result in a loss of 152,000,000 workdays a year.

The Congress also provided for a Dental Research Institute to make special study and research into the causes and cure of diseases that come within the scope of dental problems.

It also provided $28,400,000 for the National Cancer Institute to study the disease of cancer and to disseminate knowledge of how to reduce its terrible death rate.

PAY INCREASE FOR GOVERNMENT WORKERS

Congress also provided a cost-of-living pay increase for postal and other Federal employees. This gave to 478,000 postal workers a pay increase of $450 a year each, and 840,000 civil-service employees a boost of $330 each. To meet this additional expense postal rates in a limited category were raised to offset the $600,000,000 cost of the pay raise.

EXTENDED RECIPROCAL TRADE ACT

Extended for 1 year, with reasonable safeguards, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, with amendments requiring the President to report to Congress and the people when in secretly making a trade agreement with a foreign country, he exceeds recommendations made by the United States Tariff Commission pursuant to standards prescribed by Congress for protection of American industries and agriculture.

AID TO SMALL BUSINESS

Created special committees of the Senate and House of Representatives to see that small businesses, the backbone of American industry, get proper recognition, especially in the awarding of Government contracts for national defense, aid to foreign nations and otherwise.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION

Established a bipartisan commission, headed by former President Herbert Hoover, which is preparing for submission to the next Congress, a comprehensive plan for reorganization of the administrative branch of the Government in the interests of efficiency and economy—a major operation on the tax-consuming bureaus that now infest the Government, causing waste of public funds.

EXPOSED COMMUNISTS

The conditions that have been revealed by Senate and House committees in recent weeks leaves no doubt that there has been and still are disloyal persons in Government departments. It is regrettable to learn that they have been in positions of power and influence where they have had access to top secrets of Government. Through the years the Republicans in Congress have tried to dislodge these Communists and fellow travelers. They met with little success in their efforts until the Eightieth Congress came into Republican control. Since that time the work that has been done has been tremendous. It has been carried on under great difficulties. Instead of having the help and full cooperation of the executive branch of the Government, it has had to contend with its opposition and positive refusal to cooperate. It is unbelievable that persons in high office would lend their assistance to covering up or precluding the fullest inquiry into all acts of alleged disloyalty. With a Republican President and a Republican Congress working together, the people of this Nation can be assured that the work already started will be carried on even more aggressively and relentlessly until every Communist and disloyal person, Red or pink, is driven out of our Government service, and together with spying foreign agents, are put in jail where they belong.

The Republican Party rejects all forms of alien ideologies and any and all principles or policies that have any likeness to them. We have faith in a free America, where the freedom and dignity of the individual is respected and his rights held inalienable.

CONCLUSION

The above is but a short summary of the achievements of the Republican Congress. Hundreds of other measures have been passed that are beneficial to every part of our population. Measures have been adopted that seek to strengthen our industries, agriculture, banking and financial structures and promote in numerous and varied ways the welfare of our people. An examination of the full record of the Republican Congress will give unmistakable evidence of a sincere desire to meet and solve the problems that confront the Nation, and it can be taken as an assurance that a Republican President and Congress, working in harmony and with a spirit of coperation, will continue to meet and solve our problems, both domestic and foreign, in a manner to promote the welfare of our people.

World Health Organization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. IVOR D. FENTON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from the first World Health Assembly at Geneva, Switzerland, where I had the privilege and honor to serve as congressional adviser.

I am convinced that the World Health Organization can contribute substantially to the betterment of world health conditions and to the improvement of international relations. I can assure you that it is an international activity that merits our continued and increasing support.

Among the delegates of the 54 member nations, practically all of them physicians, I found a wholesome spirit of friendliness and a universal desire to carry out, together, a vigorous cooperative attack on disease in its endemic foci. We talked together as doctors—doctors with millions of patients in many different environments. Barriers of language, race, and political belief seemed nonexistent.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, when I accepted appointment to the United States delegation I was somewhat skeptical. Now I can only give my strongest assurance that in the World Health Organization we have an unusual, perhaps a unique, opportunity to promote the general welfare of mankind and to improve the world economy, as well as increase our own protection against importation of disease.

Members of this House know well my deep concern for the health of our own people, and the measures which I have initiated as well as the support I have given to provide better sanitary conditions and health services, particularly to our own Indian population and Alaskan natives; to improve health and safety in our coal-producing areas, and to advance and facilitate the care and treatment of our veterans. I am proud of my record in this respect. Now, however, I can relate the results of my health interests in the United States to those of the entire world.

I am convinced that the World Health Organization, properly supported, can, for instance, produce a dramatic decrease in the estimated 300,000,000 annual cases of malaria which are retarding world food production. With the International Children's Emergency Fund it is already actively engaged in the vaccination against tuberculosis of millions of children in Europe. This can be a permanent contribution to the rebuilding and stabilization of the manpower resources of that Continent.

I have been deeply impressed by the vastness of the problems of which we have no real conception here in the United States. I have been even more impressed by the opportunities that exist in DDT, penicillin, BGG vaccine, and so forth, for solving these problems rapidly on a wide basis.

Further, I am convinced that the World Health Organization can do the job that needs to be done at a minimum cost.

There is nothing amateurish or experimental about the World Health Organization. It has inherited the half century of experience of the International Office of Public Health of Paris, the Pan-American Sanitary Bureau, and the League of Nations Health Organization—all of them organizations which had won splendid reputations for productive international work.

The composition of the delegation provides further evidence of the hard-rock professional character of the organization. Our own delegation with which I was proud to be associated, was composed of experienced physicians and public-health specialists who have repeatedly demonstrated their technical and administrative competence.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to include the names of all the delegates, alternates and advisers to the First World Health Assembly appointed by the State Department and specifically approved by President Truman.

Delegates: Chairman, Dr. Thomas Parran, Medical Director, United States Public Health Service, Federal Security Agency; Dr. Martha M. Eliot, Associate Chief, Children's Bureau, Federal Security Agency; Dr. James R. Miller, of Hartford, Conn., trustee, American Medical Association.

Alternates: Dr. Frank P. Corrigan, political adviser on Latin America, United States Mission to the United Nations; Dr. James A. Doull, Chief, Office of International Health Relations, Federal Security Agency; Dr. Wilton Halverson, public-health director, State of California; Dr. H. van Zile Hyde, alternate United States representative on Interim Commission, World Health Organization, Division of International Labor, Social, and Health Affairs, Department of State; Durward V. Sandifer, Deputy Director, Office of United Nations Affairs, Department of State.

Advisers: Howard B. Calderwood, Division of United Nations Economic and Social Affairs, Department of State; Nelson H. Cruikshank, director, social insurance activities, American Federation of Labor; Walter W. Dent, president, Dillard University, New Orleans; Dr. Morton Kramer, Chief, Research and Information, Office of International Health Relations, United States Public Health Service; Mrs. David M. Levy, president, Citizens Committee on Children, New York City; Dr. James E. Perkins, managing director, National Tuberculosis Association, New York City; Miss Lucile Petry, Director, Division of Nursing, United States Public Health Service; Alvin Roseman, Deputy Director, International Activities Branch, Bureau of the Budget; Dr. Paul F. Russell, Malariologist, Rockefeller Foundation, New York City; Brig. Gen. James S. Simmons, retired, Dean, School of Public Health, Harvard University; John Tomlinson, Assistant Chief, Division of United Nations Economic and Social Affairs, Department of State; Col. Tom Whayne, Medical Corps, United States Army, Chief, Preventive Medicine Division, Office of the Surgeon General, Department of the Army; Abel Wolman, professor, sanitary engineering, Johns Hopkins School of Public Health and Hygiene, Baltimore.

The other countries were represented by men of equal attainment in their own countries. I can, I am sure, be excused for saying that due to our outstanding position in public health we were able to send a delegation that outranked all others in professional accomplishment and reputation. This fact was indeed gratifying and gave the United States a position of preeminence not related to dollars.

The leadership of the World Health Organization, Mr. Speaker, is in good hands. Dr. Brock Chisholm, who was elected Director-General last month at the Assembly, is not only a distinguished physician who served as Surgeon General of the Canadian Army during the recent war, but he is a man of great human understanding and sympathy who has repeatedly demonstrated his ability to administer large programs. We have in him a true health statesman.

I was pleased as well by the election of Sir Aly Tewfik Shousha, Pasha, of Egypt, as chairman of the executive board. He is a wise and experienced health administrator, a particularly able chairman, and a long-time friend of the United States.

This team can lead the World Health Organization to rapid and worth-while accomplishment.

The World Health Organization is not a demanding organization. Its requests for funds have been ridiculously small. I think it was wise in setting its budget for 1949 at $5,000,000, but I feel that after it has established itself on a firm working basis, it can, and should, raise its sights. The opportunities for tangible accomplishment are so great that it must seize them. It is starting off with a city-sized budget. I hope that it may grow, on the basis of accomplishment, to fit a budget measured to meet the world problem with which it is faced. Here, indeed, we have a direct responsibility. We must watch it carefully and support it fully within its competence.

I do not think we should carry 38 percent of the organization's expenses as we are doing at present. I was delighted with the vigorous fight made by our delegation, on the insistence of the Department of State, to decrease our percentage contribution. We lost, but expected to, because there had been no opportunity due to our late adherence, to warn governments in advance of our position in the matter. The doctors representing their countries were in no position to increase the financial commitments of their governments.

The road was left wide open to reduce our percentage of the next budget and I am convinced that this can be accomplished. I was well satisfied with the State Department's position in this matter and am in full agreement that the administrative expenses of the World Health Organization should be more equally shared between its members than is the case at the present time. However, I believe that we should give the most serious consideration in the future to any request that we increase the total amount of our actual contribution or make special contribution to specific operating programs.

After having seen personally the spirit of the World Health Organization, studied its record during the interim period, and seen the accomplishments within its grasp, I would be chagrined to believe that the present ceiling placed by law on our contribution is in any sense a permanent ceiling on our contribution to this vital work. I believe that it serves a useful purpose at present in demonstrating clearly our belief that the financial load must be shared by all members, and also, in confining the scope of initial activities within reasonable bounds.

However, I believe that we must watch the World Health Organization carefully and be prepared to increase our financial support as it develops in competence and accomplishment. Any other policy would be short-sighted destruction of our own interests in self-protection and general economic development.

Mr. Speaker, I have been highly gratified to have had this opportunity to inspect at close hand the workings of the World Health Organization. I am equally, or even more pleased, to be able to give you this favorable report. We are again, Mr. Speaker, backing a winner.

Tax Reduction in Spite of the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the Eightieth Congress passed with a large majority in both Houses three different tax-reduction measures. The President vetoed all three, offering various excuses, none of which appealed to the majority of Members of either House of Congress. The President's vetoes of the first and second measures were not overridden; but his veto of the third was overridden by a vote of more than two-thirds of all Members of both Houses of Congress, which is the majority required by the Constitution to pass a bill over the President's veto.

Bear in mind that many Democrats voted with the Republicans for the passage of each of these bills, and that the overriding of the President's veto of the third and last one must admittedly stamp the tax-reduction bill, which is now law, as a nonpartisan act.

It should be observed that the third bill, which Congress passed over the veto of the President, reduced the taxes of the people of this country by $4,800,000,000, effective as of January 1, 1948—all despite the third Presidential veto. Seventy-one percent of this tax relief goes to those with incomes under $5,000 a year. Seven million four hundred thousand wage earners in the lowest brackets are entirely removed from tax liability. Married couples, under this law, are now permitted to divide their income for tax purposes, and special relief for persons over 65 years of age and for the blind is provided in this law.

In March 1948, while the third tax bill was pending and after the President had vetoed the first two passed by Congress, I submitted to 35,000 people of my congressional district, without addressing anybody individually or personally, the question, "Do you want Federal taxes reduced now?" Seventy percent of those who answered said "Yes" and only 30 percent said "No." I submit that my vote in favor of a reduction of Federal taxes was in keeping with the expressed wishes of more than two-thirds of my constituents. Hence, I say tax reduction, in spite of the President, is in compliance with the wishes of the people.

On July 24, 1947, I described the situation as it then existed to the people of my district in a radio broadcast, which was before the third bill was passed. My radio address of that date follows:

Dear friends, most people are interested in the reduction of costs of Government. It is impossible to reduce tax burdens without reducing the costs of operating our Federal Government. We on the Appropriations Committee have sought in every way possible to reduce Government expenditures, but the bureaucrats have inflamed the people by spreading false propaganda to influence the Members of Congress to vote for larger appropriations. If these appropriations had been reduced to the point we had hoped, the reduction of taxes would have been comparatively simple.

However, the problem of reducing taxes is not as simple as most people think. One of the chief sources of revenue of the Federal Government is the income tax. Since 1913, we have had a Federal income tax, taxing the income of individuals and corporations, and rates have tended to increase. This was accentuated during both World Wars. After World War I, the income tax rates were substantially reduced with the result that the people were relieved of many of the wartime excessive burdens and business was given an added stimulus, which resulted in the collection of larger sums of money, based upon lower rates.

During World War II, our expenditures ran so high that it became necessary to tax to the limit. The people were tolerant because they knew it was necessary for everyone to pay as much as possible to meet the war budget. But since the war concluded about 2 years ago, I dare say a majority of the people believe that the high wartime tax rates should be reduced to a lower peacetime basis. Hence, this Congress, immediately after it convened in January, set about to revise our income tax structure, by reducing the income tax rates. Bill No. 1, introduced last January 3, the date Congress convened, provided that the income tax rates should be reduced effective as of July 1, 1947. This bill passed the House by a vote of 273 to 137. The Senate passed the bill by a vote of 52 to 34. When the bill went to the President, he vetoed it. It came back to the House where the House voted to override the President's veto by a vote of 268 to 137. If two of those who voted "No" had voted "Yes," the President's veto would have been overridden in the House.

There was such a popular demand from all over the country for the reduction of the income-tax rates below the high wartime levels that a new bill was introduced in the House and passed by a vote of 302 to 112, almost 3 to 1. The second bill passed the Senate by a vote of 60 to 32. The second bill was likewise vetoed by the President and came back to the House, where the House voted to override the President's veto by 299 to 108, almost 3 to 1. But the Senate failed to vote to override the President's veto. Hence, on account of the President's opposition to a reduction of taxes at this time, both attempts of Congress to reduce the taxes failed of passage at this session.

Our Constitution provides that revenue measures shall originate in the House of Representatives. The framers of the Constitution considered that the Members of the House of Representatives were closer to the people and more intimately familiar with their wishes and their ability to pay taxes, than the Senate, and in a much better position to express the will of the people than the President on the subject of revenues and taxation. That is why all tax-raising bills must originate in the House of Representatives. The figures which I have just quoted indicate conclusively that those closest to the people, the Members of the House of Representatives, expressed the will of the people in favor of reduction of the taxes. They did so overwhelmingly. Nearly all of the Republican Members of the House voted for these tax-reduction bills and many Democratic Members joined the Republicans.

It is significant that in all the history of our country there has been only one former instance in which the President of the United States vetoed a tax bill passed by the Congress, and in that instance the Congress promptly voted to override the President's veto. But President Truman has vetoed both these tax reduction measures during this session of Congress. Since the taxing power is left to Congress, with the provision that all tax measures must originate in the House of Representatives, the President is treading on dangerous ground when he vetoes tax measures representing the wishes of the people and passed by their representatives in Congress with such substantial majorities.

I call your attention to the fact that oppressive taxes have been the cause of the downfall of more nations and governments than perhaps any other single cause. The people will tolerate high taxes during wars and other emergencies, but not during times of peace. It has always been the tendency of all Government agencies to clamor for a continuation and an endless extension of spending to the point of the very ruin of the Government. Taxes, of whatever form, ultimately come from labor and the thrift of all the people. They are wrung from the sweat and toil of the laborers and the privations of the citizens. History shows that in time people become impatient of heavy tax burdens, business dwindles, and all production slows down to a low ebb. It destroys the initiative of the people and confusion and distrust take the place of confidence and hope, and governments have fallen before the atrocious actions of the demagogues to seize upon chaos as their opportunity to take control of and to loot the Treasury and the resources of the people.

The two bills passed by Congress and vetoed by the President, to which I have referred, provided tax relief for 49,000,000 Americans. Last November our people expressed their demand for a reduction of taxes, and they are entitled to it.

These bills provided relief for every income-tax-paying citizen of this country. It would have resulted in more take-home pay to the laborer, a larger saving for the thrifty, and encouragement for business to expand and develop and increase our production to meet the demands of our citizens and of a starving world.

Other countries have realized the importance and necessity of such legislation. Since World War II, Canada has reduced taxes twice, and Great Britain, to whom we have been so generous, has reduced the tax burdens of her people twice in the past 2 years. We Members of Congress took the position that the people of the United States are entitled to a like consideration and these bills gave the greatest relief to those least able to pay.

Each of these bills contained a provision to relieve nearly a million of our poorer people over 65 years of age, whose income was less than $1,000 from the payment of any tax at all. Such would have afforded economic security and kept off of the relief rolls thousands of our worthy older citizens.

It should be noted that the only difference between these two tax bills was that one was to have been effective July 1, 1947, and the other January 1, 1948. President Truman in his veto message of the first bill said that the taxes should not be reduced at that time. We met this objection in the new bill by making it effective next January 1—and yet he vetoed it.

I dare say that the people of this country are tremendously more interested in the reduction of taxes and tax burdens than they are in bestowing our bounties on foreigners the world around. We can destroy our own economy by over generosity to others. I am a firm believer in the theory that we owe first consideration to home folks. Our citizens don't want to be taxed at the high wartime rates, in order to appropriate billions of dollars to the peoples of other lands. We Members of Congress have been thoroughly convinced that the passage of either of these bills would have stimulated production, increased the total receipts of taxes, enabled our people to have obtained more of the things they want and need, built up their own security and left a sizable sum to have applied on our huge national debt. It would have enlarged the visions, hopes, and aspirations of our people, and culminated in their greater happiness and enhanced opportunities for their children. It is to be hoped that Congress, when it convenes next January, will pass a new tax law, even further reducing the tax burdens, and that it will vote to carry out the wishes of the people, notwithstanding the attitude of the President to the contrary.

The Soul of Poland Still Lives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the condition of Poland today is one of the most distressing in all of Europe. What could be more distressing than that a freedom-loving people should be held under the domination of a foreign dictatorial power?

Through centuries of time the Polish people have fought and died in the cause of liberty and freedom. Time and again they have suffered under cruel and despotic conquerors. But, never has adversity nor distress caused them to falter in their love for liberty and freedom. The soul of Poland has survived in the past and will survive the adversity of the present. It lives today. It will live tomorrow. It will continue to live until the darkness of today turns to the brightness of a new day.

In years that have long passed Poland was the defender of Christianity against the Mohammedan Turk. Today it is the defender of Christianity against the evil forces of godless communism. Well do I remember the confidence with which His Holiness Pope Pius XII spoke of the Christian courage of the people of Poland and other central European countries, 3 years ago when I had the privilege of an audience and opportunity to talk with him in the Vatican. At that time he painted a most dark and discouraging picture of communistic forces in central Europe, but, in answer to my question whether the Catholics of those countries would falter in their faith, his face lightened and with confidence he said, "No, I don't think so—their hearts are right." He pointed out that while force might dominate the physical, it could not change the heart. How true this is. The same strength of spirit that enables the Polish people to maintain their allegiance to their church, likewise enables them to hold firm their allegiance to the principles of liberty and freedom.

No nation has suffered so badly from the ravages of war. But, the sad part is to realize that Poland has not only suffered from the acts of her enemies, but, also from the deceit of those whom she thought to be her friends. The first to enter the conflict against nazism she continues to suffer though nazism has been destroyed. Without knowledge upon her part she was sold down the river at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam by nations at whose behest she entered the war, and, beside whose soldiers her own soldiers had fought with heroism and courage until victory was gained.

As a result of these secret agreements millions of people in Poland live, today, under the domination of a dictatorship, fearful, in a state of confusion and uncertainty as to the future. Those agreements have brought tragic consequences to Poland and its people. They should never have been made. So long as they remain in force they will constitute a blot upon the integrity and honor of the nations responsible for them. The real Poland today lies prostrate and helpless as a result of the perfidy of those who should have been her protectors.

Secret agreements are contrary to the principles upon which this nation was founded. They have brought distress to Poland. They likewise have brought distress to the people of our own Nation, as we realize the extent to which they set at naught the principles of liberty, justice, and freedom, for which this Nation has been the leading exponent throughout the world. America, like Poland, was also sold down the river when those secret agreements were entered into.

In the days that are ahead it is our duty to rectify, whenever and in whatever way we can, the great wrong and injustice that has been done to Poland. It is our duty to sustain the spirit of Poland and her people; and encourage them to live on in the hope and with the faith that liberty, freedom, and justice will again prevail. Ever remember, the soul of Poland is not dead. It lives and will continue to live until Poland is again a free land.

The Eightieth Congress Fulfilled Its Promises to the American People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, with the special session of Congress now practically a thing of the past, it is my desire to discuss, at this time, the record of the Eightieth Congress from the standpoint of what it has done and has tried to do for the American people and the country as a whole.

Before commencing the discussion, it might be well to mention that in November of 1946, at the last general election, the people of America voted overwhelmingly for a change—a change for the American way of life—by electing to the Congress a sufficient number of Republicans to provide new leadership in both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The new leadership in the Congress promised to eliminate from the Government gross mismanagement which was characterized by confusion, corruption, controls, and communism in high places. They promised to get the Government out of the people's hair and back into the people's hands, to lower personal income taxes, to enact a labor law, putting labor and management on equal footing from the standpoint of the law, to eliminate unnecessary wartime controls, to reduce Federal spending, to provide a balanced budget, and to eliminate from the public payroll thousands of bureaucrats, especially those bearing red labels and acting as agents of Russia.

This new leadership, upon taking over the Congress, realized that for the past 16 years "a rubber-stamp Congress" had said "Yes, Yes, and Yes" to the New Deal's request for spending, high taxes, extension of bureaucracy, unbalanced budgets, deficit spending, controls on business, appeasement of communism, or, in general, power to regiment the American people and their way of living. With the "rubber-stamp Congress" a thing of the past, let us determine whether or not the Eightieth Congress has kept their promises.

MAJOR ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

During the first, second, and special sessions, a total of 10,138 bills and 1,962 resolutions were introduced in the Eightieth Congress. Of these, 905 are now public laws. The President vetoed 149 congressionally approved bills, only to have Congress pass 6 over his veto, including the Taft-Hartley Labor Act, the income-tax-reduction bill, increase in old-age pensions, and extension of social security to 3,500,000 people not previously covered. Taking as it does, a two-thirds majority of each branch of Congress to override a veto, the President's own party in Congress frequently repudiated his leadership and supported the Republican legislative program. The major accomplishments of this program are as follows:

First. Freeing of competitive enterprise: The Republican majority in the Eightieth Congress liberated the people from 76,000 rules, regulations, directives, and orders of the jaw-breaking combinations of alphabetical agencies, thereby releasing the energy and the capacity of the people with resulting all-time highs in employment, production, profits, and wages, and a record $200,000,000,000 annual national income. The President claims credit for this change in conditions and says he should be relected because of the prosperity he has brought America—while at the same time he says Republicans should be defeated for not returning those controls which had prevented this prosperity until the Republican election victory of 1946.

Second. Reduction of national debt: The Congress cut the national debt by $7,000,000,000 to fight inflation.

Third. Balanced Federal budget: The Congress balanced the Federal budget. The United States Treasury for the first time in 16 years is now using black ink instead of red and is no longer resorting to inflationary deficit spending. We ended the 1948 fiscal year on July 1 with the biggest Treasury surplus in all history—$8,419,469,843, seven times the previous high established 21 years ago. Congress thus stopped deficit financing, fundamental cause of inflation.

Fourth. Reduced spendthrift budgets: The President's padded budget estimates were cut more than $6,000,000,000 and, in addition we lopped off more billions in hold-over, wartime appropriations in the greatest, most complex Government financial conversion from war to peace in all time. We are getting away from the false idea that everything must be done by Uncle Sam spending our money; that every problem can be solved by a Washington bureau.

Fifth. Cut income taxes: The Eightieth Congress reduced taxes in the amount of $4,800,000,000 despite three Presidential vetoes, with 71 percent of the tax relief going to those with incomes under $5,000. Seven million four hundred thousand small wage earners in the lowest brackets were removed from the tax rolls completely, married couples were allowed to divide their income for tax purposes, and special, additional $600 exemptions were given persons over 65 and the blind.

Sixth. Improved labor-management relations: The Congress improved labor-management relations and abolished the portal-to-portal pay. We passed, over the Presidential veto, with both Republicans and Democrats voting for the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Relations Act, providing fair and just procedures for peaceful settlement of labor-management disputes. This act, while in no way decreasing the rights of labor to strike or to bargain collectively, has eliminated many of the causes of strikes and provided a method for settlement of others. The record shows it has worked well. Work stoppages previously averaged 395 per month. They have been cut to an average of 201 under the new law, a reduction of 49 percent. The number of workers involved in new strikes each month from VJ-day until the new labor act was 337,000 per month. The average number of workers so involved since the act is 131,000, a reduction of 61 percent. From VJ-day until the new act, the average number of man-days of idleness caused by work stoppages was 7,213,000 per month. Under the new law this figure has been cut to 2,613,000 per month.

The record shows that under the new law, labor's gains, which have continued, are made more often in peaceful fashion than by costly strikes, and thus labor has benefited from protection against lost wages and production, and so has the public. During 1946, the blackest year in work stoppages, workers lost 116,000,000 man-days, while at present the annual rate is running about a fourth as much. On the basis of higher wage rates, the savings to workers is in excess of a billion dollars per year.

Under the new labor act's sound principles, our country is building a rule of reason for cooperation between employers and employees for their mutual benefit and for the good of all our people. The President demands that this law be repealed and that we return to the law of the jungle in our labor-management relations.

Seventh. Exposed communism: The Eightieth Congress has battled for elimination of Fascists, Communists, and other subversives from the Federal Government, exposed Communists' infiltration in a minority of labor unions and in the Hollywood film industry; reversed the appeasement policy toward the Soviets; caused the jailing of Communists for contempt of Congress; landed top Soviet spies in jail and advanced legislation for public registration of alien-controlled Communists. We have made real progress, in spite of the President's opposition, in getting the Government out of the red and the Reds out of our Government.

Eighth. Aided European recovery: The Congress aided European recovery with safeguards for our own economy insofar as the inflationary, bipartisan program, made necessary by the threat of communism and failures of administration handling of foreign policy, can be restrained.

Ninth. Strengthened national defense: The Eightieth Congress rescued our failing National Military Establishment by unifying the armed services, by increasing appropriations to a total of $20,500,000,000, plus contract authorizations, with special emphasis upon air and sea power, and revised the Army system of justice in an effort to assure completely fair treatment under military law for officers and enlisted men alike. Congress also authorized $178,000,000 for merchant-marine expansion.

Tenth. Liberalized veterans benefit: The Congress passed 190 bills, meeting the needs of war veterans, including increased compensation for disabled veterans with and without dependents; increased compensation for dependent survivors of war dead; increased subsistence payments to World War II veterans in institutional training; increased allowances for student GI's; increased proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training, and cashing of GI terminal-leave bonds; higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans and aids for veterans' housing. All this was done in spite of the President, who, in his message to Congress, January 6, 1947, said, "I believe our program of benefits for veterans is now complete."

Eleventh. Generated a building boom: The Eightieth Congress took the housing problem from the bungling New Deal administration and freed the building industry of stifling rules, regulations, and directives; stimulated construction through Government guaranties of building loans; had Government assume a large responsibility for veterans' loans; and gave war veterans priority in home building and rental of new homes. In 1946, under New Deal regimentation, subsidies, and confusion, 437,800 dwelling units were completed; in 1947, under Republican free enterprise and sound Government aid, 835,100 units were completed; and in 1948 a million dwelling units will be completed in the biggest building boom of all time. Yet the President demands Congress go back to policies which failed when tried.

Twelfth. Helped farmers: The Eightieth Congress adopted a long-range agriculture program pledging price support for maximum production of food; provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress and $100,000,000 more than the President requested; appropriated more than half a billion dollars for soil conservation; launched the greatest rural road-building program in history; fostered stability of agriculture through a new, workable Crop Insurance Act; chartered the Commodity Credit Corporation and expanded Government aid in campaigns against livestock diseases and crop deterrents such as weeds and pests.

Thirteenth. Expanded social security: The Eightieth Congress passed over the Presidential veto a bill increasing payments by $5 per month for the needy, aged, blind, and increasing payments by $3 per month for each dependent child. Congress overrode a Supreme Court decision and Presidential veto which would have extended social-security insurance payments to independent contractors over whom no employer exercises direct control. Congress thereby prevented a raid on the old-age and survivors' insurance trust fund by those who had not contributed to it. At this point it is proper to remark that the President in the recent special session gave Congress a long list of social-welfare proposals he wanted enacted, some of a desirable character, and I hope to see the time when we can afford them. It will take many months to consider them thoroughly, and they deserve the objective consideration they cannot possibly receive in the heat of a great national campaign. Democrats controlled Congress for 16 years. Now they say that they failed to deal adequately with social security, education, health, and housing, and blame Republicans for not enacting the programs they failed and refused to enact during 16 years of authority.

Fourteenth. Established national health institutes: The Congress established a National Heart Institute, a National Institute of Dental Research, and continued indefinitely Federal grants to States for hospital construction, and provided funds for a National Cancer Institute to stimulate research upon and cure of this dreaded disease.

Fifteenth. Increased postal pay: The Congress provided a cost-of-living pay increase for postal and other Federal employees caught between fixed incomes and rising prices. Congress increased some postal rates to offset the cost.

Sixteenth. Rates for rail carriers: Congress passed, over Presidential veto, the Reed-Bulwinkle bill, supported by labor and management, providing rates of rail carriers be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission as being in the public interest, instead of by the political Department of Justice.

Seventeenth. Created the Government Reorganization Commission: The Congress created the Government Reorganization Commission, a bipartisan group headed by former President Hoover, which is preparing to submit to the next Congress a comprehensive plan to reorganize the chaotic executive branch of Government in the interests of efficiency and economy.

Eighteenth. Limited President's term of office: The Congress acted to limit Presidents' terms to two, by submitting to the States for ratification, a constitutional amendment.

Nineteenth. Aided small business: It created special committees of the Senate and the House which are seeing that small business, the backbone of American industry, gets a fair break, especially in the awarding of Government contracts for national defense and aid to foreign countries.

Twentieth. Extended reciprocal trade agreements: The Congress extended the Reciprocal Trade Act with reasonable safeguards. This act was extended for 1 year with amendments requiring the President to report to Congress and the people when, in secretly making a trade agreement with a foreign country, he exceeds recommendations made by the United States Tariff Commission pursuant to standards prescribed by Congress, for protection of American industries and agriculture.

Twenty-first. Increase retirement benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act were increased 20 percent. The retired Federal employees received 25-percent increase in benefits, while those retired from the military service received an increase also.

Twenty-second. Attacked inflation: The Eightieth Congress, in its special session, applied curbs on installment buying and bank credits and also reminded the President of the powers he has under Public Laws 395 and 396 (Eightieth Congress) to control exports and consumer credits, both of which are contributing factors to the high cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and on, but as I stated earlier in this discussion, the Eightieth Congress passed 905 important laws, and of that number, I have tried to analyze just 22.

For a moment, permit me to talk about the bills and resolutions I introduced during the Eightieth Congress. Of the 33 sponsored, a total of 10 were enacted and are now laws. In other words, about one-third of the legislative matters introduced were given Presidential and congressional approval.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have said enough to convince any reasonable person that this was not the worst Congress, a do-nothing Congress, as the President charges; that it was, instead, an active Congress, a good one—one devoted to the public welfare. In the face of stubborn opposition from the White House, it has kept its promises to the people. This integrity in itself is a refreshing contrast to the numerous broken campaign pledges of its New Deal predecessors. The Members have been busy, also, in their offices, handling vast volumes of correspondence and requests from their constituents, and in committees investigating many things in preparation for legislation yet to come, for the Eightieth Congress could not, in the less than 2 years of its existence, be reasonably expected to cure all the mistakes of 16 years of hasty, New Deal rubber-stamp legislation. We are giving careful consideration to all those problems affecting your pocketbook and our way of life. We, the people's representatives, are writing the laws now—not the left-wing bureaucrats. We have established solid foundations for a complete restoration of orderly, constitutional government, responsive to the needs of the people. We have reestablished the people's belief in the pledged word of a political party. We have made good on our promises.

Mr. Speaker, during the 1946 campaign in my congressional district, I made a pledge to my people to continue to fight for the principles I have enunciated herein. I want publicly here to renew that pledge. I will fight for the aged, blind, handicapped, veterans, agriculture, industry, and for free enterprise and against bureaucratic controls, deficit spending, inflation, and high living costs. I will continue to fight to oust the spendthrifts and Communists from Government, reduce war taxes and exorbitant Government costs which are bleeding taxpayers white, stifling production, and dragging America into bankruptcy. I will oppose all unnecessary spending at home and abroad, believing that foreign aid should provide only a springboard for self-help and not a wheel chair for permanent doles. Let us end appeasement and double talk and maintain 100-percent national defense.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, in these days of great stress and strain, when the welfare of our Nation hangs in the balance and when many subversive interests are boring from within and endeavoring to destroy the cherished liberties of America, it is an appropriate time for all of us to renew again our vows of loyalty to our country and to remind ourselves that spiritual understanding is as important as political wisdom and that we must avoid intolerance, racial and political prejudices, and work together in unison for the preservation of our Nation. We cannot too often make known our allegiance by rededicating ourselves to the principles set forth in the American's Creed:

I believe in the United States of America as a government of the people, by the people, and for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign nation of many sovereign states; a perfect union, one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies.

Duty of America Toward Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, hope springs eternal in the human breast. Through centuries of time the Jewish people have sung Hatikvah (The Hope). Wherever Jews have gone they have individually and collectively carried with them the spirit of hope for the fulfillment of their heart's desire—a homeland, a nation of their own. Thus in many lands throughout the world this anthem of Israel, Hatikvah, has given expression to the hope within each Jewish heart for the redemption of their homeland.

On May 14, 1948, at Tel Aviv, Israel was redeemed and became a free and sovereign nation among the nations of the world. It was most appropriate that on that day, amid the formalities incident to the birth of a nation, that Hatikvah should be sung with fervor and triumphantly in acknowledgment of hope fulfilled.

Words cannot adequately describe what must have been the feelings of those who were privileged to participate in the historic ceremonies of that day. Centuries of time, with all the cruelties that had been endured in many lands, passed before them. The cries of anguish and distress were remembered. The indignities that had been suffered were likewise vividly pictured in their minds eye. But, with it all, there was the memory of the fortitude and courage that had kept alive in every Jewish breast the hope of a better day.

On that eventful day, May 14, 1948, all of these memories running through centuries of time and the hope of the future found expression in the blue and white flag of Israel that was flung to the breeze—the emblem of a free nation. It represented the ending of a dark chapter in the history of a people and the opening of a new chapter filled with hope.

There is something inspiring to every true lover of freedom in the majestic words of the instrument that proclaimed the Jewish state. After a brief statement of the history of the Jewish people, covering the birth of Israel in the days of the Bible, the days of exile, the sufferings experienced, and the desire to return home, the proclamation set forth:

This recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish people to establish their independent state may not be revoked. It is, moreover, the self-evident right of the Jewish people to be a nation as all other nations, in its own sovereign state.

Accordingly, we, the members of the National Council, representing the Jewish people in Palestine and the Zionist movement of the world, met together in solemn assembly by virtue of the natural and historic right of the Jewish people and of the resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations, hereby proclaim the establishment of the Jewish state in Palestine, to be called Medinat (the state) Israel.

Thus, with words though different, yet reflecting the same thoughts and ideals of our own Declaration of Independence, an independent state was born, and the people of that land had become free men and free women. Is it any wonder that their feelings of gratitude found expression in that prayer familiar to every devout Jew:

Blessed art Thou, O Lord, our God, King of the Universe, that Thou hast maintained and preserved us to witness this day.

The four words spoken at the conclusion of the ceremonies, "Hamedina, Hamah, Hayeshiva Tamah," meaning "The state has been established," brought to a conclusion centuries of trial, tribulation, and effort. Now, Israel's children from east, west, north, and south can return to a free land where freedom, liberty, and justice prevail.

What is the duty of this Nation toward the nation of Israel? Our duty is plain. There is an obligation upon us to support, sustain, and encourage whenever and wherever possible, this new nation in the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of its new-found freedom as an independent and sovereign state. To the fulfillment of this, I give my solemn pledge as a Member of the Congress of the United States.

National Guard Should Receive Same Benefits as Organized Reserve Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROSS RIZLEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker, I well understand, of course, that this so-called emergency session of the Congress was called by the President for the purpose of considering certain specific recommendations made by him. I regret that the President did not deem it advisable to include in his recommendations certain legislation now pending which would equalize and give to members of our National Guard the same disability, pensions, and leave benefits as those received by members of the Organized Reserve Corps.

S. 2622, which passed the Senate June 1, 1948, and the companion bill in the House, H. R. 6494, reported by the House Armed Services Committee on June 2, would provide, if enacted into law, that members of the National Guard would receive the same leave, pension, and disability benefits that members of the Organized Reserve Corps now receive while undergoing the same type of training.

This legislation would also provide for a common Federal appointment or enlistment of personnel of the National Guard of the United States and the Organized Reserve Corps, which would permit the transfer of persons between the two components, without the necessity of Federal discharge from one and reappointment and enlistment in the other.

This legislation would also authorize warrant officers in the Organized Reserve Corps, which authority now exists for warrant officers of the National Guard of the United States.

This proposal was prepared by the Department of the Army in cooperation with representatives of the National Guard of the United States and the Organized Reserve Corps through the General Staff Committee on National Guard and Reserve Policy.

It is inconceivable that these benefits which exist for one Reserve component do not apply to the other. It is my sincere hope that this legislation which equalizes these benefits and provides for a common Federal status for members of one of our Federal Reserve components will early be enacted into law by the Eighty-first Congress. It is also inconceivable that anyone would advocate or attempt to abolish the guard.

Mr. Speaker, one of the things that calls this situation so forcibly to my mind is the fact that today members of the Forty-fifth Thunderbird Division of the Oklahoma National Guard are making final preparation for their 2 weeks' summer encampment, which commences at Camp Potts-Robison at Fort Sill, Okla., on tomorrow, August 8. This great division, which distinguished itself during World War II on the battlefields of Europe and Sicily, has led the Nation in obtaining enlistments in the various units of the division during the past 2 years.

In keeping with its policies and thoughtfulness in respect to giving honor where honor is due, the Forty-fifth Infantry Division's field training camp at Fort Sill has been named Camp Potts-Robison, in honor of the first two members of the division killed in its initial combat in Sicily. As part of my remarks, I include a newspaper release from the Daily Oklahoman, issued by Brig. Gen. R. W. Kenny, adjutant general of the State of Oklahoma.

FORTY-FIFTH NAMES CAMP IN HONOR OF TWO KILLED IN SICILY INVASION

The Forty-fifth Infantry Division's field training camp August 8–22 at Fort Sill, will be named Camp Potts-Robison, in honor of the first two members of the division killed in its initial combat in Sicily, Brig. Gen. R. W. Kenny, State adjutant general, said Saturday.

It has been the custom to name each annual camp for some military figure, General Kenny said. The first postwar camp last year was named for Charles F. Barrett, long time State adjutant general.

Cpl. Barney Potts, Durant, was a member of Company E, One Hundred and Eightieth Infantry regiment. At the time of Federal induction of the Forty-fifth in September 1940, he was a high-school senior and an outstanding player on the Durant football team.

He went ashore with the first wave at Sicily July 10, 1943, and died from small-arms fire on sand dunes of the beachhead.

Capt. Paul E. Hayes, Durant, who also participated in the landing, said: "Company E was on our left, and Corporal Potts was part of a small force which stormed an enemy pillbox on the beach which opposed our landing. After Potts fell, near 17 enemy dead, I stopped to examine him. So far as I could tell, he was killed instantly by rifle or other small-arms fire."

Potts is survived by his mother, Mrs. Lolita Millsap, Durant, and a brother, Charles, who served in the Navy during the war and now is employed by Phillips Petroleum Co. at Borger, Tex.

Capt. Garvice Robison was Okmulgee's first casualty in the war. A charter member of Company K, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth Infantry regiment, he was in command of Company C, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth, and was leading his men when killed in the Sicilian landing.

Commissioned a second lieutenant in 1939, Robison was promoted later to a first and in 1942 to captain. He was given command of Company C while the One Hundred and Seventy-ninth was at Pine Camp, N. Y.

Robison's brother, S/Sgt. Darrell Robison, also was with the Forty-fifth during the Sicilian invasion, and wrote their parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. L. Robison, of his brother's death.

Robison is survived by his parents, his wife, Sylvia, and two children, Connie, 14, and Judy, 12; three brothers and one sister.

Can Dewey Make Liberals Out of Reactionaries?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial which appeared Thursday, August 5, 1948, in the Wyalusing Rocket, one of the Keeler newspapers, printed at Wyalusing in Bradford County, Pa.

This editorial raises a very interesting question: "How far can Mr. Dewey carry the powerful isolationist-reactionary element in his party—particularly the congressional leadership—toward more liberal goals?"

It asserts that the Governor of New York has had an excellent opportunity in this special session of Congress to take command and to lend his influence toward the enactment by this Congress of legislation he is said to favor. However, because the Republican candidate failed to evidence any leadership in this critical period of inflation, the Wyalusing Rocket concludes that as a candidate for President he has missed a great opportunity.

And I certainly agree that he has. For the people now recognize that with the Congress he would inherit as President, even the most liberal Republican could get no liberal program through.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS AND MR. DEWEY

The Democrats election strategy has been to make the campaign a contest between President Truman and Congress. The Republicans so far have not attempted to shift the ground. Governor Dewey has not taken command to carry a Republican program through the special session. The job of answering Mr. Truman's challenge has been left to the leaders in Congress.

The Republicans, putting forward the anti-poll tax bill, could count on southern Democrats tying up the Senate with a filibuster. Most of the southerners also refuse to go along with Mr. Truman on other proposals like price committee. The President may have little leverage to prevent congressional leaders carrying out their plan to "adjourn as soon as possible"—Speaker MARTIN says in "about 15 days."

Some Republicans believe a futile session will weaken Mr. Truman's popular appeal by proving his inability to get action. But he will endeavor to lay the blame for lack of action at their door. He will have help from many voters who are aroused over high prices and believe Congress could do something. A clever political answer to the President's challenge could prove to be a very poor answer to the public.

Where does Mr. Dewey fit into all this? There is some evidence that he had a part in preventing the more reckless congressional leaders from adjourning at once. Senator TAFT has reported that the new party chieftain urged Republicans in Congress to give brief committee consideration at least to some of the President's proposals. But his spokesman, Herbert Brownell, took a rather negative view of the possibility of carrying out platform promises at this time, and the minority of congressional Republicans who hoped to take action on a minimum program have had no noticeable Dewey aid.

Certainly it would be rash to predict that a popular revolt against high prices and the housing shortage will not cost Dewey many votes and possibility defeat. These are real issues confronting millions of voters—particularly the laboring classes and the Legion and other service organizations. Governor Dewey is keeping in the background in the current hostilities on these questions and probably assumes should Congress catch considerable blame he will escape some of it. When he starts campaigning he may be able to turn the campaign more into the shape of a choice between himself and Mr. Truman.

Thoughtful voters who may wish to make their choice on a different basis—weighing each candidate plus his congressional leaders on what they have done and not done in the past.

Certainly one great question among independents will be how far Mr. Dewey can carry the powerful isolationist-reactionary element in his party—particularly the congressional leadership—toward more liberal goals. Those who hoped that the special session would prove the Dewey leadership in this respect have been disappointed so far. They feel he has missed an opportunity.

What a Merry-Go-Round!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, an outstanding tax attorney of my home city has analyzed our taxing program by showing the American worker is taxed to purchase goods for the British to keep their food costs down, and so forth. His comments follows:

The American worker is taxed and his tax money used to purchase food for the British to keep their food costs down. Thus the American taxpayers' tax money is used to purchase food for the British in competition with the purchase of food by the American worker in a scarce market and then the American worker wonders why his cost of living is rising. What an anomaly. An administration using the American workers' tax money to make their own purchase of necessities more dear. A raise in wages; more tax; more food purchased for distribution abroad; more scarcity; a raise in cost; a demand for higher wages; more taxes; etc. What a merry-go-round.

American People Approve Constructive Record of Republican Congress and Resent President Truman's Vicious Attacks—Here Are the Facts of the Eightieth Congress Record on Government Spending, Prices, Communism, Veterans, Agriculture, Taxation, National Defense, Housing, Controls, and Foreign Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, the record of the Eightieth Congress—the Republican Congress—is approved by the overwhelming majority of the American people. That approval will be effectively demonstrated next November when the people vote for Republicans across the length and breadth of the land. In doing so, they will finally and emphatically repudiate Mr. Truman and his New Deal Democrat administration.

By their ballots they will write for all to see their approval of the Republican Congress and its record, and their disapproval of Mr. Truman and his policies, and his unjustified and vicious attacks on the Congress.

The Republican Congress has kept its pledges and saved America from President Truman's disastrous program of regimentation and reckless bureaucratic spending, and reestablished good government, freedom, security, prosperity, and happiness for our people.

The Republican Congress has supported and protected the American way of life against attack by an administration whose alien philosophy of government demands more and more power to control the people.

When the Eightieth Congress convened January 3, 1947, by mandate of an aroused people, we were confronted by the ruinous results of 14 years of New Deal bad government.

Our country was on the brink of disaster, threatened as it was by disintegration of our free economy and revolutionary change in our free government.

The Truman administration, infected by radicalism and an easy prey for Communists' spy rings, viciously attacked Congress for cutting spendthrift budgets, for cutting taxes, for passing the Fair Labor-Management Act, and for rejecting its efforts to bring back stifling OPA controls.

We liberated the people from 76,000 rules, regulations, directives, and orders, thereby releasing their energy and capacity, with resulting all-time highs in employment, production, profits, and wages, and a record $208,000,000,000 annual national income.

We augmented the President's vast but unused power to check high prices generated by reckless policies of his and previous New Deal Democrat administrations.

To reverse ruinous New Dealism and establish the solid foundations upon which our country is now going forward, the Republican Congress has enacted a program of many parts.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF REPUBLICAN CONGRESS

Here, summarized, are major accomplishments of the Republican Congress:

Balanced Federal budget: The Federal Treasury for the first time in 16 years is using black ink instead of red and is no longer resorting to inflationary deficit spending. Fiscal 1948 ended with the biggest Treasury surplus in all history—$8,419,469,843, seven times the previous high established 21 years ago.

Cut national debt: Prudently shaved $7,000,000,000 off the public debt.

Pruned spendthrift budgets: Cut President Truman's padded budgets more than $6,000,000,000 and lopped off more billions in the hold-over wartime appropriations in the greatest, most complex Government financial conversion from war to peace in all time.

Cut taxes: Reduced taxes $4,800,000,000, despite three Presidential vetoes, with 71 percent of the tax relief going to those with incomes under $5,000; 7,400,000 wage earners in the lowest brackets removed from the tax roll; married couples allowed to divide their income for tax purposes and special relief for persons over 65 and for the blind.

Improved labor-management relations: Passed over Presidential veto the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Act, which has brought a sharp reduction in work stoppages, more constant and expanding production as a solvent for high prices, and higher annual wages for workers, because the act is providing fair and just procedures for peaceful settlement of labor-management disputes; protecting rights of workers to unionize and control their unions, to bargain collectively, and to strike; restoring constitutional rights of employers, and safeguarding all the people against widespread work and production stoppages that imperil the national welfare.

Exposed Communists: Revealed Communist spy rings that obtained top national security secrets from confederates inside the Truman and past New Deal Democrat administrations, despite refusal of the President to cooperate in purging subversives from the Government; exposed Communist domination in a minority of labor unions and the Hollywood film industry; caused jailing of Communists for contempt of Congress; landed top Soviet Russia agents in jail and advanced legislation for public registration of alien-controlled Communists.

Strengthened national defense: Rescued our disintegrating National Military Establishment by unifying the armed services; by forcing adoption of a "plan of action"; by making cash appropriations and contract authorizations totaling $24,128,110,346—$9,528,295,733 in first session, $14,599,814,613 in second session—with special emphasis upon air power; by adopting a temporary selective service act; by providing for development of better weapons including guided missiles and atomic bombs; by authorizing $178,000,000 for merchant marine expansion, and by revising Army justice in an effort to assure completely fair treatment under Army law for officers and enlisted men.

Cared for veterans: Passed 188 bills meeting needs of war veterans, including increased compensation for disabled veterans with and without dependents; increased compensation for dependent survivors of war dead; increased subsistence payments to World War II veterans in institutional training; increased allowances for student GI's; increased proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training; cashing of GI terminal-leave bonds; higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans; and aids for veterans' housing.

FOSTERED RECORD HOME BUILDING

Generated building boom: Took housing problem from the bungling New Deal administration; freed the building industry of stifling rules, regulations, and directives; stimulated construction through Government guaranties of building loans; had Government assume large part of responsibility for veterans' loans; and gave war veterans priority in home building and rental of new homes. In 1946, under New Deal regimentation and confusion, 437,800 dwelling units were completed; in 1947, under Republican free enterprise and sound Government aid, 835,100 units were completed; and in 1948, 1,000,000 dwelling units will be completed in the biggest building boom of all time.

Helped farmers: Adopted long-range agriculture program pledging price support for maximum production of food; provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress; appropriated more than $500,000,000 for soil conservation; launched greatest rural road-building program in history; fostered stability of agriculture through a new, workable Crop Insurance Act; chartered Commodity Credit Corporation; and greatly expanded Government aid in campaigns against livestock foot-and-mouth disease and crop deterrents, such as weeds, insects, and other pests.

BILLIONS FOR OTHER COUNTRIES

Aided foreign nations: Appropriated $9,579,657,128—$2,377,573,900 in first session and $7,202,083,228 in second session including $1,000,000,000 for reconstruction loans—for relief to impoverished humanity in foreign countries, to help reestablish their national economies and to restrain Communists' aggression; created an Economic Cooperation Administration to administer foreign aid; kept all congressional commitments to United Nations.

Joined International Refugee Organization and gave it $71,073,900 to carry on.

Enacted a bill to admit 205,000 displaced persons in next 2 years and permit 15,000 refugees already in the United States to remain.

Forwarded reclamation, river, and harbor improvements, flood control: Rescued the vitally needed, Republican-inaugurated reclamation program for the West from President Truman's disastrous money-freeze order of August 1946, and appropriated more money for reclamation—$389,804,000—than any previous Congress; likewise made record-breaking appropriations for river and harbor improvements—$285,500,000—and flood control—$712,063,000—all being essential to expansion and protection of our national economy.

CARED FOR NEEDY, AGED, AND ILL

Expanded social security: Passed over Presidential veto a bill increasing payments for the needy, aged and the blind, and increasing payments for each dependent child, thereby adding $184,000,000 annually to social-security payments received by 3,500,000 needy dependent children, the aged, and the blind; and exempting from the social-security insurance payments, newspaper and magazine vendors, and other independent contractors over whom no employer exercises direct control, thereby preventing an impairment of the old-age and survivors' insurance trust fund built up by those who had paid taxes over the years.

Established a National Heart Institute within the United States Public Health Service to fight America's No. 1 killer, diseases of the heart and circulation; provided $500,000 for the research institute to combat these diseases, which affect 1 person in 16, cause 1 out of every 3 deaths, and result in a loss of 152,000,000 workdays a year.

Provided $28,400,000 for the National Cancer Institute to study the disease of cancer and to disseminate knowledge on how to reduce its terrible toll in lives.

Established National Institute of Dental Research: Created for supervision by the United States Public Health Service a National Institute of Dental Research to find causes and cures for caries and other teeth disease; provided $2,000,000 for buildings and $750,000 for first year of research.

Provided a cost-of-living pay increase for postal and other Federal employees. Despite President Truman's opposition as expressed in a budget message to Congress, we gave 478,000 postal workers a pay increase of $450 a year each, and 840,000 civil-service employees a boost of $330 each; increased some postal rates as a partial offset to the $600,000,000 cost of the pay rise.

Facilitated the making of equitable and nondiscriminatory transportation rates: Passed over Presidential veto the Reed-Bulwinkle bill, exempted railroads from antitrust suits for rate agreements, provided the rates are approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission as being in the public interest.

Improved United States Employment Service: Enacted over Presidential veto a bill transferring and improving the United States Employment Service from the Department of Labor to the Federal Security Agency for administration in coordination with unemployment benefits.

Created Government Reorganization Commission: Established a bipartisan Commission, headed by former President Herbert Roover, which is preparing for submission to the next Congress a comprehensive plan for reorganization of the administrative branch of the Government in the interests of efficiency and economy—a major operation on the sprawling, tax-eating bureaucracy.

Acted to limit Presidents' terms: Submitted to the States for ratification a constitutional amendment limiting Presidents to two terms.

AIDED SMALL BUSINESSES

Authorized voluntary trade agreements: Empowered the President, upon advice of the Attorney General, to approve voluntary agreements among business firms to ration and channel commodities in short supply to the most essential purposes domestically and to meet foreign commitments.

Extended export controls: Temporarily extended and strengthened the President's authority to control exports in line with United States policy to favor cooperating nations and withhold sinews of war from noncooperating countries.

Aided small businesses: Created special committees of the Senate and House of Representatives which are seeing that small businesses—the backbone of American industry—get a fair break, especially in the awarding of Government contracts for national defense and aid to foreign nations.

Extended Reciprocal Trade Act with reasonable safeguards: Extended for 1 year the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, with amendments requiring the President to report to Congress and the people when, in secretly making a trade agreement with a foreign country, he exceeds recommendations made by the United States Tariff Commission pursuant to standards prescribed by Congress for protection of American industries and agriculture.

REORGANIZED CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES

We reorganized the congressional legislative machinery, telescoped many committees into a few, and staffed them with specialists in their responsibilities.

We created a joint congressional committee which is keeping constant watch on all factors entering into the cost of living and making recommendations.

We sent our own committees across the country and thus gathered first-hand information, and we sent special committees to Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East for study and report on conditions that required action by Congress.

LEGISLATION BENEFITS ALL

The Republican Congress passed hundreds of other measures that are benefiting every segment of our population and creating wholesome conditions for prosperity and happiness; measures buttressing industries, agriculture, and mining; supplying long-needed banking legislation; strengthening the Federal Reserve banks' operation; reorganizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and in other ways making for sound national progress.

REPUBLICANISM AGAINST RADICALISM

Back in December 1945 the Republicans of the Senate and House of Representatives, united in issuing a statement of principles, policies, and objectives. The declaration said:

Today's major issue is between radicalism, regimentation, all-powerful bureaucracy, class exploitation, deficit spending, and machine politics, as against our belief in American freedom for the individual under just laws fairly administered for all, preservation of local home rule, efficiency and pay-as-you-go economy in Government, and the protection of the American way of life against either Fascist or Communist trends.

We believe that genuine social and economic progress can be achieved only on those American constitutional principles and it is our purpose to give our citizens this clean-cut choice.

That was the major issue in the 1946 congressional elections. It is the overall issue today.

This conflict of philosophies on government, republicanism against radicalism, is the fundamental issue between our Republican Congress and President Truman. It can be settled only by vote of the people in next November's elections.

In the election of November 1946 voters throughout the length and breadth of our land sent to Congress Senators and Representatives dedicated to the principles, policies, and objectives of the Republican Party.

The election resulted in a landslide victory for the Republican Party, and it has been confirmed by subsequent elections to fill vacancies in the Congress.

The people demanded and had a right to expect cooperation of President Truman in carrying out their will for an end to regimentation, all-powerful bureaucracy, coddling of Communists, vote buying, business badgering, exploitation of group against group, spendthrift policies, and back-breaking taxes.

Shortly after the 1946 repudiation of his administration, the President issued a written statement acknowledging the verdict of the people and pledging that cooperation, but he has not kept that pledge.

Instead he has fought Congress, the policy-making department of our Government, every step of the way, and has even used the taxpayers' money for a journey across the country to wage his vicious campaign of misrepresentation.

He has abused the weighty Presidential veto power by invoking it as a weapon of minorities. He holds the unenviable record of having had more vetoes overridden by Congress—six of them—than any President for a like period dating back to post-Civil War days.

To garble, twist, and belittle actions of the people's Congress, the President has called the signals for 45,000 propagandists on the Federal pay roll. That gigantic, thought-control political machine, directed by radical New Dealers, had a $75,000,000 campaign fund—all from the taxpayers' pockets.

TRUMAN STOKES INFLATION

The evidence, daily revealed, is abundant that President Truman is a confused, bewildered, perplexed man, swamped by the tremendous responsibilities of the Presidency.

The evidence is abundant, too, that he failed utterly in planning for the post-war conversion. To a special session of Congress in 1945 he submitted recommendations for a gigantic Government spending program to cushion his expected vast unemployment, collapse of commodity prices, and lessened purchasing power.

He failed then to understand that all the people wanted was a signal from their Government to go ahead and get on with peacetime production.

He geared his whole program to an anticipated depression and stoked the boilers of inflation that has brought its train of high prices. He was wrong then, and he has been wrong ever since.

In 1946 the Nation's economic structure was falling apart through a confusion of orders, rules, and directives from Washington. We were becoming a nation of bootleggers in black markets. Shortages in commodities and materials were made worse by the blackest year in work stoppages.

The Seventy-ninth Congress, a Democrat Congress, passed a temporary OPA extension bill, and while President Truman criticized it because it did not give him all the power he wanted, Senator BARKLEY, his present running mate for the Vice Presidency, pronounced it a workable bill in the interest of sensible conversion from the war.

It provided for gradual, orderly elimination of controls as supplies approached demand, but as the 1946 elections approached the President became panicky. Within a few weeks before and after the election he eliminated nearly all OPA controls and lifted wage ceilings with an assertion that wages could be raised at that time without resulting in higher prices. Prices suddenly increased; wages climbed in the first round; inflation boilers began to roar.

And then came the Republican Congress, with a mandate from the people to clean up the accumulation of New Deal debris and restore solid foundations for a sound, forward-looking national economy.

TRUMAN ASKS POLICE STATE POWER

The President in mid-1947 branded Government price and wage fixing, rationing, and similar controls as police-state methods that would not work in our Republic in peacetime.

Then he asked the special session of Congress in 1947 to fasten those very controls upon the people—shackles that would smother productive enterprise.

At that special session we rejected his demand for police-state power. We pointed out he already possessed broad power over bank credit and other monetary power, ample to check rising prices, but he failed to act.

We passed a measure to enable competitive enterprise, through voluntary agreement and subject to approval of the Attorney General and President, to channel goods in short supply to where they would do the most good in the public interest. That law became a dead letter in the hands of the Truman administration.

Yielding to special interests and pressure groups, he submitted recommendations for spending, over and above his record peacetime budgets, that would, if approved by Congress, add $20,000,000,000 to the Nation's annual tax bill, skyrocket prices, greatly expand the Washington bureaucracy, and wreck our national economy.

He waged a campaign to vilify Congress for rejecting his program for unlimited spending, expansion of power of Federal bureaus over States, cities, and individuals, and regimentation of agriculture, labor, and industry.

The President degraded his high and respected office by announcing the call for the 1948 special session of Congress at 2 a. m., at the Democratic National Convention in an obviously desperate political maneuver to recover his lost political fortunes and rally his warring, quarreling, bolt-ridden party.

BARKLEY OPPOSES SPECIAL SESSION CALL

In calling the rump session, President Truman brushed aside counsel of Senator BARKLEY that a meeting of Congress immediately after the national conventions of the major political parties would be taken up with "political bickering and political legislation and political oratory."

Candidate Truman, using a joint session of Congress as a backdrop for publicity purposes, submitted a warmed-up version of OPA to give him power to fix prices and wages in all or any industries and to ration supplies and materials. The President said he intended to impose only selective controls, but when he abolished OPA controls on November 9, 1946, he said:

The Price Administrator has advised me that, with so much of our economy freed from price controls, clinging to the rest would, in his judgment, lead to distortion in production and diversion of goods to an extent far outweighing any benefit that would be achieved.

Although the President had failed to use his tremendous power to help stabilize the national economy through tightening of bank credit, he asked the 1948 special session of Congress for additional monetary power. Congress authorized the Federal Reserve Board to increase bank reserves by 4 percent, thereby making a possible increase in reserves of about $3,500,000,000. Congress also granted the Board authority to limit installment credit for consumers.

ECCLES CALLS TRUMAN PLAN INFLATIONARY

After President Truman had presented his so-called anti-inflation program to the 1948 special session, financial and economic authorities at once branded it as a program to encourage inflation.

Marriner S. Eccles, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, testified before the House Banking and Currency Committee that—the program—

taken as a whole, seems to me to be more of a political program than an economic one, because there is in the program action called for which would be very inflationary.

Appropriate committees of the Republican Congress have warned President Truman time and again to mend his ways and to do something to check high prices, but he plainly chooses to blame others for his mistakes.

The House Banking Committee, back in 1947, warned that action should be taken by the President to reverse the Government's monetary policies. The committee said that loose fiscal policies were largely to blame for the high cost of living along with failure of the Truman administration to use its power to control exports. The committee said that if the President had been diligent in controlling exports, the impact of these withdrawals from short domestic supplies would have been much less and therefore prices would not have been boosted so high.

Again, during the special session of Congress in 1948—the Truman politics session—the congressional committee admonished the President to use this power to bring down prices. The committee said:

There is nothing wrong with the United States that production and sound fiscal policies will not correct. Fiscal policies of the Government since VE-day have not been sound. They have been conducive to economic and financial uncertainty. They have inspired inflationary tendencies.

The President's actions and his failures to act indicate he does not understand the economic facts of life; that he could not constantly stoke the boilers of inflation and then, presto, prevent an explosion by clamping on arbitrary price and wage lids.

BIG CROPS MEAN LOWER LIVING COST

Even as he demanded more and more power to control the lives of the people, our country was being blessed with the most bountiful crops in history: a corn crop estimated by the Department of Agriculture at 3,500,363,000 bushels, a billion bushels more than last year; the second largest wheat crop, estimated at 1,284,323,000 bushels, and record-breaking crops of oats, soybeans, barley, and hay—all foreshadowing a decline in food prices and lower cost of living.

For our part, we Republicans in our statement of principles, policies, and objectives, issued back in December 1945, said:

Government alone cannot feed the people, nor employ them, nor make the profits from which new enterprises and new jobs are born. Government can help its people to prosperity by lightening the burdens of debt and taxes, laying down the rules of fair play, and protecting those whose own strength and resources are not sufficient to protect themselves.

We have kept that pledge.

LET'S LOOK AT THE RECORD

Now, let us look in more detail at the record of the Republican Congress and see how the many parts fit together in giving effect to American constitutional principles.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

This is what we Republicans pledged:

Economy in Government spending must be achieved. Extravagant Government spending now advocated by the administration in every field can only lead to ruin. Bureaucracy with its thirst for power and self-preservation, must be drastically reduced. The number of Government employees must be cut to an efficient minimum.

We have kept that pledge.

President Truman holds the record as the biggest peacetime spender of all time.

Confronting the Republican Congress when it convened was the tremendous job of converting the Government's fiscal affairs from a war to a peacetime basis, the most stupendous financial operation that ever faced a Congress. To the hard-working Appropriations Committees of the House of Representatives and the Senate goes much of the credit for bringing a semblance of order out of chaos.

Details reached around the earth, billions of dollars were involved and major policies had to be determined in the conversion.

Most harassing of all in this gigantic operation were the continuous demands by the Truman administration for more and more spending and a bigger and bigger bureaucracy.

These pleas were taken up by the 45,000 propagandists on the Federal pay roll, dipping into the $75,000,000 campaign fund taxed from the people.

The President pledged to cooperate with the Republican Congress, but instead he and his army of job holders, augmented by New Dealers outside the Government taking up the cry, fought economy every step of the way.

He submitted to Congress budget estimates calling for expenditures of $37,500,000,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948. He recommended in excess of another billion before the first session of the Congress adjourned.

He submitted to the second session of the Congress an all-time high, peacetime budget calling for expenditures of nearly $40,000,000,000 during fiscal year 1949 and then swelled that by several billions in supplemental recommendations.

On top of all this he submitted a series of recommendations for new ventures in Government spending that would, if approved by the Republican Congress, have added $20,000,000,000 to annual Federal expenditures, forced higher taxes, expanded bureaucracy, and plunged the Nation into bankruptcy.

Compare these astronomical figures with the total Government expenditures in prewar years. Expenditures for fiscal 1933 totaled $5,143,000,000; for 1934 they were $7,100,000,000; and for 1939 the Government spent $9,027,000,000. The Republican Congress not only called a halt on the New Deal Democrat trend; we reversed the procession.

CUT TRUMAN'S PADDED BUDGETS

We cut the President's fiscal 1948 budget estimates $2,766,000,000; rescinded funds that otherwise would have been spent amounting to $442,500,000; made recoveries for the Treasury that the President did not recommend amounting to $911,700,000, and we made cuts that were effective in making savings in the operations of the previous fiscal year amounting to $359,740,568.

Thus the total savings to the Federal Treasury accomplished by the Republican Congress during its first session were approximately $4,500,000,000.

We continued the same program of prudently pruning the President's budget and supplemental recommendations during the second session providing for fiscal year 1949. From the regular departmental appropriation bills, deficiencies, supplementals, and so forth, the Republican Congress appropriated $2,741,481,291 less than the President requested. During the 1948 special session the President requested $83,134,250, but we appropriated only $15,300,000.

And it should be noted that the Democrats in Congress, almost to a man and almost on every occasion, apparently desiring nothing so much as to see the Republican economy program fail, vigorously opposed cuts in appropriations advocated by the Republicans.

Notwithstanding this reckless and sometimes demagogic resistance, the Republican Congress saved better than $6,000,000,000, and this does not include the rejection of the President's $20,000,000,000 high-living vote-luring political recommendations.

These savings were made by eliminating useless and unnecessary expenditures, not by destroying essential or necessary functions and operations of Government.

Failures of New Deal Democrat administrations, past and present, in foreign relations are reflected in higher Government expenditures for national defense and to provide aid for freedom-loving foreign countries.

These, in turn, are major causes of high prices.

More than 80 percent of our national expenditures now goes toward prevention of wars, foreign aid, aid to our own veterans, and in liquidation of past wars. Hence the urgency of having a Republican President who will cooperate with a Republican Congress, working together for efficiency and economy in Government.

Incompetence of the Truman administration is illustrated by the President's failure to present to the Congress the major budget requests at the opening of the Congress in January as the law requires.

Final budget estimates for Government corporations this year did not reach the Congress until April 6; for the Interior Department until May 10; for the Army and the Air Force until May 26; for independent offices, including the Veterans' Administration, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Maritime Commission, until May 27; and for the Navy until June 1.

Obviously, this fumbling delay made it difficult to hold proper hearings and get the appropriation bills through the Congress before beginning of the 1949 fiscal year on July 1, 1948.

However, through tremendous effort, the Congress did do a thorough and a good job in handling Government expenditures.

TAXES

This is what the Republicans' preelection statement of principles, policies, and objectives said on taxation:

Taxes must be so imposed as to stimulate creative enterprise, not destroy it, and to afford the individual adequate purchasing power. Tax reforms and taxpaying must be simplified. There must be an incentive for business to expand production and employment for the individual to invest his savings in such expansion.

We have kept that pledge.

Three times President Truman vetoed tax-reduction bills passed by Congress, but the third time we passed it over his veto and our people today are receiving that tax relief.

Excessive taxes are a drag upon production. They stifle initiative. They are a major factor in the cost of living, because they enter into the cost of everything from a haircut to an automobile.

Taxes consume more than 25 cents out of every dollar that the housewife spends on groceries.

For the American working men and women the Republican Congress through tax reduction is providing more take-home pay, and by restoring sanity to the tax structure we are replenishing the wells of investment capital so there may be new plants, plant expansion, jobs and more production of the goods we need to adjust prices.

Under way is a complete overhauling of the entire tax code, which the New Deal administrations in their zeal to use taxation as a weapon for social and economic change have scrambled into confusing rules and regulations.

The United States Constitution is explicit in lodging the taxing power in Congress. The founding fathers never intended that one man—the President—shall decide how taxes shall be levied, though he may make recommendations.

Only one President before President Truman invaded the taxing power of Congress by abuse of the Presidential veto. President Franklin D. Roosevelt did it, and Congress swiftly overrode his veto as an affront to representative government.

TREASURY ESTIMATES UNDEPENDABLE

President Truman said the Federal Treasury could not stand a tax reduction and the Treasury Department backed him by grossly underestimating revenues. All through the battle over tax reduction, the Treasury Department grossly erred in its estimates. However, Congress relied upon its own judgment and the dependable estimates of its Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

The Treasury Department predicted a deficit of $4,500,000,000 for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1947, and when that date arrived there was a surplus of $754,000,000. First estimates by the Treasury Department on probable revenue during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1948, were $5,946,000,000 below the final result, but in August 1947, a few days after the first two tax bills had been killed by vetoes, the Treasury Department began to make public estimates closer to the mark.

When the third and successful tax-reduction bill was passed by the Republican Congress, the Treasury surplus could not be concealed and fiscal year 1948 ended with a surplus of $8,419,469,843, seven times larger than the previous high established 21 years ago.

The President, in desperately seeking to justify his unwarranted vetoes of the tax relief now being received by the people, launched a campaign to scare the people. He sought to make the people believe that as a result of the tax reduction by the Republican Congress there would be a deficit in the Federal Treasury for the 1949 fiscal year.

Treasury deficits, resulting in deficit-financing and artificial expansion of the currency, are not new to New Deal Democrat administrations. They had them every year they were in power until the Republican Congress took over control of the Nation's purse strings.

The President and his willing Treasury Department bookkeepers have deliberately overestimated expenditures and underestimated revenues for political purposes.

The people have a right to candor from public officials. In widely missing the mark in revenue estimates, the Treasury Department, as President Truman's agent, did so either deliberately to deceive the Congress and the people or through sheer incompetence. Either is inexcusable.

TAX CUT FAVORS SMALL WAGE EARNER

The Republican Congress gave its verdict on behalf of tax relief by overriding President Truman's third veto in the Senate 77 to 10 and in the House by a vote of 311 to 88.

Thwarted in his tax and tax policy, the President in campaign speeches has misrepresented the Tax Reduction Act, using the New Dealers' technique of misrepresentation in a demagogic effort to catch votes.

The cold fact is that 71 percent of the $4,800,000,000 in tax relief provided is going to persons with incomes of less than $5,000 a year.

About 7,400,000 taxpayers in the lowest brackets no longer have to pay any Federal income tax.

Percentage tax reductions range from 12.6 in the lower brackets down to 5 percent in the top brackets.

Husbands and wives are permitted to split their income for tax purposes, thereby lightening the family tax burden, and eliminating discrimination against citizens of many States. An additional $600 tax exemption is granted to taxpayers who are over 65 years of age and for the blind there is an additional $600 exemption. That is practical social-security legislation.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

We Republicans, in our preelection statement of principles, policies, and objectives, said:

> We reaffirm our belief in the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively with employers as one of the cornerstones of competitive enterprise. The processes of such bargaining must be protected and strengthened if we are to have real jobs and prosperity for all.
> For that purpose we believe that Government decisions should not be substituted for free agreement, but governmental machinery to promote peaceful settlement of disputes should be improved.
> Demands of either side must be kept within the bounds of reason and fairness and both sides must recognize the rights of the general public.

We have kept those pledges.

Those principles and policies are embodied in the Labor-Management Act passed by the Eightieth Congress. The new labor law is proving beneficial to labor, management, and the public.

Congress passed the act over President Truman's indefensible veto.

Nearly four-fifths of all the Members of Congress joined in overriding the veto, whereas only a two-thirds majority was necessary to do so. In the final vote on the bill a majority of the participating Democrats joined the well-nigh unanimous Republican membership in support of the measure. The House of Representatives overrode the President's veto 331 to 83, only 1 short of 4 to 1. The Senate vote was 68 to 25, or 6 more than a two-thirds majority of the 93 Senators who voted.

Voting in the House of Representatives to override the veto were 225 Republicans and 106 Democrats. Voting to sustain the veto were 11 Republicans, 71 Democrats, and 1 American-Laborite. In the Senate the division by parties was: Republicans for overriding the veto, 48; Democrats, 20. In favor of sustaining the veto were 3 Republicans and 22 Democrats.

Evidence President Truman let down the American people when he vetoed the new Labor Act, comes from his own administrative agencies—the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor.

The Department of Commerce reported August 9, 1948, personal income had increased to an annual rate of $211,900,000,000 in June from $207,200,000,000 in the previous month. The Department said:

> This increase resulted from the absence of major labor-management disputes, the effects of third-round wage increases in some of the durable-goods industries, and higher prices received by farmers for livestock products.

Thus, experience under the Taft-Hartley Act refutes President Truman's gloomy predictions on behalf of special interests and ignorant appraisal of the act when he vetoed it.

NEW LABOR ACT BENEFITS ALL

For the story on how well the new labor law is operating, it seems well to cover the entire postwar period dating back to VJ-day, August 15, 1945, thereby obtaining a comparison before and after the new law became effective August 22, 1947. From the regular reports of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, it is evident the new law is doing the job of improving labor-management relations as intended by Congress, and as demanded by the people.

Since the Labor-Management Relations Act became effective, strikes in manufacturing industries, bituminous-coal mining, and the private building industry have decreased substantially. Work stoppages under the old law averaged 395 a month. They have been cut to an average of 201 under the new law.

This represents a reduction in strikes of 49 percent.

The number of workers involved in new strikes each month from VJ-day until the new labor act was 337,000 each month. The average number of workers so involved since the act is 131,000.

This is a reduction of 61 percent under the new law.

From VJ-day until the new act the average number of man-days of idleness caused by work stoppages was 7,213,000 per month. Under the new law this figure has been cut to 2,613,000 per month.

The record shows that under the new law wages have continued to rise, more leisure time has been made available through a shorter workweek, and average hourly earnings also have increased.

The vital point is that labor is making these gains under the new law through peaceful, collective bargaining, whereas before the new labor act gains were more frequently made through costly strikes. Wage increases through peaceful negotiations are vastly more important to all concerned than wage increases obtained at the expense of lost wages and lost production. Thus, the new Labor Act is providing a better annual wage for workers and a more constant and increasing supply of things urgently needed as a solvent for high prices.

During 1946, the blackest year in work stoppages, workers lost 116,000,000 mandays, while at present the annual rate is running about a fourth as much. On the basis of higher wage rates, the savings to workers would be in excess of a billion dollars a year.

Under the new labor act's sound principles our country is building a rule of reason for cooperation between employers and employees for their mutual benefit and for the good of all our people.

WORKERS' RIGHTS DEFINED

In the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page A3345, I analyzed the provisions of the new labor law in detail. I shall refer here only to its more important clauses.

It preserves in the same language that appears in the Wagner Act, the rights of workers to organize and to bargain collectively, and just as the old act did, it forbids employers to interfere with the employees, or to threaten or coerce them when they exercise these rights.

It forbids unions to beat up workers, or to threaten or coerce workers to force them into a union, or force them to choose one union when they wish to choose another.

It guarantees free speech to both employers and union, allowing them to talk to workers as long as they do not threaten workers or try to bribe them to join or not to join a union.

It forbids employers and unions, by agreement between themselves, to force workers to join the union and to pay dues to it unless the majority of the workers by secret ballot, have voted in favor of the agreement, and even then it forbids depriving a man of his job by denying union membership to him as long as he is willing to pay initiation fees and dues.

It forbids employers to check off union dues unless the worker has voluntarily authorized the employer to do so.

When employers and unions establish funds for the welfare of workers and their families, it requires them to do so under arrangements that will make certain that the money will be used for these purposes and not for other purposes of the union leaders.

It requires unions and employers, when labor contracts come to an end, to negotiate for 60 days before engaging in a strike or lock-out.

It forbids unions, by jurisdictional strikes and boycotts, to try to get control over employees who have not chosen the union as their bargaining agent, or who have chosen another union as their bargaining agent.

It requires unions, in order to be recognized as labor organizations under the Wagner Act, to tell their members how much money they take in, where they get it and what they spend it for, and to disclose what they pay their officers, how much they charge for dues, the grounds on which they suspend or expel members, and other matters that the members are entitled to know.

It exempts foremen and other supervisors from the provisions of the Wagner Act, requires the Board to regard them as employers, not as employees.

It forbids the Labor Board, which administers the Wagner Act, to compel skilled workers to bargain through an industrial union when they wish to bargain through a craft union.

It requires unions, in order to be recognized as labor organizations under the Wagner Act, to file affidavits of their officers saying the officers are not Communists or fellow travelers.

It forbids corporations to use stockholders' money for political purposes and forbids unions to use members' money for political purposes.

It makes unions subject to suits for damages, the same as corporations and other organizations, when they break their contracts or engage in unlawful activities.

It enables the President again to delay for a time strikes that imperil the public health or safety, as he did in the great coal strike early this year.

It makes the Conciliation Service an independent agency, directs it to try to prevent strikes—it cannot forbid strikes—and authorizes it to take a secret ballot of employees before a strike if the union is willing.

It requires unions, as well as employers, to bargain in good faith when employees choose the union as their bargaining agent.

It requires the Labor Board to use fair procedures and to render fair decisions whether the cases involve charges against employers or charges against unions.

It sets up a joint committee of Congress to study labor-management relations. If defects in the law appear, we will change the law. We will not stubbornly resist change as the New Dealers did for so long.

Now these are fair provisions. The law is a good law. The law will not prevent all strikes, but it has been proven to be fair and just, and with honest administration it will bring a greater measure of peace to the industrial scene than we have known for many years.

COMMUNISM

Our Republican statement of principles of government declared emphatically for "the protection of the American way of life against either Fascist or Communist trends."

We have kept that pledge.

Congressional disclosures of Communists' spy rings running through the Truman administration like water through a sieve shock the American people and leave them resentful against the administration for failure to rid the Government of subversive rascals.

The people are amazed that the President of the United States has refused to cooperate with the Republican Congress in exposing these alien-minded forces that seek to destroy our Republic. In the opinion of competent lawyers he has stretched his legal prerogatives in order to deny the Republican Congress information necessary for guidance in enacting laws.

Even as the evidence piled up that the offices of Government, before, during, and since the war under New Deal regimes, swarmed with Communists, pinkos, left-wingers, and radical New Dealers, the President sought to wash away the national scandal by charging the Republican Congress was dragging a "red herring" across his alleged anti-inflation program.

But the American people know the facts. They know that all through the tragic New Deal era the Republican Party has been relentlessly battling communism, fascism, and other alien isms. Our united Republican Party is not the haven or refuge of these subversives. Ours is not the party in which they have been successful borers and policy guiders.

RED SPIES JAILED

Ten years ago the House of Representatives created a Special Committee on Un-American Activities. Seven years later it was made one of the standing committees of the House of Representatives.

Through all the years, New Dealers from the President down, their political machine and camp followers, have waged a smear campaign against the committee in an effort to discredit its highly patriotic activity.

When the Republican Party was assigned control of the Eightieth Congress and thus became able to direct the campaign against subversionists, loose ends and threads to deplorable conditions were woven into an historic exposure of shameful dereliction of duty by those in charge of the offices of Government.

President Truman, while declaiming against Communists' aggression abroad, has given little more than lip service to elimination of Communists from his own administration. This vital job has been bogged down by a confusion of committees and checkers, though the Congress appropriated millions of dollars for a clean sweep.

Each time the Congress revealed groups of disloyal persons on the Federal payroll, fumbling and bungling followed in the executive branch, with plainly no will by those in top authority to purge them.

Agents of Fascist countries, Communists and fuzzy-thinking New Dealers are all of the same shoddy cloth, and the Republican Congress has warred on all of them.

Gerhart Eisler, described as the No. 1 agent of the Communist International in the United States, was exposed by Congress, found in contempt of Congress, convicted in court of passport frauds, and sentenced to prison.

ANTICOMMUNISM LAW ADVANCED

Came evidence that persons highly placed in the Government were meeting clandestinely with spies directed by Moscow; evidence spies were given money by Russian Communists in Washington; evidence of shipment of atomic-bomb materials to Soviet Russia; evidence top military secrets were obtained by the Red spy rings; evidence Government officials in positions to know secrets vital to our Nation's security were transferred from one Government position to another while under FBI investigation.

Activities of foreign-directed agents in our schools, colleges, industries, and civic life have been exposed. Depredations of Communists in the Hollywood film industry were exposed. Some of those Communists have been sentenced to prison for defying the constitutional authority of Congress to investigate subversive movements.

Advanced during the Republican Congress was comprehensive legislation to require registration of Communists under alien control, so that they and their revolutionary propaganda may be exposed to the purifying antidote of Americanism. The Mundt-Nixon bill to effect those purposes was overwhelmingly passed by the House of Representatives—319 to 58—and is now being considered by the Senate.

As in so many other fields of government, cooperation between the President and Congress in eliminating Communists and other subversives from the Government is necessary if our Republic is to be safeguarded against spies in and out of the Government.

It is obvious that an administration which harbors so many who see in the Russian way of doing things a better system than our own, could not be expected to follow a consistent and firm position in dealing with communism at home or abroad.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

On national defense, this is what we said in our statement of principles, policies, and objectives:

We stand for a well-trained and fully equipped Army, Navy, and Air Force adequate to meet any emergency under future conditions of warfare. It must be supported by the most scientific research, a strong industrial system, and adequate reserves of trained men with the best weapons and equipment.

We have kept that pledge.

National defense was one of the major problems inherited by the Republican Congress from the tired hands of the incompetent Democratic administration. The armed services were in the throes of transition from the wartime basis to a peacetime establishment.

There was much confusion in plans and purposes, no coordinated effective program, and the President oblivious to our disintegrating defenses.

We acted swiftly and thoroughly to correct that deplorable condition and to give our country an effective national defense establishment in these times of uneasy peace.

First. We passed a bill providing for unification of the armed services, with departments for air, ground, and naval forces, each headed by a Secretary, and a Secretary of Defense over all, but under the President as Commander in Chief.

Not many months passed before we discovered that instead of getting unification the country was getting more triplification.

We created a Joint Congressional Aviation Policy Committee to study the needs in air power. That committee reported on March 1, 1948, that the armed services were in such conflict over missions to be performed by each that any appropriations by Congress for the armed forces would be unrealistic until the Joint Chiefs of Staff were agreed upon a unified plan of action. The President, in January 1948, submitted to Congress a budget for the armed forces, but our investigations revealed his recommendations had been based on very superficial study.

After the congressional committee made its report exposing the serious disintegration of our national defense because of President Truman's incompetence, there was a meeting of the top admirals and generals at Key West, Fla., with the Secretary of Defense. Simultaneously, Congress was rationalizing the Military Establishment budget, though it was not until June 1, 1948, that the President submitted his final estimate to Congress for the Navy.

For the national defense establishment to spend during fiscal year 1949, which began July 1, 1948, Congress appropriated $11,754,814,613, divided as follows: Military, $6,705,418,163; Navy, $3,800,396,450; to launch 70-group air force, $949,000,000; for stocking of strategic and critical materials, $300,000,000.

In addition, Congress gave the Air Force and Navy authority to make contracts in the 70-group air-force program totaling $2,275,000,000; gave the Army contract authority up to $220,000,000; authorized contracts for strategic and critical materials up to $300,000,000, and gave the Navy construction contract authority up to $50,000,000. These make a total in contract authorizations of $2,845,000,000.

Thus, cash appropriations and contract authorizations made by Congress for the Military Establishment during fiscal year 1949 totaled $14,599,814,613.

During the first session there was appropriated $8,751,295,733 in cash and there were contract authorizations amounting to $777,000,000, making $9,528,295,733 in cash and contract authorizations available for fiscal year 1948.

All of these cash appropriations and contract authorizations during the first and second sessions of the Republican Congress for the Military Establishment totaled $24,128,110,346.

CONGRESS ENACTS OVER-ALL PLAN

Throughout the battle for defense controversy raged over proposals for universal military training and selective service. Congress resolved these issues in line with the over-all plan of action and balanced defenses which was our paramount objective.

We passed a temporary Selective Service Act to provide the personnel necessary to the armed services. Under this act all men 18 through 25 must register, but only those 19 through 25 are subject to induction. Eighteen-year-old youths may obtain exemption from a later draft call by volunteering for 1 year's active service in the United States, 6 additional years in the Reserves.

There are other grounds for deferment from the draft in the act. Under the act the authorized strength of the Military Establishment was expanded to 2,166,882 officers and enlisted men—the Army to a maximum of 947,000 from the 548,000 strength at mid-June 1948; Navy and Marine Corps to 702,882 from 469,000; and Air Force to 517,000 from the June actual strength of 382,000.

Those in direct charge of the defense of the Nation have vigorously asserted the absolute need for these additional men in the armed services and they have also insisted they could not be obtained by voluntary enlistment.

Hence the passage of the temporary Selective Service Act, but we Republicans confidently assert that, with a Republican President cooperating with a Republican Congress in handling the foreign and domestic affairs of the Nation, the need for a long-continued peacetime draft will be eliminated.

However, the Republican Congress, intent as Republicans always are upon the Nation's security and unwilling to gamble with the national defense, has moved decisively and energetically to provide an adequate and efficient force properly equipped for the protection of our country.

WAR VETERANS

In our Republican statement of principles, policies, and objectives, we made this pledge:

A grateful nation demands that those who fought in its defense, their widows and orphans, must never be forgotten. The best medical care and rehabilitation, education, and training for all desiring it, and official assistance in securing homes, farms, businesses, and real jobs must be provided for the veterans.

We have kept that pledge.

The Republican Congress, including 225 war veterans, recognizes its patriotic responsibility in seeing that the millions of men and women who served under the colors are treated fairly and generously as our grateful Nation demands.

As evidence of its good faith, this Congress enacted 188 laws—21 percent of all the public laws it passed—that are directly benefiting war veterans.

All of the laws enacted by the Republican Congress for the benefit of war veterans were passed after President Truman stated in a message to Congress on January 6, 1947, that "except for minor adjustments, I believe our program of benefits for the veterans is now complete."

The Director of the Veterans' Administration has filed reports against scores of measures when they were introduced into Congress. In these reports the Director stated that the proposed legislation was not in accord with the President's program.

But notwithstanding the position taken by President Truman as expressed in his message and as represented by the Director of the Veterans' Administration in his reports to Congress, the Republican Congress found that the program for veterans' benefits was far from completed. We acted in the interest of the veterans.

HOUSING PROGRAM MEETING NEEDS

The vast veterans' housing program, launched by the Republican Congress and strengthened from time to time, after the Truman administration had utterly failed, is doing the job of providing veterans homes.

Priorities over all other citizens and specially liberal financing backed by the credit of the United States highlight the veterans' housing program enacted by the Republican Congress.

The legislation—

Provides veterans shall have priority in purchase or rental of all newly constructed housing.

Expands and liberalizes Government mortgage insurance so that veterans may obtain home loans with low down payments and a reasonable time to pay.

Continues rent control with effective administration by local authorities dealing directly with their neighbors.

Protects married veterans with children against discrimination in renting homes financed under title VI of the National Housing Act.

Makes veterans' housing cooperatives eligible for Government-insured financing up to 95 percent of cost of construction; and changes allowable cost limitation from $1,550 to $1,800 per room. This permits flexibility in meeting needs of veterans with large families.

Authorizes sale of 165,000 permanent, Government-owned wartime housing units to veterans at prices not exceeding construction cost, and makes it possible for veterans to buy these homes at from $3,000 to $4,000 each, with financial assistance through 90 percent FHA insurance and the Government's secondary mortgage market.

Appropriates funds to complete a $468,000,000 temporary housing program for veterans and their families while the veterans attend schools and colleges under the GI bill.

Authorizes Government financial assistance in construction of specially designed homes for veterans paralyzed from the waist down, with the Government bearing half the cost.

Facilitates financing of GI home mortgage loans by providing a Government secondary market in the Federal National Mortgage Association, which may buy up to 50 percent of all such mortgages made after April 30, 1948, as contrasted with the previous limit of 25 percent.

This measure, with other legislation passed by the Republican Congress, makes it possible for veterans to obtain 100 percent Government guaranteed or insured financing in home building.

Emphasizes new homes within the ability of veterans generally to pay. The average veteran home mortgage guaranteed by the GI bill is $5,756. Since more than 1,200,000 veterans have secured mortgage loans aggregating more than $7,000,000,000 under this act, it is obvious that law is meeting veterans' needs. And it does not expire until July 1, 1957.

In addition to all of these special considerations which war veterans are entitled to have, they are also benefiting from the Housing Act of 1948, which is designed to increase low-cost construction through more favorable financing terms than is allowed for high-cost homes.

Decent homes for veterans at prices they can afford to pay are being provided, and they are going up in the American way of doing things. War veterans, like others, have been caught in the effects of 16 years of New Deal bad government.

To cover their increased cost of living, higher costs while undergoing rehabilitation, training in industry, on the farm and at school, and to help meet increased costs for veterans' widows and orphans, the Republican Congress has provided increases in payments, allowances and benefits.

CASHED TERMINAL-LEAVE BONDS

We corrected a shameful New Deal injustice to the enlisted men of the last war, when we passed a bill to cash immediately the GI's terminal-leave bonds, despite the opposition of President Truman and Secretary of the Treasury Snyder. The cash is going to the men now, when they need it most—when they are converting from the war.

More than 9,000,000 of the terminal-leave bonds had been issued, and it was estimated about 12,000,000 veterans would receive their pay in cash, like the officers did, instead of bonds at a cost of $2,500,000,000.

By redeeming the bonds we not only corrected an injustice to veterans, we also cut the national debt and interest charges.

Passed was a bill raising the ceiling on wages and subsistence allowances to veterans undergoing on-the-job training as follows: Two hundred and ten dollars monthly for veterans without dependents, formerly $175; $270 for veterans with one dependent, formerly $200, and $290 for veterans with two or more dependents, formerly $200. Proportional increases for part-time institutional and institutional on-the-farm trainees is provided, and overtime is excluded in determining ceilings.

Another act increases compensation for dependent survivors of war dead. Increases range from $15 a month for a widow with no children to $21.40 for a widow with two children. Orphans and dependent parents are also covered by the increase.

A bill passed by this Congress provides additional compensation for a veteran who has dependents and is entitled to compensation at wartime schedules for service-connected disabilities rated at not less than 60 percent. The additional compensation ranges from $21 a month for a veteran with a wife only to $56 for a veteran with a wife and three children. A $17.50 provision also is made for each dependent parent.

AID COVERS WIDE RANGE

Other bills among the 188 passed by the Republican Congress on behalf of veterans do the following:

Provide $11,500,000 to buy automobiles for about 7,000 amputees.

Increase pensions of Spanish-American War and Civil War veterans and their dependents by 20 percent.

Permit commutation of travel expenses for vocational training purposes.

Establish for first time in history a comprehensive retirement pay program for men who serve in the reserve armed forces.

Authorize $1,000,000 annually to Veterans' Administration for prosthetic-appliance research.

Authorize additional period of 5 years for all level-premium-term insurance on all policies issued prior to January 1, 1948.

Establish the Women's Army Corps—WAC—in the Regular Army and authorize enlistment and appointment of women in the Regular Navy and Marine Corps Reserves.

Provide medical care for reservists who are injured or contract diseases while engaged in military training.

Allow compensation for American citizens and military personnel for injuries resulting from wartime internment.

Authorize medical care for Philippine veterans serving in the armed forces of the Commonwealth of the Philippines while such forces were in the armed services of the United States.

Increase from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000 the revolving fund for loans to World War II veterans engaged in vocational training.

Extend time for bringing alien fiancées to the United States.

Refund income taxes for year in which servicemen died while in war service.

Increase Federal aid to State or Territorial homes for support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States from $300 to $500 until June 30, 1951, and $300 a year per person thereafter.

Amend civil-service code to prevent discrimination against physically handicapped veterans in Government positions.

Exempt hospitalized servicemen from the Federal tax on admissions to baseball games, theaters, and other entertainments.

Allow presumption of service connection for chronic and tropical diseases in applying for disability benefits.

Authorize a subsistence allowance to World War II veterans of $1 a day for each day spent as prisoners of Japan.

Allow service credit for enlisted men of the Coast Guard who acted as policemen and guards at Ivigtut cryolite mine, Greenland, during 1940 and 1941.

Equalize retirement benefits among members of the Army and Navy nurses' corps.

Preserve seniority rights of 10-point preference eligibles in postal service transferring from position of letter carrier to clerk, or vice versa.

Increase peacetime service-connected disability compensation rates from 75 to 80 percent of wartime rates.

GOVERNMENT CONTROLS, HOUSING

This is what we pledged:

Wartime limitations, restrictions, and controls must be removed. The instant a right or liberty can be returned to the people it shall be returned. Neither the war nor any other excuse shall be justification for fastening regimentation upon the American people.

We have kept that pledge.

We forced the elimination of 76,000 restrictive rules, regulations, directives, and orders. The American people breathed a sigh of relief for this signal from the Republican Congress. In none of the people's activities was the green light more productive of progress than in the building of homes.

The Republican Congress took the housing problem from the incompetent, frustrated Truman administration and generated the biggest building boom in the world's history.

When the Emergency Housing Act was under consideration in 1946, the administration claimed it would mean construction of 1,200,000 dwelling units in 1946 and 1,500,000 in 1947.

Congress granted unlimited emergency powers to the Truman administration and hundreds of millions in subsidy funds. That program was a tragic failure.

The Truman administration's approach was to create overlapping housing agencies with a fanfare of trumpets and glowing promises. The bureaucrats were loath to release their withering grip on the building industry. They clung to their power to shove people around, but we freed the people and the result is the biggest building boom in all time.

During 1946, when the Truman administration had the power to control every inch of board and every nail, only 435,800 new permanent dwelling units were completed.

In 1947, after the Republican Congress freed the people of Government red-tape rules, regulations, and directives, and launched a sound Government-aid program, 835,100 units were completed.

The President's economic report submitted to Congress in August 1948 estimated that more than 1,000,000 new residential units will be built in 1948.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that by the end of June, $7,700,000,000 had been spent for new construction in 1948, or 35 percent more than in the corresponding 6 months of 1947, with more than half the increase going into home construction.

That is construction—new homes, not Truman blueprints.

LOW-COST HOMES EMPHASIZED

The guiding principle of the housing legislation passed by the Republican Congress is to make the Government financial backing more attractive for construction of low-cost dwelling units than for the more expensive residences, thereby increasing the proportion of low-cost homes out of the limited resources in skilled manpower and materials.

Here are some of the ways this is being accomplished:

Authorization of an additional $800,000,000 for insurance of loans on large-scale, moderately-priced rental units under section 608 of title VI.

Loans made more easily available for manufacture of prefabricated housing under section 609 of title VI.

An addition to section 611 of title VI, providing for construction loans of 80 percent on homes with a value of $7,500 or less, where at least 25 homes are being built in a single project.

An amendment to title II of the National Housing Act authorizing 95 percent buyers' loans on homes costing up to $6,300, with 85 percent construction loans authorized for such cases.

Establishment of a division in the Federal Housing Administration to work toward standardization of the confused and haphazard local building codes and measurements of building materials—an undertaking many years over due and heavy with possibilities for better city planning and better homes at less cost.

A yield-insurance program guaranteeing equity investors 2.75 percent annual interest on their money, provided they set rents to yield not more than 3.5 percent annual income on investment.

And enactment of an amendment to section 207 of title II authorizing the FHA to guarantee loans for States and municipalities and nonprofit corporations for the construction of rental housing.

Thus, the record shows that the Republican Congress has acted with wisdom, with fairness, and with efficiency, to stimulate the construction of housing units so urgently needed by our people. No amount of misrepresentation or demagoguery by Mr. Truman or any of his henchmen can conceal this fact from the American people.

To see is to believe, and our people are seeing the housing units being built across the land. Our interest in a housing program, immediate and long range, shall continue. We are licking the housing problem in the American way and in that way we shall win.

AGRICULTURE, RECLAMATION, FLOOD CONTROL

Our Republican declaration of principles said:

> We have pledged stability of farm prices during the reconversion and readjustment periods. We will carry out those pledges. We will support sound, permanent proposals to give farmers expanding markets and their fair share of the national income. We reaffirm our long-standing support of soil-and-water conservation. We shall support measures designed to protect better rural living.

We have kept that pledge.

Accomplishments of the Republican Congress for agriculture and thereby strengthening our whole national economy are unsurpassed by any previous Congress.

Instead of the collapse in commodity prices that President Truman forecast in a message to Congress in 1945, there has been and continues to be a tremendous world demand for food.

The American farmers gave all-out production during the war. The Republican Congress has kept faith with the farmers by continuing reasonable Government support of prices in return for maximum production of food. As a result of the actions of the Republican Congress, farmers now have confidence and assurance as they toil and sweat.

For the happiness and contentment of the farmers, and the protection of the consumers, the Republican Congress has contributed in many ways. Here, briefly, are our major accomplishments:

Enacted farm price support legislation geared to the present emergency demand for food exports and to the long-range welfare of both consumers and producers, with these high lights.

First. The basic commodities are supported at 90 percent of parity through June 30, 1950.

Second. The major nonbasic commodities are supported at 60 to 90 percent of parity through December 31, 1949, except that milk and its products, hogs, chickens, and eggs are supported at 90 percent of parity for that period.

Third. Beginning January 1, 1950, the provisions of the long-range price support program will go into effect. These include a general revision of the parity formula to take into consideration the varying costs of agricultural production, changes in the pattern of consumption, and other factors.

"Parity" is a formula approved by Congress to equalize prices for what the farmer sells and prices of things he buys.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION EXPANDED

Authorized $800,000,000 in loans for rural electrification, twice as much as any previous Congress and only $275,000,000 less than the total amount provided for REA work prior to the Eightieth Congress.

REA electricity was extended during fiscal year 1948 to 400,000 farm homes—more than twice as many as in any prewar year—and an even larger number of farm homes are scheduled to receive electricity during the 1949 fiscal year.

REA Administrator Claude R. Wickard, in a letter to Congressman HALLECK dated August 6, 1948, said:

> The rural electrification program is continuing to set new records for progress. This past May, for which we now have reports, was one of the best months in the entire history of the program. More than 50,000 consumers were added to REA-financed power lines, an average of 1 connection every 14 seconds of every workday.

SOIL CONSERVATION EXTENDED

Appropriated more than $500,000,000 for soil-conservation activities on American farms.

Authorized $262,500,000 for soil-conservation payments for 1949.

We began extensive studies with a view to adoption of a long-range comprehensive governmental policy for restoration and conservation of the Nation's agricultural resources. Pending enactment of such a program, we extended the authority for AAA soil-conservation payments through 1951.

RECORD ROAD-BUILDING PROGRAM

Launched the greatest rural road-building program ever undertaken cooperatively by the Federal and State Governments.

Appropriated almost twice as much money for Federal participation in secondary road construction as was spent by the Federal Government for that purpose in the 10 years prior to 1948.

Compared with Federal expenditures for secondary roads in the 10 fiscal years 1938–47, totaling $112,000,000, the Republican Congress appropriated $74,000,000 for that purpose in fiscal 1948 and $128,000,000 for fiscal 1949. This will make possible a Federal-State secondary road program more than five times as great as in any single previous year.

Authorized $450,000,000 for Federal participation in road building during 1950 and the same amount for 1951. Funds are to be divided 45 percent for primary roads, 25 percent for city thoroughfares, and 30 percent for secondary rural roads.

In addition, the Republican Congress enacted an entirely new crop insurance act, providing a sound and businesslike program of insurance for a great many agricultural commodities; strengthened the Farmers' Marketing Act; chartered the Commodity Credit Corporation; stabilized the sugar market in the interests of consumers and producers; rescued wool growers by extending the price support program, after the Secretary of Agriculture's April 15, 1947, order terminating the price-support program had plunged the wool producers into disaster; and the Republican Congress provided liberally for campaigns against the livestock foot-and-mouth disease, cattle grub, weeds, insects, and other pests.

GOP CONGRESS FOSTERED RECLAMATION

One of the most brazen attempts of the Truman administration to convert a sound, nonpartisan national program into a political football and vehicle for radical New Deal planners is its treatment of the reclamation program that is so vital to the West.

Panicky and at wit's end over the problems of conversion from war to peace, President Truman in August 1946, issued his infamous order freezing one-half of the money Congress had appropriated for the Reclamation Service's construction fund. Urgently needed irrigation and power projects were slowed down, contract negotiations were canceled, and the whole program was thrown out of gear.

The reclamation program had been furthered through the years by nonpartisan support. Party lines had been dropped as whole communities battled unitedly for water and power primarily essential to take care of the growth of the West.

When the Republican Congress convened we rescued the reclamation program, which, incidentally, was fathered by the Republican Party back in President Theodore Roosevelt's administration.

We investigated the Reclamation Service in the Department of the Interior and found scandalous conditions. In an effort to discredit the Republican Congress orders were given to spend appropriations faster than the prudent schedules provided by Congress, so that funds would be exhausted prematurely and thereby foment dissatisfaction among the people.

Evidence was obtained in support of charges that the Reclamation Service had misled Congress on the amount of unused funds in the construction program.

This Congress has appropriated more money for reclamation than any previous Congress—$389,804,000—and we intend that it shall be spent wisely.

We have provided more money for river and harbor improvement than any previous Congress—$285,500,000.

For flood control we exceeded all previous congressional outlays in making $712,063,000 available.

These are expenditures that come under the category of must, and the Republican Congress fully recognizes its responsibility in fostering reclamation, river and harbor improvement, and flood control.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

On foreign affairs this is what our Republican declaration, in part, said:

> We support the United Nations organization for international peace. * * * We support the indispensable inter-American system as a regional part of the international organization. * * * We will engage in essential international relief as a humanitarian obligation and to prevent chaos through misery. * * * We will seek to find common policies with the other great powers. * * * We consider that the maintenance of a strong, solvent, free America is the basis of our greatest contribution to world order.

We have kept that pledge.

In foreign affairs, the Republican Congress has complied with all its constitutional responsibilities. We have striven for an enduring world peace.

We have kept all congressional commitments to the United Nations, acted to strengthen solidarity of the Western Hemisphere, provided generously for relief and recovery of foreign nations wracked by the war, and insisted upon the American way in our dealings with all nations.

Fulfilling our commitments and obligations undertaken, we authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend the United Nations $65,000,000 for construction of headquarters buildings in New York, as further evidence of our support and interest in the United Nations as an agency for the peaceful settlement of international disputes.

Our Federal Constitution divides responsibility and duties in foreign relations between the President and the Congress. In the President is lodged the prerogative of negotiating with foreign countries, and in the Congress, or the Senate as the case may be, is vested the duty of approving, amending, or rejecting treaties that the President negotiates.

Implicit in the Constitution is teamwork, cooperation between the President and the Congress.

The founding fathers never intended that foreign policy should be made by only one man—the President. The people reserved that right for themselves, acting through their representatives in the Congress and their President.

New Deal Democrat Presidents, past and present, have stretched their constitutional right to make agreements with foreign governments. They have caused situations repugnant to our Republic. In the creation of these tragic situations the Republican Congress has had no part.

When the Republican Congress convened in January 1947, the seeds for many of the ills that now confront our country and which have threatened lasting peace had already been planted. The Republican Party had no part in the planting.

Neither the Republican leaders in Congress nor the American people were consulted when the secret deals were made at Quebec, Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam—deals designed to remap much of the world, deals to "freeze" the future of our war enemies, and deals that bypass Congress and the American people in the peacemaking.

OPPOSED APPEASEMENT OF RUSSIA

President Truman has consulted Republican congressional leaders on some foreign-affairs policies, but on many vital matters he has not consulted them. When he has consulted our leaders they advised him to steer a consistent course in keeping with American traditions, to be reasonable and firm, and above all not to coddle and appease Soviet Russia.

Instead, the Truman administration's record in foreign affairs is a series of reversals, vacillation, fumbling, and bungling which cannot be escaped or tossed into the lap of the Republican Party as the results of a bipartisan foreign policy.

Many of the ills confronting the United States and the world, root causes for high prices—about $30,000,000,000 in aid given to foreign countries since the cessation of hostilities, and added billions of dollars for materials and absorption of men in rebuilding our own national defense—stem from the betrayals at Quebec, Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam.

Our leaders were not consulted when the tottering structure for peace was built.

In recognizing its responsibility as the policy-making branch of the Government, the Republican Congress sent special committees abroad to gather first-hand information. Sadly lacking, it was found, was an over-all plan and global thinking on the ravages of communistic aggression. Through piecemeal doses the Government had distributed more than $20,000,000,000 among foreign nations since the war's end in its customary loose methods.

VOTED $9,579,657,128 IN FOREIGN AID

During the first session of the Eightieth Congress, we appropriated $2,377,573,900 for foreign aid, including $400,000,000 for assistance to Greece and Turkey and for administration and relief in occupied countries.

During the second session, we appropriated $7,202,083,228 for those purposes, with $1,000,000,000 earmarked for reconstruction and rehabilitation loans.

Thus the Republican Congress appropriated $9,579,657,128 in an effort to help foreign countries get well and preserve their independence against the threat of communism.

ORDERED EFFICIENCY IN FOREIGN AID

We established the Economic Cooperation Administration, with directions for administering the foreign aid in a business-like, efficient way to the end that there shall be happiness and security in the afflicted countries, redounding to our own national security, prosperity, and happiness.

The Republican Party is mindful of the importance of solidarity among the nations of the Western Hemisphere. To that end our party was represented in the successful inter-American conference at Rio de Janiero, Brazil, last year.

The Rio treaty was ratified on December 8, 1947, by the Senate. Under the treaty the American Republics are pledged to strengthen their friendship, to submit controversies between them to peaceful settlement, and to prevent aggression through effective reciprocal assistance.

We reestablished as a single Government corporation the Institute of Inter-American Affairs and the Inter-American Educational Foundation, Inc. The institute is directed to improve social and economic conditions by concrete programs in the fields of public health, sanitation, agriculture, and education.

Under agreement with the United Nations the Pacific islands formerly held by Japan under League of Nations mandate were brought by the Senate into United States trusteeship, the islands to be known as the Territory of the Pacific Islands. They embrace the Marshalls, Carolines, and Marianas, which our gallant troops captured during the war.

We joined the International Refugee Organization and gave it $71,073,900 for its humanitarian work. We passed a bill to admit 205,000 displaced persons into the United States and allow 15,000 war refugees already here to remain.

The Senate ratified treaties of peace with Italy, Rumania, Hungary, and Bulgaria.

AMERICA IS GOING FORWARD

The Republican Congress has delivered on its pledges to the people.

The united Republican Party, through its constructive, forward-looking program has accomplished much during less than 2 years of its control of the Eightieth Congress for the welfare of all the land.

This progress has been made despite obstruction every step of the way by an administration whose philosophy of government revolves around radicalism, regimentation, all-powerful bureaucracy, class exploitation, Government extravagance, stifling and destructive taxation, centralization of power and authority in Washington, coddling of Communists, and corrupt, big city politics.

REPUBLICAN PARTY UPHOLDS CONSTITUTION

For our part, we Republicans reject the alien ideology that calls for an all-powerful central government controlling the lives of the people.

We have faith in our free people—faith and love and confidence in the dignity of man—an abiding faith that free men in our Republic have accomplished more, and will continue to accomplish more, for the happiness and contentment of humanity than has been or can be accomplished by men in any other kind of society.

In our Republic the constitutional course of government is to provide for every citizen an opportunity to improve himself, to encourage him to do so for himself and his children; to keep the Government as his servant and not his master; to promote output of the things that make life pleasant, to lighten debt and taxes, to lay down rules of fair play, and to protect those whose own strength and resources are not sufficient to protect them.

We Republicans in Congress know that the people stand with us in our fight for sound, forward-looking, good government. They are not going back to the sort of bad government of which they have had enough, much too much.

That is why they are going to elect a Republican President who will cooperate with a Republican Congress in carrying forward the cause of good government thus far so well advanced by the Eightieth Congress, a Republican Congress.

America is going forward.

America is going Republican.

Senator C. Wayland Brooks, of Illinois, Commended for Aid in Exposing Communist Infiltration Into United States Governmental Agencies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. WAYLAND BROOKS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter I have received from my colleague the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan, Hon. HOMER FERGUSON, chairman of the Senate Investigations Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
August 7, 1948.

Hon. C. WAYLAND BROOKS,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As we come to the close of this special session of the Eightieth Congress, it becomes more apparent that you have rendered an unusual and most important service to the American people when, as chairman of the powerful Rules and Administration Committee of the Senate, you used your influence in expediting the continuance and creation of congressional committees charged with inquiring into the efficiency of governmental operations for the guidance of the Congress and the benefit of the public.

I recall your efforts in making the continuance of the War Investigating Committee a first order of business for the Senate when we met in January of 1947, and your effective work in securing approval of the Rules and Administration Committee for Senate Resolution 46 to continue authority for investigation of the national defense program, and the promptness with which you reported that resolution and paved way for its ultimate adoption by a vote of 49 to 43 on January 20, 1947.

In January 1948, your effective leadership was again demonstrated when you obtained prompt approval from the Rules and Administration Committee for Senate Resolution 189, to authorize the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to create an investigating subcommittee charged specifically with inquiries into the efficiency of Government's activities and to carry on with the work of the War Investigating Committee.

We know that the Democratic Members of the Senate voted almost unanimously against Senate Resolution 46. Democratic opposition was again evident in January 1948, when your colleague from Illinois and the minority whip, Senator LUCAS, delayed final adoption of Senate Resolution 189 until late in February by his motion to reconsider the Senate action of January 28, which had approved creation of the investigating subcommittee. The fact that both of these resolutions were adopted by the Senate with a minimum of delay proves the effectiveness of your leadership.

In the face of such opposition to these measures it is significant to emphasize the most recent developments in the course of hearings before the Senate investigations subcommittee. Those hearings brought out the existence of widespread espionage activities among Government personnel. One individual was identified as having been associated with those activities, and the committee has sought to find how it was possible for such an individual, whose loyalty was at least suspect and apparently known to be so by his superiors, could have been retained in Government service and advanced to positions of utmost strategic importance. Our efforts to determine the facts in that respect have now been effectively blocked by a refusal of the Executive to furnish the committee with necessary information, thus concealing the true facts from the Congress and the people.

You have made a tremendous contribution to the work of this Congress and to the people of America, for it is effective legislative work such as yours that has made representative government in America the envy of the world. As chairman of the Senate investigations subcommittee, I want to extend to you my sincere and grateful thanks for the foresight which has made possible the existence of the subcommittee and the service which this subcommittee is seeking to render to the American people.

With best wishes,
Sincerely,

HOMER FERGUSON,
United States Senator.

No Laughing Matter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I consider the following editorial of the Tulsa Daily World of Tulsa, Okla., which appeared August 6, 1948, very appropriate at this time:

NO LAUGHING MATTER

Reporters said President Truman laughed when asked about the Communist spy investigations. He added there was really nothing to investigate, for it was all old stuff and the process now is slandering a lot of people. He remarked that nothing could be proven on the Reds and fellow-travelers. There are none, anyway—to hear the Reds and fellow-travelers tell it.

This is no laughing matter the President brought out while two committees were working and Congress was walloping him and itself all over the lot in what is half-derisively called a special session. To a great many people it is a very serious matter. To hear the President of the United States try to laugh it off is painful and disgusting. The national convention of Communists is going into session and the secretary says there are 200,000 actual members. He could be lying either way. Lying is standard Communist practice; a chap is never a Communist when accused of anything. For that well-known reason the President's general defense of the Reds is half tragic, half ludicrous. It just simply can't be that the investigators have all been fooled and that the FBI doesn't know anything or that all these ex-Communists who are naming names and giving dates are simply seeing things, or imagining something. Why believe only the active Communists?

Meanwhile the revelations keep on coming. We find now that heavy water, an ingredient of atom bombs, was shipped out surreptitiously to Russia during the war. We find that Hollywood has been one of the heaviest contributors to the cause, whatever it is. Lots of maddening revelations have already come out with regard to governmental affairs. Back of that is the constant Communist fomenting of strikes, aimed to weaken this country for peace or war.

We concede that the little man in the White House is entitled to some diversion. He hasn't had anything to laugh about for several months. Affairs have not been going his way; they have been going the other way with unanimity and dispatch. If he can extract amusement out of the Red spy business, probably we should agree to his theory and let him at least smile a few times. There isn't anything else for him to smile about.

Housewives Are Angry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AIME J. FORAND

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, the housewives of this country are angry today. They are angry at the Republicans, who are in complete control of the Congress. They are particularly angry at the Republican leaders.

They have a right to be angry. As the budget officer of their respective households, they are finding it more difficult each succeeding day to find the number of dollars necessary to buy the necessities of life for their families, and they expect Congress to remedy that situation.

Yet here Congress has been in special session for 2 weeks, and all it has done to curb inflation is to talk about it. True, Congress has passed a bill labeled "A bill to aid in protecting the Nation's economy against inflationary pressures," but you know, Mr. Speaker, and I know, that this bill will not curb inflation, it will not bring prices down.

This new bill is on par with the so-called housing bill which was passed just before we adjourned last June. That bill, instead of being labeled a housing bill, should have been labeled "A bill to bail out the bankers," because all it did was to permit the banks to transfer a part of their GI mortgages to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and thus obtain more money with which to make more GI loans. That did not produce houses any more than this so-called inflation control bill will do to bring down prices.

The housewives want and expect Congress to pass legislation that would bring down the cost of living. But from this Congress they get only a lot of charges that President Truman called us back in session merely for political reasons.

Continuing high prices and the spiraling inflation that now threatens us with a bust in our economy at any moment, is not politics. It is not even good economics.

The shabby performance of this Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress will long be remembered by the housewives as well as by the other voters of this country, when election day arrives.

By their performance, or should I say, by their nonaction, on such important issues as inflation and housing, the Republicans have told the people of this country that they are not interested in their plight. Their only interest is in getting back home to wage a political campaign. They expect the people to accept their propaganda rather than their performance and on that basis reelect them to office.

Should the people of this country make the sad mistake of voting control of our administration and our Congress into the hands of the Republicans I am sure they will long regret their action. The record of the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress is a carbon copy of the Republican record of the 1920's. The voters have not forgotten that that era was climaxed by the worst depression in the history of our country. They will not vote for a repetition of that sad record.

President Truman's Statement on Social Security Cannot Go Unchallenged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, the rash statements of President Truman and other administration spokesmen that 750,000 persons have been removed from the social-security roll cannot go unchallenged. It is a shocking example of how far some people will go in desperation to endeavor to secure political advantages.

At the Democratic National Convention in Philadelphia President Truman said that the Congress could not find time to increase social security but found time to cut 750,000 from the social-security roll.

This statement is completely erroneous and basically untrue.

The Eightieth Congress did find time to increase old-age pensions $5 per month and if the recipient is blind, the increase is $10. Under the new formula and provided the State supplies full matching money, a maximum of $50 per month will become available to recipients of old-age pensions. In the case of the blind the amount is $55.

Now, here is something he did not tell you. The bill that carried the $184,000,000 appropriation to make these increases possible was vetoed by President Truman and the Eightieth Congress passed it overwhelmingly over the President's veto.

After many weeks of hearings and investigation, the House Ways and Means Committee reported out a bill that would extend social-security coverage to an additional 3,500,000 persons. The bill passed the House but did not reach the Senate floor for action.

In regard to taking 750,000 off the social-security roll, here are the facts:

When Congress set up the social-security system and designated the groups to be covered and pay the tax assessment, it was clearly intended that the generally accepted common law definition of "employer" and "employee" would be followed. Some time later the Treasury promulgated a regulation in order to clarify the definition of "employee" and "employer" and their relationship. This definition was accepted and followed until 1947.

The Treasury, Congress, and other interested parties were satisfied with the regulation, all except the Social Security Board. The Board, like most governmental bureaus, continually pressing to extend its power and influence, usurped authority to interpret the law and began paying benefits to persons who were not legally covered and who had not paid the tax into the fund.

When the Treasury endeavored to collect the tax from the employers of the people who were being illegally paid, trouble began and lawsuits resulted.

Immediately following the Supreme Court decision in these cases the Social Security Board and the Treasury, assuming that the decision gave them broad authority, collaborated on another regulation that gave them discretionary power to practically determine who should be covered and who should pay the tax.

Under this new regulation it was estimated that approximately 750,000 persons would become entitled to receive benefits under the law without having paid the regular pay-roll tax.

It was clearly the intent of Congress to exempt from coverage certain persons who were declared to be independent contractors. This would include some commission salesmen, insurance agents, news vendors, and so forth. Consequently, it became necessary for the Congress to clarify its intent and the result was Public Law 642.

Old-age and survivors insurance is essentially an insurance contract. Payments to a beneficiary are predicated upon the amount he and his employer pay into the fund. It is obvious that to make payments available to 750,000 persons, who had not contributed to the fund, not only threatened its security but was grossly unfair to the millions of people that paid into the fund. The same situation would arise if by law an insurance company were forced to pay retirement annuities to 750,000 people who had not paid any premium.

It is perfectly clear that no one legally entitled to coverage under the old-age and survivors insurance, who has been assessed and paid the tax into the fund, has been removed from the roll.

Here we have a fine example of pure New Deal distortion of the news and misinforming the country. This is no time for charlatans, demagogs, or tyrants; the times are precarious and the people demand and deserve the truth.

Republican Sit-Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial from the Pittsburgh Press of August 4, 1948, entitled "Republican Sit-Down."

I have already told the Senate at some length of the unfair treatment accorded 31 Pennsylvania veterans by the Senate in refusing to confirm their nominations as postmasters. I have given the Senate the military records of these 31 deserving individuals; I have called to the attention of the Senate the fact that nearly all of them were either first in their civil-service roster or the topmost veteran on the roster. I have pointed out that these veterans by and large cannot under present laws be passed over or sidetracked and that eventually they must be granted the positions for which they qualified. Yet the Senate under Republican leadership and control has refused to permit their confirmation.

This editorial points to additional appointments made by President Truman which have also not been made final by Senate confirmation. As this editorial points out, the individuals so nominated "won't be confirmed, and they won't be rejected. The Senate won't say they are improper appointments, but it won't approve them, either. It simply won't act."

Mr. President, the political motivations which prompted the Republican leadership of the Senate to accord such callous disregard to fair treatment for these nominees by either confirming or rejecting their nominations, will further besmirch the already malodorous record of the Eightieth Congress.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN SIT-DOWN

Republicans in Congress persist in trying to make their party look as cheap as possible before the November election.

In the Senate, about a hundred appointments made by President Truman, subject to Senate approval, will get the sit-down treatment. This doesn't include several hundred named to postmasterships.

They won't be confirmed, and they won't be rejected. The Senate won't say they are improper appointments, but it won't approve them either. It simply won't act.

The only reason for the sit-down is that President Truman is a Democrat and the Republicans, hungry as they are, hope their man, Governor Dewey, will get to make all these appointments after January 20. And, of course, that the new President will take the recommendations of the Senators.

Hungry Horse Dedication

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on July 10, 1948, a dedication ceremony marking the actual start of the Hungry Horse Dam took place at the dam site. There were a number of excellent speeches made at that time and under permission granted to me, I am inserting in the RECORD at this point the speech of Hon. William Warne, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and also the speech of Hon. Michael Straus, Commissioner of Reclamation. At this ceremony both Secretary Warne and Commissioner Straus were inducted into the Blackfeet Indian Tribe. Mr. Warne was given the title "Medicine Eagle," and Mr. Straus was named "Engineer of the Wilderness, Chief White Beaver."

It was a great celebration marked by the presence of these two distinguished governmental officials and it was also the realization of an ideal long sought by the people of western Montana, because the start of the construction of the Hungry Horse Dam marks the start of the beginning of the real development of that part of our great State.

REMARKS OF WILLIAM E. WARNE, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, AT THE CEREMONY MARKING THE START OF CONSTRUCTION OF THE MAIN STRUCTURE OF THE HUNGRY HORSE DAM, KALISPELL, MONT., SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1948

On February 1, 1944, now more than 4 years ago, I tucked a bundle of papers under my arm and went from my office in the Interior Building to Capitol Hill. The occasion was the hearing on Congressman MIKE MANSFIELD's bill, H. R. 3570, then pending before the Irrigation Committee of the House of Representatives. That event was a milestone, as the start of construction here today is a mile-stone in the life of one of the great dams of the earth, Hungry Horse Dam.

Our coming together here today, the chain reaction of activity that will be touched off by the initial blast in the canyon, and the dam itself—all started with the Hungry Horse Dam bill, H. R. 3570, which recognized the need in the war that was then in progress and in the peace that has now been restored for power, irrigation, flood control and regulation of all of the rivers of the mighty Columbia system for the use and the benefit of our whole people.

My task before the Irrigation Committee was to explain the plan by which this dam would hold in this reservoir the floods of the South Fork of the Flathead, release these waters through the turbines of this powerhouse at the toe of the dam, and fill in downstream the low troughs of the unregulated stream flow so that the turbines at Grand Coulee, at Bonneville, and at other dams could be more nearly fully employed. The plan includes the eventual irrigation through canals tapping the river below the dam of tens of thousands of acres above Flathead Lake. It contemplates intricate operational procedures so that what happens here will mesh cleanly with requirements clear to the ocean.

Visualize a chart of the flow of this river. Here the flow line rises to a high peak of flood in the late spring and then falls away to a valley of drought in the early winter. Imagine, if you can, the charts of similar important tributaries of the Columbia. They will not be identical, but they will be similar, with flood peaks at about the same time of year and troughs of low flows in the same season.

The problem of control and of regulation for use is thus complicated. Each dam as it is built must take a carefully planned place in the flood-control program for the whole basin. Each must have storage capacities and turbine installations for precision releases to obtain maximum production of hydroelectric power throughout the length of the entire river. Each dam must do its appropriate part in the watering of the sagebrush lands that, through irrigation, will sustain the growing population. Each must serve, as it can, recreation, fish and wildlife conservation, and other useful purposes.

Each and every dam of the scores that are required to control and develop the Columbia River must be made to serve all useful purposes and be coordinated in operation with all other dams of the basin system to provide the wide-flung benefits that can come in no other way.

I have studied the development of the water projects of the West. Their history shows perfectly clearly the evolution of basin developments from the rude, crude, single-purpose projects of 50 years ago. Just as the multiple-purpose dam that combined power, irrigation, and flood control exceeded in value and usefulness to the community, the antiquated single-purpose dam designed for irrigation alone, so does the integrated development of a basin multiply the benefits and usefulness of individual multiple-purpose dams.

The one resource that distinguishes the Pacific Northwest among all our western regions is the wonderful Columbia River. It provides at once both the opportunity and the challenge to this region. The Northwest will prosper, grow, and gain economic and political strength in direct ratio to the development of its great river. The greatest power stream on the continent is here to use. Here to use is the greatest source of irrigation water available in the western half of the United States. A fine channel extends up the river far inland to provide transportation. The endowment is here in the river. The manner in which it is used will, in the end, determine whether the Pacific Northwest fulfills its promise and reaches its maximum growth and productivity.

This places a heavy responsibility upon those of us who live in the time when the pattern is being applied and the cloth cut. It means we must decide today about matters that will influence irrevocably the welfare of our children and of the Nation in distant years to come.

I am proud to be able to assure you that the Hungry Horse Dam will fit well into the ultimate plan for the Columbia. You may proceed with its construction knowing that when it is done it will serve with power and irrigation water the communities in Montana near at hand, mix its power through the Bonneville system with that of other dams to serve best this and other sections of the Pacific Northwest, release its water in accordance with a controlling schedule for the maximum good in reduction of flood peaks and the generation of firm power throughout the whole Columbia River Basin.

The plan, already on paper and bound in a book entitled "The Columbia River" calls for 142 dams to store 27,000,000 acre-feet of flood waters to irrigate 5,300,000 more acres of land than is now irrigated or included in projects that are under construction, and generate 10,500,000 kilowatts of additional power. Hungry Horse Dam is the next step beyond Grand Coulee in the progress of the region. Its storage of 3,500,000 acre-feet, irrigation of more than 80,000 acres and generation of 300,000 kilowatts will represent a healthy start on the bigger plan.

The plan is something more than a blueprint for reservoirs, ditches, and powerhouses, important as they are. It is also a design for operational unity, which is as important. Hungry Horse Dam will contribute through planned releases of water from its reservoir additional flows that are needed at Grand Coulee, Bonneville, and other dams downstream to firm up the power outputs there. This power, of which there will be 700,000 kilowatts, is just as real, as valuable, and as useful as though it were generated here. In addition, a million acre-feet of water stored here when some future disaster threatens to sweep the valleys below will reduce flood heights all the way down to the Pacific, and, when more dams are available, such peak flood storage promises to pacify the river and hold it within bounds. These results flow from unified operation of the system of dams.

The plan, however, contains something more than integrated construction of scores of dams, canals, powerhouses, levee systems, navigation locks, recreation areas, etc., and the coordinated operation of all of these elements.

The comprehensive report on development of the resources of the great Columbia River Basin as sponsored by the Department of the Interior contains a proposal for financial unity in addition. Physical unity by placing dams to complement and support each other and thereby bring the greatest benefits to the widest area no longer needs justification. Physical unity has justified itself already in the valleys of Tennessee, Colorado, and the Columbia.

Financial unity to repay the costs of construction is the next logical step. It is a simple bookkeeping matter. The comprehensive report outlines a feasible method. The costs of all of the units of the master plan will be allocated among all of the benefits, and the repayment that is required to be made will be divided on a basin-wide basis among the beneficiaries. Thus, for example, irrigation development throughout the Columbia River Basin will be assisted in repayment by a portion of the power revenues. It has long been recognized that the irrigators cannot pay in full for the dams and irrigation works that are required. The multiple uses of a great dam can enable the combined purposes that it serves to aid each other and through such combination to pay the whole cost, meanwhile aiding the whole economy. The comprehensive plan extends the multiple-purpose dam repayment method to the whole basin. It is of inestimable value to the remote areas where the streams are not so large but where undeveloped lands remain. It serves well the downstream areas that are presently more favored, because the comprehensive plan makes possible the construction of the flood control, power, and irrigation works upstream that are required to complete the whole. The Missouri Basin development now under way is of this type in that it employs a basin-wide unity of financing.

That is the plan for mutual support of the projects and basin unity—coordinated construction, integrated operation, and unified financing.

Power and irrigation have been partners for many years. It is in step with the destiny of the Northwest to recognize that partnership on a basin-wide instead of a project-wide basis. We can see the value of such partnership on many projects in this basin now. We will see it in the Columbia Basin project under construction to bring waters from Franklin D. Roosevelt Lake behind Grand Coulee Dam to a million acres in central Washington. The power at Grand Coulee went to work during the war to help arm the democracies. It is working today during peacetime to enrich the Northwest. That power will help establish some 15,000 new farm opportunities on the project. It will pump irrigation water to the farms, and it will help by paying 75 cents of each dollar of the cost of the irrigation development. The project is moving rapidly toward the goal of bringing 252,000 acres into irrigated farming by 1952. It is a big project, in keeping with the bigness of the country and bigness of the opportunity here. For those of us who have grown up with it, the project is a constant source of pride. I know it will serve the country well.

Much has been accomplished. Much is being accomplished while we work out the over-all plan. Concrete is already in the ground, power is on the lines, and water is going onto the land in all parts of the Northwest. In May the first water on the Columbia Basin project went to farms on the Pasco unit. Since last October, three of the world-record 108,000-kilowatt generators have been put on the line at Grand Coulee. Three more will go on the line in 1949. That will make 12. Three more are ordered, and the last three are expected to be soon. They will be useful only when Hungry Horse Dam is completed to regulate the flow for their production of power.

On that winter day in 1944 that I mentioned at the outset, the day of the hearing on H. R. 3570, I listened to the description by Congressman MANSFIELD of the Hungry Horse project, his statement of the need for the power, irrigation water, and flood control that the project would provide, and his explanation of how the project would save Flathead Lake. I listened also to the presentations of others, including Senator MURRAY, former Senator Wheeler, and to those of the indefatigable pair, Al Winkler and Don Treloar.

By the time my turn came to take the witness chair, I could see rising before me there in the committee room, as in my mind's eye I can see here in this canyon again today, a gigantic dam, strong, clean, and graceful in every useful line of its practical design. I thought then, as I think now, that through these magnificent works we are implanting the hallmark of our civilization. These laboring monuments, I think, will contribute something more to the satisfaction of the coming ages than have even the great works of those who have gone before us. The functional beauty of the architecture of our dam holds the power to thrill observers to their very souls. In this they resemble the Egyptian pyramids, the Grecian temples, and the Roman Colosseum. But our dams also humbly serve the people of our land and make their lives more productive, and it is thus that they excel. They have both beauty and usefulness. They will endure and mark our day.

I have never been able to think of a more nearly essential expression of our democracy than these great concrete statements of its basic concept. They are not materialistic, because they work. They represent, on the other hand, our national aspiration and continuous striving for the more abundant life. Like our Government, these dams are of, by, and for the people.

Here in this valley of the South Fork, dirt is flying today at the site of Hungry Horse Dam. The time is near when this dam, too, will have turbines and powerful generators working for you and all of us. And we will see the time when this reservoir, by storing the flood waters in Montana, will make Grand Coulee, Rock Island, Kerr, and Bonneville, and other plants downstream such as Foster Creek and McNary, which will materialize in the future, more productive of power, and when this dam will make further irrigation development possible.

The Northwest is moving forward. The future is yours. Working together throughout the Columbia River Basin with a single plan in mind, we can make that future bright. For this is the land of destiny.

HUNGRY HORSE: A DREAM COME TRUE

(Remarks of United States Commissioner of Reclamation Michael W. Straus at the ceremony marking the start of construction on the main structure of the Hungry Horse Dam, Kalispell, Mont., Saturday, July 10, 1948)

It's good to be here this great day. We have reached the turning point in the road that reclamation and the people of the Flathead Valley have traveled together in partnership for about a third of a century.

Reclamation's congratulations to the men of vision, courage, and action—men of Montana who wouldn't be denied, whose eyes lifted from the dust to the stars, who knew what they wanted, and who wanted something worth while—and got it. Here today, Hungry Horse Dam is a dream come true.

The Bureau of Reclamation, your service agency and partner in behalf of Uncle Sam, knows something about dams. Hungry Horse is one of the great water control projects not only of the United States but of the world. Finished it will be the fifth highest and fourth largest concrete dam ever built by man—exceeded only by Grand Coulee itself down the Columbia River, Boulder south on the Colorado River, and Shasta in California.

Reclamation, as your working partner, also knows something of the long and rough road over which you have toiled—as any community must toil—to get to where you are today. So far it has been hard going and uphill. But this is the turning point—from here in you are sure of success. It was way back—a third of a century or about two wars ago—that the United States Geological Survey of the Department of the Interior was talking about the possibilities of the Hungry Horse damsite. Twenty years ago—that was back in the seventieth Congress—they even had a bill, that didn't pass, for Hungry Horse Dam. When I married a young Montana schoolmarm who taught in the Hillside School, Mission County, over the ridge near St. Ignatius—and she is still Mrs. Straus and our children now are in college—folks around here were saying that Hungry Horse Dam should be built—and soon. Four years ago—about this time of year—I remember coming out to Kalispell with a group of Senators and eating half a bushel of Flathead cherries and also testifying for 2 days at a hearing on Hungry Horse.

Well, today, you and Montana and the whole Columbia River Basin are sure of Hungry Horse Dam. Dirt flew with the first blast as we began building the main structure this morning. Nothing can stop it now. Reclamation likes it and let me, for Uncle Sam, salute you, our partners in this great venture. I would like to name them all but I will mention only a few, such as the men of Montana: Gov. Sam Ford, ex-Senator B. K. Wheeler, Senator Jim Murray, Congressman Mike Mansfield, State Engineer Fred Buck, Don Treloar, Al Winkler.

And on the other side of the partnership, let us recognize the men of Reclamation: Clyde Spencer, construction engineer; Bob Newell, regional director; Leslie McClellan, Chief Engineer of Reclamation; Bill Warne, once Assistant Commissioner of Reclamation and now Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

And the builders in the contracting field: General Construction Co., the Shea Co., Morrison-Knudsen Co., and such men as Henry Morrison, who have dotted the West and the world with great dams.

Now, I am going to leave to Assistant Secretary Warne, because he's an expert, the job here today of laying out the relationship of Hungry Horse to the comprehensive Columbia Basin development. He did that task so well 4 years ago before the Congress that they authorized the project, and he will do it better today. Also, I don't want to waste your time and my breath talking about the need or the blessings of multiple-purpose flood-control, irrigation, and power dams here in the Pacific Northwest. You are outstanding pioneers in that field. Selling hydro power and irrigation water in this country is too easy. It would be about as hard as persuading a starving man to take a sandwich. I want to talk about Hungry Horse and the West's reclamation program.

Hungry Horse is a big one—a big one in anybody's league. Congress authorized it for "not less than a million acre-feet." But you and I decided to build it to hold a reservoir of 3,500,000 acre-feet—a major, new, deep, 40-mile-long lake that man is adding to Montana's geography. We'll need every acre-foot of that storage.

Now, we know you have heard some sincere citizens lacking in vision say that's too big. There will arise somewhere in this land prophets of doom and corporals of disaster who say it is a waste or that nobody needs it, or that it will be a white elephant. Listen to them courteously, but let me tell you Reclamation's experience. Every time we build a dam—and we have built hundreds of them—we have heard the same calamity howl. We heard that Boulder was too big, so it was built. We heard that Grand Coulee was beyond all reason, so it was built. And we heard the same thing about Shasta, so we built it bigger than originally planned. Now, today, we find that we didn't build them big enough. Every one we build is too small to do the job that the growing West's economy demands. And you are having to build more of them.

So we are going to start by building Hungry Horse full size—a giant concrete arch plug in the canyon of Flathead, 520 feet high and 2,100 feet long. It will take the best part of 5 years to move the approximate 3,000,000 cubic yards of material into this plug and to get all the generators, turbines, and fixings into place. It is going to be a long, hard job, and you and Reclamation will think it's a good job. Then after we get done, say, about 20 years from now, our grandchildren who will require and who will get more water and power will say: "Grandpappy, you old fud-duddy, why didn't you build Hungry Horse big enough back in 1948 and save us from having to go out and build bigger and better ones around here now?"

It takes a lot of hay to fatten up Hungry Horse, as I found out a couple of months ago when Reclamation awarded the main contract for the dam and power plant with a face value of $43,431,000. That happened to be the second largest contract in Reclamation's history—second only to Boulder Dam. But that's only one of the hundreds of contracts, for this is a project which, while it happens to stand in the Flathead Valley, is truly national in scope. In Schenectady, N. Y., craftsmen of General Electric, which has a $4,414,000 contract to build four giant 75,000-kilowatt Hungry Horse generators, are at that task. These generators are to roll out across the country to this site in pieces in a flock of freight trains. In Milwaukee, Wis., Allis-Chalmers' workmen with a $2,150,000 contract, are fashioning four hydroturbines through which Flathead water will spin those generators. In Colorado, Washington, and elsewhere, cement mills are kilning 2,500,000 barrels of cement to plug this gulch. Before this national job is finished, the people in every State in the Union will have worked and made a contribution to this dam.

But even if it takes a lot of hay to fatten up Hungry Horse, that hay will be forthcoming. Uncle Sam has already tossed about $20,000,000, in the form of appropriations, into the manger. With that stake in this partnership, he won't quit. Congresses still to be elected, the Eighty-first and the Eighty-second, will have the task of financing this job to completion. Uncle Sam will get his money all back—and more—in the form of new productive wealth and new strength—irrigated land, flood-free communities, and particularly from hot kilowatts created through this work. As the waters of the Flathead are released from this reservoir, they will not only whirl Hungry Horse generators but also those in and to be placed in every plant down the Columbia River from here to the Pacific Ocean, including Bonneville, Grand Coulee, Rock Island, Kerr, and McNary. For my money, as a taxpaying citizen of this Nation, I don't know of a better investment that Uncle Sam makes than in this type of wealth-creating permanent assets—they're better than dollars in the bank.

Now, lean back far enough from Hungry Horse to take a look around at the whole reclamation program over 17 Western States, of which this is but one item. The West has been in a reclamation partnership with its Federal Government for almost half a century now. This is nothing new or untried—although a lot of good people back East don't seem to have heard of it yet. During that half century, your Government, through reclamation, has invested just a little over a billion dollars in Federal reclamation that with new wealth creates new communities and produces food that a hungry world needs and power that sparks new industry. In the single year of 1947, the last food year for which we have full reports, the lands watered by Federal irrigation produced crops that had a value of $555,000,000—half of the half-century's investment back in crop values in a single year, and that's a rate of return that makes even a tax collector grin. Beyond that, this investment created new communities and new industries by providing new electrical power, such as the new light metals industry here in the Pacific Northwest. Kilowatts do not only flow from the Government but they also bring strength back to the Nation. This year reclamation power revenues alone are going to amount to $25,000,000 and they are going to keep right on flowing into the Treasury in increasing volume for years into the future. It pays to feed up Hungry Horse until it's a work animal that earns its keep.

Less than a month ago, the Eightieth Congress adjourned after having acted on the West's annual reclamation program, including some funds for Hungry Horse. They appropriated $245,566,139 for reclamation in 17 States and made some minor inroads against reclamation public power and antimonopoly land laws, but these inroads were infinitesimal compared to the attack. There are quite a few things that you could say about this $245,000,000 appropriation for western land and water development. One might be that it was less than the President asked. Another might be that it was by far the largest annual reclamation appropriation in history. But probably the most sensible thing to do would be to stop playing this historical mathematical numbers game, take our eyes off the rear-vision mirror and look ahead down the route we must go to build the West that this Nation must have with water and its power. We won't do that measuring with the yardstick of yesteryear. To achieve the West's destiny and satisfy the Nation's demands for food, power, and water in the economy of today and tomorrow, we must measure our movement and our investment to meet the requirements of today and tomorrow.

This reclamation that you of the West have developed is one of the firmest contributions to our national strength and economy. And you have done it under the reclamation law that the West developed and the Congress passed. There are certain firm foundations in that reclamation law having to do with the greatest good for the greatest number and adverse to monopoly—monopoly of two fundamental resources of the people: water and power. Past Congresses wrote into the reclamation law that reclamation should generate public power, transmit and distribute it widely with preference to public bodies, which requires transmission lines, and that reclamation should provide water to individual family sized irrigation farms rather than serve vast corporate agriculture. I happen to be a great admirer of those laws written by the Congress. But some people don't like those laws. Some of reclamation's opponents are from far away from the West and are plainly ignorant about irrigation. They've never seen it. Others are simply selfish and are groups or corporations who want to control or monopolize the benefits. Sometimes they are corporations who don't want the Government to have certain transmission lines to distribute low-cost power. These would interpose their own private utility lines between the people and the people's dam. There has been some of that in Montana.

You have probably heard of some of the ruckus in the Eightieth Congress over attempts to end those basic reclamation principles. It was quite a scrap. But I am happy now to report to you that even if a few officials such as myself got pushed around a bit, the Eightieth Congress recessed without scuttling any of those fundamental antimonopoly provisions of the reclamation law.

That is important to you for those laws are cornerstones on which this reclamation philosophy rests and on which these great developments have gone forward. Without this public power policy and antimonopoly rule for irrigated land and water, reclamation western development, as you know it and have it, cannot prosper. Certainly, without the public power features in existing law, there would be no jubilee here today—there would be no Hungry Horse Dam. There could not be because here your Government is definitely entering the low-cost power production field. And it plans to make not only this Hungry Horse power but all the power from here to the Pacific Ocean available to its citizens over transmission lines which they own. That was the justification on which Uncle Sam undertook this task. Pull out the foundation from under it and the plan collapses—there would be no justification for going on with this task.

There are two great days in any reclamation work. One is the day, such as we have reached this day, when after years of strivings the dirt starts flying on the main works. But that's only half the course. The next great day is when there is water in the ditch or hot kilowatts start flowing over the lines. Reclamation is not building Hungry Horse as an exercise. We will not have succeeded until our end purpose of achieving the power and water benefits is attained. We plan that second great day for Hungry Horse when the first generator is put in in June 1952 with all of them on the line by June 1953. You and Reclamation have to protect and guard this work until it accomplishes its mission and then you have to protect and guard it from then on, so that it truly brings you the benefits for which it was conceived. Stand alert and firm to its defense and do not let it be injured. Serve it well and it will serve you well.

No one has yet found the life span of such a dam as Hungry Horse. If we protect it, it will be serving this community after everybody in Montana today is dead and gone—a hundred, five hundred, or a thousand years—as long as water runs downhill—perhaps forever.

Illuminating Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under date of July 27, 1948, one of my constituents, a prominent lawyer of the Democratic faith, addressed me, furnishing me with many illuminating facts, in the following language:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I notice from today's paper that the President is preparing to make some kind of an attack on the cost of living. The actual victims of the inflation are not the ones who are doing all of the complaining; the miners, factory workers, and many others who are protected by a union, but the victims of inflation have been the white-collar class—lawyers, teachers, pensioners—and even Congressmen.

I just had called to my attention today an interesting table which has been compiled by the National City Bank of New York from Government statistics. It will be noted from this table that the coal miners, the factory workers, etc., are all better off, even though the price of rents, commodities, etc., have doubled, because their salaries and wages have more than doubled. In other words, the coal miner who drew a certain salary in 1930 and could only buy a small quantity of meat finds that he can buy twice as much meat with the salary he is receiving today although it does cost twice as much as it did in 1930, as his salary has gone up almost four times.

The table is corrected for increases in prices and is based entirely on the living standard. I quote the table as follows:

Extent to which a person is better or worse off than in 1930

[100=1930 living standard]

	1930	1935	1947
Coal miner	100	104	191
Textile worker	100	103	139
Automobile worker	100	115	132
Printer	100	102	105
Railway worker	100	116	122
Railway executive	100	112	78
Teacher	100	107	109
Congressman	100	117	74
Pensioner	100	120	65
Bondholder	100	88	38
Small stockholder	100	64	79
Well-to-do stockholder	100	63	58
Wealthy stockholder	100	52	31

If Congress is to do something toward fixing price levels at the behest of President Truman, let us give some attention and consideration to the unorganized millions and give a lesser amount of attention and consideration to the organized vociferant minority. How about raising lawyers' and other white-collar workers' compensation to put them on the par with the coal miners and automobile workers? I have not heard of anyone advocating the guaranty to a lawyer of a decent living wage. I do not know what a decent living wage would be for a lawyer, but most of them that I have talked with find that their fees may have increased but not at all proportionate to the increase of organized workers in other lines, nor enough to offset the increase in the cost of living.

The above table certainly gives one pause for thought when you consider that taxes leave large stockholders and bondholders with only about one-third of the buying power that they had in 1931. While dividend rates may have increased they have not kept pace with the cost-of-living rise. The dollar yield to bondholders has actually decreased. Based on insurance company bondholder yields, it would take $80,000 today to provide the income to buy that which the bondholder of 10 years past could have bought for $30,000.

Out of a total of about 60,000,000 workers in the United States I am told that there are less than 14,000,000 workers organized into some kind of unions. The table indicates that these 14,000,000 organized workers have been getting wage increases and profiting at the expense of the unorganized majority of 46,000,000 workers.

Let us not overlook the 46,000,000 in considering the legislation which may be proposed by the President.

The Public Is Concerned

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, and include a letter dated August 5, 1948, which I have received from Bob Brooks, of radio station WSCR in Scranton, Pa. Mr. Brooks reports that contrary to the impression of some Members of the Congress, the people of Scranton, Pa., and vicinity, are decidedly interested in proposals for curbing inflation and for providing decent low-cost housing for our people.

Mr. Brooks reports that Station WSCR devoted several Inquiring Microphone programs—interviews with voters selected from the stream of pedestrians along a sidewalk in a typical American city—to attempt to determine just how interested the people were in the work of this special session of Congress. The consensus, he points out, is that the present emergency is of sufficient gravity to warrant this special session and that the special session should enact real and effective inflation control and housing legislation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WSCR,
Scranton, Pa., August 5, 1948.

Senator MYERS (Pennsylvania),
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MYERS: Last week end Associated Press reported the statement of Senator HOMER CAPEHART, of Indiana, member of the Banking Committee, that the "public just doesn't seem interested in this problem" of inflation. Since this station conducts a three-times-a-week sidewalk interview program, Inquiring Microphone, dealing with public opinion and politics, we know that the public in Scranton and Lackawanna Valley are interested in combating inflation. What is more, the general consensus here is that the present emergency is of sufficient gravity to warrant a special session, and that in special session Congress should enact immediate legislation to curb inflation and enable production of more low-cost housing, this housing to be subsidized by the Federal Government if necessary.

With Senator CAPEHART'S statement in mind we conducted two Inquiring Microphone programs so that we could send the Senator by transcription the candid testimony of the man in the street, Mr. John Q. Public. Our line of questioning was so designed as to obtain a definite "yes" or "no" decision from each interviewee. To a man they agreed that the public is—contrary to Senator CAPEHART'S expressed belief—deeply concerned with the inflation problem. We have sent the transcriptions to Senator CAPEHART.

We are dispatching letters to our local Representatives in Congress and to the Democratic National Committee explaining the situation as we have to you.

Trusting the Inquiring Microphone transcriptions serve the purpose for which they were intended, we remain,

Yours truly,

BOB BROOKS,
Radio Station WSCR,
Scranton, Pa.

Extension of Rural Electrification in Nebraska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 29), 1948

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and include the following article prepared by me, dealing with the extension of rural electrification in Nebraska.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be included in the RECORD, as follows:

THE END OF THE COAL OIL LAMP

(By Hon. HUGH BUTLER, Nebraska)

Historians tell us that great wars often mark the turning point in the lives of nations and their people. I have no reason to doubt that that is true. Certainly the war we just finished has brought tremendous changes to America and particularly, to our agricultural life. A tremendous volume of exports, inflated prices, and a heavy tax burden are some of the wartime changes which come to mind. Yet I am now beginning to suspect that this postwar period may bring an even greater change in the manner of living and in the farming methods of the individual farm. To a tremendous extent, that change is being caused by one single factor—electricity. For our State of Nebraska, at least, this postwar period is likely to go down in history as the period during which cheap, plentiful electric current was brought to the farm.

Perhaps not all farmers attach the same importance to electricity that I do. I can remember all too well the long hours of hard work that my own mother had to put in during the years when I was a boy. At that time we had to depend on coal-oil lamps for light after the sun went down. Of course, we youngsters didn't mind, because we had never learned to expect anything else, but it made for drudgery for our parents. As I grew up, I came to hope that I might be able to secure electric service for my mother before she passed away, but that never proved possible.

That is one reason why I feel strongly about the importance of extending electricity to every farm, and I believe thousands and millions of other farmers and their families feel the same way about it. In fact, last year a well known farm magazine made a survey of its readers to determine what they believed to be the world's greatest invention. Electricity led the list by far. This is not surprising to me, particularly when it is realized that this survey was conducted largely among farmers. Electricity is far more important on the farm than to the average city family because it is essential for production, as well as for a comfortable life. It is certainly ironical that until recently electricity for a farmer was almost unknown, while in the towns and cities electricity had been brought to perhaps 90 percent of the homes.

In fact, a considerable part of the present controversy about housing is due to the fact that city or town housing is not considered "adequate" or "livable" unless it is provided with modern facilities such as electricity. City dwellers have come to demand electric services and similar conveniences as a matter of right. If housing with all modern conveniences is not easily obtainable, we in Congress immediately hear a demand for legislation or Federal subsidies of some sort to help city families obtain such housing. And I must confess I don't blame city families for expecting to share in the fruits of progress. It is natural enough for them to want modern improvements and labor-saving devices. I am merely making the point that farmers have the same right to electric service, and they need it worse. Furthermore, they are willing to pay for it themselves, without any Federal subsidy. Construction under the REA program is provided for by Federal loans—not gifts, and the repayment record of rural co-ops and power districts on these loans is better than excellent.

Even so, it is only recently that electrification made any real progress on the farm. As late as 1934, only 11 percent of the farms over the whole Nation had central station electric service. Passage of the Rural Electrification Act in 1935, providing for Government loans to groups of farmers for construction of their own distribution systems, was a tremendous step forward. With this program we had for the first time a really practical way of extending rural electrification rapidly. Even so, only 35 percent of our farms in this country had obtained central station electric service by 1941—when we entered the war—and only about 10 percent more obtained it during the war.

In this respect, strangely enough, the American farmer lagged far behind the farmer of western Europe. I recently secured some figures showing the progress of rural electrification in a number of European countries and was amazed to learn that even before the war a number of those countries had advanced far beyond us. For example, in Holland 93 percent of the rural areas were electrified, and in Belgium only 35 of the farm villages were without electrical facilities. In countries like Britain, France, Italy, Germany, and Denmark, the percentage was very nearly as high. In many other countries, including some that we usually think of as comparatively undeveloped, the percentage was far higher than here.

Of course, there was a reason why America failed to lead the way in rural electrification as we have lead the way in automobiles and other things. Our farms are generally larger and farther apart, and the cost of bringing current is proportionately far greater. In some European countries the farmers live in villages and go out to their fields each day. Naturally, the cost of bringing current to the home in the village is moderate. Even so, there was no reason why we should be satisfied with these excuses. American technical efficiency should be able to overcome obstacles such as these. Certainly American farmers had a right to expect that the best brains of American engineers would be put to work on the problem.

If we were far behind other countries before the war, it certainly seems that we will not stay behind them very much longer. Since the end of the war, rural-electrification construction has been on the biggest boom in its history. The progress just during these past 3 years has been simply amazing, in spite of the many obstacles that have been encountered. Since the middle of 1945, up until mid-1948, over 950,000 additional farms have been actually connected with current through REA. Loans have already been approved, and construction programs are under way or in preparation for another 585,000 farms. Loan applications pending or in process as of June 1948 called for $263,000,000, which should provide service for another 250,000 to 300,000 rural consumers. In fact, it seems that the job of electrifying all our farms has taken on the aspect of a crusade among farm people. Now that the idea has taken firm hold and the means are available, farmers everywhere seem determined to get electricity just as rapidly as possible. Their attitude seems to be, "What are we waiting for? We have waited long enough."

This progress during the past 3 years has not been made without overcoming great obstacles. First of all, the job is being undertaken at a time when we are still short of everything, particularly heavy equipment. Poles, transformers, and electrical conductors in turn have been bottlenecks to construction. Secondly, we have run into power shortages in many areas, and nowhere is this more true than in Nebraska. Unfortunately, it is a fact that additional generating capacity cannot be secured quickly or easily. Thirdly, there is always the problem of securing determined, united action by a majority of the farmers in a certain neighborhood. Without united support by a whole community, it is very difficult to finance a rural line. That was quite an obstacle in the early days of the program, although lately, it hasn't given us any trouble. Next, there has been some difficulty with questions of policy, such as area coverage and REA-financed generator systems. Most of these controversies are now pretty well ironed out also.

Finally, there is always the question of funds, which means congressional appropriations. That is a question that is likely to generate more heat than light, and certainly there has been enough controversy about it during the past 3 years.

When the Congress early in 1947 made a reduction in REA appropriations, from $250,000,000 to $225,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 1948, partisan charges and countercharges flew back and forth pretty rapidly. Then last spring the Congress went the President one better by appropriating $175,000,000 to finish out the fiscal year 1948, and a whopping $400,000,000 for the fiscal year to end next June. This was $100,000,000 more than the President had requested, and Members of the Eightieth Congress may have some justification for pointing with pride to the way they showed their support for rural electrification. The total appropriated during these 2 years amounted to $800,000,000, far and away more than had ever been appropriated by any other Congress during any previous 2-year period. Nevertheless, candor compels me to confess that Republicans and Democrats alike supported these record appropriations, and the credit must be divided among members of both parties.

In retrospect, this controversy does not seem too important for the reason that money is not now and has not been recently the real bottleneck. The real bottleneck is materials. I shall touch on this problem of materials in a moment, but before I do, I want to emphasize the importance of these figures on appropriations by bringing them down to earth and showing how they affect us in Nebraska.

As of last May 31, rural public-power districts or cooperatives in Nebraska were serving just under 40,000 consumers—39,932 to be exact. On that date, something like 46 percent of all the farms in the State had received central station electrical service. As of the same date, loans had been approved by REA to supply service to 72,553 consumers. That means loans to provide services for over 32,500 additional consumers had been approved, but construction had not yet been completed. About $21,000,000 in approved loans was waiting in Washington to be called for by rural districts and cooperatives as the progress of their construction required the use of these funds.

That is not the whole story, since funds to be available during the fiscal year just starting are even greater than those made available for last year. In addition to the $400,000,000 appropriated for this year, about $100,000,000 carried over from last year is available for lending. This money is not yet divided by States, but it seems safe to assume that Nebraska districts and cooperatives will be permitted to borrow at least $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 of it if they can use it. I feel sure they can use it effectively, since already $10,418,000 in loan applications were on hand or in process on the 1st of July. This year's funds will probably serve to pay for construction of lines to at least 15,000 or 20,000 additional rural consumers.

In other words, funds have already been appropriated to provide service for something like 50,000 additional rural consumers. When the construction contemplated by these funds is completed the number of consumers reached will be more than double the figure it has reached today. In fact, funds already appropriated will pretty nearly complete the job of supplying electricity to every Nebraska farm that wants it, where physically practicable at all. I have no real fear of trouble in getting any additional appropriations that may be needed.

It is obvious that funds are no longer a problem and that the real difficulty is in securing construction equipment and a power supply. The last fiscal year loans were approved to serve 12,398 additional consumers, but only about 7,000 new consumers were connected up. This figure of 7,000 is an all-time record for Nebraska, but obviously it does not come anywhere near to meeting the demand. Shortages of several types continue to plague us. The most serious one at present appears to be aluminum conductors. Right now there are over 16,000 miles of poles in place around the country for which conductors have not yet been secured. On checking into this problem recently I was told that an order placed today for aluminum conductors would not be filled before 1950 or 1951 at the earliest. That is assuming that aluminum production does not suffer from unusual delays such as strikes. Recently I have been trying to develop some plan for securing additional supplies of aluminum from some source, possibly from occupied Japan. I do not know yet how successful this plan will be.

Even if we could secure additional aluminum in large quantities, we would probably immediately run into a shortage of transformers. If aluminum, transformers, and all other items of equipment necessary for construction were available, we would still have a very serious problem of a power shortage in Nebraska. It is hard to see how that shortage can be cracked until additional large blocks of power are available from the Army Dam at Fort Randall, South Dakota, and the Reclamation Bureau's Colorado-Big Thompson hook-up. That power won't be available for some time yet, and construction of the power facilities at the dams and of the transmission lines is likewise delayed by the shortage of aluminum and other materials.

So our problems are not solved yet. As long as all available plants for the manufacture of electrical equipment are already producing at full capacity, there is not much use of talking about stepping up production of such equipment. One means of stepping up supplies of these short items for our program would be to cut down on the heavy flow of electrical equipment overseas. Our exports of these supplies have been extremely heavy during recent years, as is shown by the following table of shipments abroad, supplied by the Department of Commerce:

	1946	1947	January–April 1948
Generators and sets	$59,525,000	$69,377,000	$21,156,000
Transmitting and distributing apparatus	15,142,000	32,063,000	13,206,000
Transforming and converting apparatus	9,828,000	20,810,000	7,765,000
Electric refrigerators	11,640,000	39,629,000	15,700,000
Household appliances	12,180,000	35,154,000	11,357,000
Radio apparatus	54,467,000	113,724,000	30,648,000
Telephone apparatus	10,632,000	25,559,000	10,815,000
Copper wire, assorted	18,198,000	31,312,000	16,342,000

It is an amazing fact that Russia has been the largest single taker of our exports of electrical equipment.

As I pointed out above, western Europe had already before the war succeeded in achieving a far greater degree of farm electrification than we had in this country. Latest reports indicate that electric power generation in western Europe has now recovered to approximately its prewar level. The Marshall plan, however, provides that we shall assist western Europe with our money to achieve a level of power production about double the prewar figure. If this plan is carried through by means of shipments of American equipment, it is bound to delay our own program to a fairly considerable extent. It does seem to me that this export program should be revised in the light of our own needs for the same items.

In any case, we will probably have difficulty with materials and equipment for some time yet. Electrifying rural America is just too big a job to be finished in a day. I realize many farmers are becoming very impatient as they are told to wait and wait and wait. Many of them have been waiting since before the war. They are tired of waiting. They are tired of receiving promises rather than electric current, and I don't blame them. Sometimes they are inclined to blame the Federal Rural Electrification Administration, or the board of managers of their own public power district or co-op, or their Senators and Congressmen for that matter.

As I previously pointed out, Congress has already appropriated more money than farmers have found it possible to use in buying the electrical equipment and supplies they need for construction. That is about as far as the jurisdiction of Congress goes in the matter—appropriating the money. Nevertheless, when farmers do become impatient and say, "All those figures are all right, but they don't help me; when will electricity be brought to my farm?" there is only one answer that anyone can honestly give. That answer is: "Be patient just a little longer. The program is there. The money has been appropriated. Rapid progress is being made, and power will be brought to you just as soon as physically possible."

No other truthful answer is possible. Certainly it is a fact that the progress has been amazing during the last few years. During the fiscal year ending June 1948, nearly 3,000 miles of line were energized in the State, and over 7,000 additional farm consumers were connected up. This is a rate of construction far greater than in any previous year. If too many farmers have been forced to wait longer than they should, it is simply because the demand has suddenly become overwhelmingly greater than the supply.

From these comments, I hope no farmer will think I am trying to discourage any line of action which has any possibility of speeding up construction still further. I have pointed out the possibility of cutting down the export of electrical equipment so vitally needed here at home. I have called attention to what I believe to be our very unwise policy of holding down production of aluminum and other electrical equipment in western Germany and Japan. If production in those countries could be stepped up sharply, at least a part of the output of aluminum could be shipped over here to fill our shortages. The rest of such production could be used to fill the reconstruction requirements of some of the foreign countries that are now dependent on us. In addition, such production, by supplying a means of livelihood to the industries and workers engaged in it, would ease the financial burden now laid upon us by our policy of supporting the people of the occupied countries. At present we are spending $1,300,000,000 a year just to maintain the people in western Germany and Japan. This seems absurd while they have unused industrial capacity that could serve to give them a means of support and supply us with what we need.

These are possible lines of action that should be investigated promptly and thoroughly before we are willing to accept quietly the present delay in rural electrification. There are other lines of action that are probably also worth investigating which might bring constructive results.

This has turned out to be a rather long article, and I appreciate the courtesy of those of you who have stayed with me to the end. I hope this one point at least is clear. Regardless of all our controversy and dispute about certain phases of the program, regardless of all the delays and obstacles we have encountered, the program is moving forward rapidly. The day of the coal-oil lamp is just about over for 90 percent of the farmers in Nebraska and the rest of the country. On several occasions I have made a statement that before the end of my present term of office in 1953 I expected to help bring electricity to every farmer in Nebraska that wanted it and who was in physical reach of the lines. I am more than ever confident that I shall be able to keep that promise—and long before 1953. In my opinion, this program has been so successful and has won such wide support from the entire Nation that nothing can stop us from finishing the job.

Poor Disguise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, in the August 3 edition of the Tulsa Daily World of Tulsa, Okla., there appeared in the editorial column the following article:

POOR DISGUISE

False whiskers on the administration's new anti-inflation bill do not fool anybody—much. It's the old OPA in disguise, but a poor disguise. It is true that the demise of the old OPA did not automatically lower prices, but practically everybody knows the new one would, if enacted, bring back the old abuses and further complicate the whole price structure. People might put up with the police state if it could get the job done, but experience is the more control the Government has the less of everything the people get.

Say what you please, the people are not fooled. They are not misled. They know that the President's insistence that Congress authorize him to reimpose rationing and price controls would mean the reenactment of the old OPA, with its arbitrary regulations and its gestapo methods of enforcement, a veritable police state which the President himself once decried—and they want none of it.

Their Representatives in Congress, Democrats and Republicans alike, apparently did not want a new OPA, although it might be under a different name. They knew the President's program was only a poor disguise for the hated OPA.

John Hollis Bankhead 2d

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL
OF GEORGIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 21 (legislative day of Monday, March 29), 1948

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD 2D, late a Senator from the State of Alabama

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, when JOHN H. BANKHEAD 2D passed into eternity, a statesman and patriot was removed from the stage of human affairs. The State of Alabama lost a son whose services had made his name a household word. The Nation lost one of its most unselfish and most useful legislators. The farmers of this Nation, wherever they may live, mourned that the voice of their outstanding champion and defender had been forever stilled.

If a personal reference may be pardoned, I lost an intimate friend whose companionship was sweet and whose understanding and devotion were a constant source of inspiration to me.

JOHN BANKHEAD was a Senator in the great tradition. He was fitted for a public career by inheritance as well as training. The Bankhead family, of Alabama, has written a notable page in the history of these United States. Indeed, with the exception of the Adams family, of Massachusetts, it is to be doubted whether the members of any one family and household have earned and gained so many high public offices or filled them with such outstanding ability.

Other Senators have enumerated the legislation which bore his name, and which was enacted as a result of his labors. I shall not again call the roll of the victories he won in his lifelong fight for economic equality for the American farmer. It will suffice to say that more far-reaching farm legislation was sponsored by him and bears his name today than has been fought to a successful conclusion in the legislative process by any other man who has ever adorned the Senate.

I shall always be proud to have known JOHN BANKHEAD intimately, and to have been able to call him friend in the truest sense of that word. When I first arrived in the Senate he came over to my desk, introduced himself, told me that we were members of the same college fraternity, and gave me the grip. We were both members of Sigma Alpha Epsilon. From that day until he went to his reward I called him Brother John. No older brother in blood could have been more generous in his interest, and from my first day in the Senate I was privileged to enjoy the closest relations with him, both in legislative work and in the social relations of men. I worked with him in support of all of his farm legislation and gloried in his legislative triumphs. He took an intense interest in my career, and never failed to speak the encouraging word which inspires one to greater efforts when the way is rough.

He will be missed by the Nation and by the Members of this body who learned his sterling worth through association and by seeing him tested in the crucible of legislative combat.

The deep sense of personal loss which I feel in his passing is only mitigated by the cherished memories of the many kindnesses and the complete understanding of a real friend—the most priceless possession of life.

The Appropriation Record of the Eighteth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN TABER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, on June 28, 1948, I released a statement indicating that in the second session of the Eightieth Congress the regular annual appropriation bills totaled $23,684,799,395, as compared with estimates from the President amounting to $25,477,477,126, or a saving of $1,792,677,731. Deficiency and supplemental appropriations totaled $8,998,964,535.87 for which the President's estimate was $9,947,768,096.79, or a reduction of $948,803,560.92. The total reduction in regular annual and deficiency bills, therefore, was $2,741,481,291.92. At the recent special session, the President requested appropriations of $83,134,250 and the Congress appropriated, of that amount, $15,300,000. A great deal that was not allowed were requests for funds which Congress had already denied in the previous regular session.

It has been said that we should add contract authorizations to the appropriations and attention has been called to one contract authorization, in particular, of $822,000,000 above the budget for the construction of airplanes. This was adopted on my motion on the floor of the House which I offered because the sentiment of the country overwhelmingly favored a larger air force than that contemplated by the President's budget. However, it should not be carried as an obligation or an appropriation until it is necessary to make the appropriations to pay the contracts entered into inasmuch as this item will not affect the annual budget until fiscal years 1950 and 1951. References to this contract authorization are an example of the way people have been misinformed as to the amount of appropriations made by the Eightieth Congress. The figures which I have given with respect to the appropriations acted upon by the committee are correct in every detail but there are also permanent appropriations automatically available under permanent law which are not considered by the Committee on Appropriations. These items, the largest of which is the interest on the public debt, are estimated to total $8,434,621,468 during the fiscal year 1949.

In the first session of the Eightieth Congress our savings over-all, as I indicated in my statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on August 15, 1947, totaled $4,480,664,303. Of these savings $800,000,000 was in the item for tax refunds which subsequently had to be appropriated inasmuch as overpayments of taxes greatly exceeded the amounts which appeared to be involved at the time the original appropriation was made. This is the only substantial item which the Congress found it necessary to restore to the budget. Other items restored were relatively small in amount so the net saving as a result of the first session activities of the Committee on Appropriations was approximately $3,600,000,000. This figure, added to the savings in the second session, makes a total of approximately $6,350,000,000 for the 2 years.

Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, in considering this legislation to provide housing, there are certain fundamental facts with which we all must agree:

First, there is inadequate housing in the United States today, even though we are the best-housed Nation on earth.

Second, new housing cannot be constructed unless home-building material is available. Lumber, nails, cement, plumbing, and wiring are essential.

Third, even though this material can be supplied it requires carpenters, masons, plumbers, and others to build the houses.

Fourth, if the materials and the labor are obtainable, some method of financing the projects must be provided.

There can be no controversy about these four points. There is disagreement in the Congress and in the country as to whether this needed housing can best be provided by private initiative under the free-enterprise system or by Government building, Government financing, Government regulations, and Government control.

Personally, I do not believe that the Federal Government with the taxpayers' money should enter the housing or any other field unless it is absolutely essential to the well-being of our people. We must have adequate housing and, if this can only be brought about by Government intervention, then that will happen. We must be sure, however.

It has been clearly demonstrated here that the construction of over 1,000,000 homes by private initiative will be completed in 1948. This is the all-time unit record in the United States. This is many more units than were constructed in 1947 when some controls were still in effect.

The President has recommended the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, and the Congress is enacting the major features of that bill less the slum-clearance and public-housing provisions. The Senate passed the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill in the last session. However, after more mature study and in the light of existing inflation, Senator TAFT, one of the authors of the bill, now urges that the public-building and slum-clearance provisions of the bill be deferred, because of the scarcity of materials, the shortage of labor, and the increased inflation which would necessarily follow.

In short, this housing bill which will become law satisfies almost all of the housing requests that the administration made. Slum-clearance and public-housing projects are the only features of the program that are not approved.

The bill before us will furnish as many houses as can be constructed with the materials and labor available. The slum-clearance and public-housing features can be considered later when there is a possibility of meeting the over-all problem.

The research division of the United States News has made a nonpartisan and unprejudiced economist's analysis of this bill, which I believe states the case quite accurately. There has been so much partisan politics in the President's recent speeches and press releases, as well as in the Congress, that it is refreshing to accept this research bureau's unbiased conclusions as to just what the bill provides. These conclusions are in part as follows:

Congress, in a last-minute switch, satisfies almost all the housing requests that the administration made. Slum-clearance and public-housing projects are the only features of the program that are not being approved.

To be more specific on the revived housing program:

Rental projects on a large scale are to be allowed mortgage insurance up to 90 percent of cost. Projects can run as high as $5,000,000. Nonprofit corporations that go in for such projects may go as high as $50,000,000.

Cost limits are boosted to $8,100 per unit, instead of the old limit of $1,350 per room. That will take care of most recent hikes in building costs.

Low-priced housing, to sell below $7,500, gets an 80-percent guarantee.

An additional $800,000,000 is authorized to insure rental projects.

Private builders, under these provisions, get even more lenient terms than they were offered under old title 6 provisions. Cost limits are higher.

When it comes to other loan provisions on housing:

Apartment owners are provided more guarantees for modernization loans. An additional $35,000,000 is authorized. Loans may run to $10,000.

Owner-occupied homes are eligible for 90-percent guarantees up to $6,300 instead of the old $5,400. An 80-percent guarantee then is permissible on home costs between $6,300 and $9,500. These come under title 2 loans.

Two-family dwellings are eligible for 90-percent guarantees to $7,000 and for 80 percent to $11,000. Previous limits were $6,000 and $10,000.

The housing bill also continues aid for builders of prefabricated houses, for low-cost rural homes and for low-cost homes for families of small income.

The building industry, in addition, gets still more financial props.

Secondary mortgage market is revived and expanded to include loans on all veterans' housing, on large-scale rental projects and on regular FHA loans.

Mortgage holders may dispose of as much as 50 percent of mortgages made after April 30, 1948, in this manner. Previous limit was 25 percent.

Yield insurance also is to be established. This program is designed to attract more private capital into the building industry by guaranteeing a minimum return on private investments. The minimum is 2.75 percent.

Aim of this program is to assure uninterrupted flow of money into building activity. Effect is likely to be continued upward pressure on building costs. Expansion of building activity is not to be expected. The industry is operating close to capacity now. But demand for new dwellings promises to increase.

Mr. Speaker, Congress is not doing the veteran or others in need of housing a service if, in attempting to provide housing, we destroy the stability of our financial structure. Cheap homes, provided at abnormal prices to be paid for over a term of uncertain years ahead, will in the long run not be beneficial to the very persons who obligate themselves now. We are in an emergency. I think it is generally conceded that the slum-clearance and public-housing features of the TEW bill could not produce homes for approximately 18 months. If these projects, undertaken by the Government and financed by the taxpayers, are authorized, and material priorities provided, it would seem that present construction, which is uniformly progressing in all parts of the United States, will be confined largely to the densely populated city slum districts; that is, housing construction in the district I have the honor to represent will be slowed up rather than accelerated. There just is not enough material and labor, regardless of money, to provide all this housing immediately. Eventually there must be adequate homes for all of our people and, following the lessons of the past, if private industry cannot or will not take care of this need, then the Federal Government will intervene. That is a question, however, which can be decided in the next Congress better than in 15 days, as suggested by the President, in this special session.

Mr. Speaker, I am supporting this housing bill and believe that there will be few votes against it when the speech-making and partisan political debate cease.

Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, in the first session of the Eightieth Congress the President in his message of January 6, 1947, said, "Except for minor adjustments, I believe that our program of benefits for veterans is now complete."

At the same time we had before us the Republican statement of principles, policies, and objectives. That statement contained the pledge of Republicans in Congress to promote the interests of veterans and their dependents. It reads as follows:

A grateful nation demands that those who fought in its defense, their widows and orphans, must never be forgotten. The best medical care and rehabilitation, education, and training for all desiring it, and efficient assistance in securing homes, farms, businesses, and real jobs must be provided for the veteran.

The Republican Congress during this Eightieth Congress has kept that pledge. Numerous and varied pieces of legislation to the number of 188 bills were passed directly benefiting war veterans, and it should be borne in mind that all of these were enacted into law as necessary to properly care for our veterans and their dependents after the President had said that "Except for minor adjustments, I believe that our program of benefits for veterans is now complete." This attitude of the administration was still further evidenced by the fact that the Director of the Veterans' Administration filed reports against scores of measures introduced into Congress in aid of veterans. And, it is to be noted that in these reports the Director stated that the proposed legislation was not in accord with the President's program. But, the Republican Congress found that the program for veterans' benefits was far from completed. We acted in the interest of the veterans and it is pleasing to me to have had some part in the enactment of these laws.

I realize that it will not be possible to refer in detail to all of these laws, and, that only a partial summary can be given within the limitations of these remarks. I would like, however, to briefly refer to some of the legislation enacted by the Eightieth Congress in aid of veterans and their dependents. As an illustration of the importance of some of these measures I will make particular reference to the bill that provided for the cashing of terminal-leave bonds held by veterans. Under the bill passed by the Democratic Congress it would have been necessary for the veterans to wait 5 years before receiving cash for their bonds. This was manifestly unfair to noncommissioned men and officers because commissioned officers received their comparable termination pay immediately upon being discharged. In the second place the average veteran was greatly in need of immediate cash to enable him to meet the obligations of civilian life. The Republican Congress immediately rectified the injustice that had been done to our veterans by making the bonds immediately payable. This provided a direct benefit to millions of veterans who were in actual need. Others who were not in dire straits permitted their bonds to remain in force. By cashing their bonds $1,800,000,000 was paid directly to the veterans under this law.

Without going into great detail, I now wish to mention just a few of the important measures included in the 188 enacted into law that I previously mentioned. They are as follows:

Increasing compensation for dependent survivors of war dead, covering widows, orphans, and parents.

Providing additional compensation for veterans who have dependents and who are entitled to compensation for service-connected disabilities rated at not less than 60 percent.

Amending the Civil Service Code to prevent discrimination against physically handicapped veterans in Government positions.

Increasing by 20 percent pensions payable to the veterans of the Spanish-American and Civil Wars, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion, and their dependents.

Increasing minimum monthly allowance for subsistence in cases of vocational rehabilitation of disabled veterans.

Appropriation of $5,000,000 for automobiles for veteran amputees.

Authorizing $1,000,000 annual appropriation for prosthetic appliance research.

Increasing the revolving fund from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000 for the purpose of making loans to veterans of World War II undertaking vocational training.

Adding farm training to educational and training programs for which the Government will pay full tuition and subsistence allowances under the GI bill of rights.

Raising the ceiling on wages and allowances payable to veterans in on-the-job training.

Appropriation of $35,500,000 to convert surplus military and other war housing to temporary reuse dwelling units for veterans. Amending the Federal Home Loan Bank Act to permit banks to accept 25-year mortgages, thus making many GI home loans eligible as collateral.

Authorizing financial assistance to disabled veterans in the construction of specially designed homes required by the nature of their service-connected disabilities.

Making veterans' housing cooperatives and nonprofit housing corporations eligible for Government-insured financing up to 95 percent of the value of the project.

Authorizing a secondary market for GI mortgage loans in the Federal National Mortgage Association, making it possible for veterans to obtain 100 percent guaranteed or insured financing in home purchases.

Providing that veterans shall have preference in the purchase or rental of all newly constructed sale or rental housing. This priority will remain in effect until April 1, 1949.

Emphasis is placed upon construction of homes within the ability of veterans generally to pay. For instance, the average-sized veteran home mortgage guaranteed by the GI bill is $5,756, and over 1,000,000 veterans have secured mortgage loans aggregating more than $7,000,000,000.

Repealing the time limit for reinstatement of national service life insurance.

Extending for an additional 5-year period the privilege of renewing 5-year level premium-term insurance for World War I veterans.

Established the Women's Army Corps (WAC) in the Regular Army and authorized the enlistment and appointment of women in the Regular Navy and Marine Corps Reserves.

Extended until February 3, 1950, the time limit for applying for mustering-out pay from the armed services.

Provided medical care for reservists who are injured or contract diseases while engaged in military training.

Passed a bill to allow compensation for American citizens and military personnel for injuries sustained as a result of wartime internment.

Provided for refund of income taxes paid for year in which servicemen died while in the service.

Increased amount of Federal aid to State or Territorial homes for support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States from $300 to $500 until June 30, 1951, and $300 a year thereafter.

Exempted hospitalized servicemen from the Federal tax on admissions to baseball games, theaters, and other entertainments.

Authorized travel expenses for veterans receiving vocational rehabilitation under regulations of the Veterans' Administration.

Allowed presumption of service connection for chronic and tropical diseases in applying for disability benefits.

Authorized a subsistence allowance to World War II veterans of $1 a day for each day spent as prisoners of the Japanese. This would not affect claims for property loss and personal abuse sustained while in a prisoner-of-war status.

Equalized retirement benefits among members of the Nurse Corps of the Army and Navy.

Preserved seniority rights of 10-point-preference eligibles in postal service transferring from position of letter carrier to clerk, or vice versa.

Authorized sale of permanent war housing to veterans for not more than construction cost.

Amended act of July 31, 1947, to provide further benefits for employees of the United States who are veterans of World War II and have lost opportunity for probational civil-service appointments by reason of service in the armed forces and who, due to service-connected disabilities, are unable to perform the duties of the positions for which examinations were taken.

Increased peacetime service-connected disability compensation rates from 75 to 80 percent of wartime rates.

Mr. Speaker. I realize that this limited enumeration of some of the worth-while legislation enacted to promote the welfare of our veterans and their dependents, does not do full justice to the splendid work that was done by the Eightieth Congress in their behalf. However, it does serve to illustrate the importance of the numerous and varied types of veteran legislation enacted into law for their benefit.

The record made by this Eightieth Congress in behalf of veterans is one of which we may well feel proud. It has been a personal privilege and pleasure to me to have had a part in serving the interests of our veterans and their dependents since I first became a Member of this body. It will continue so long as I have the privilege and honor of representing the First Congressional District of New Jersey.

President Truman and the High Cost of Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, in giving consideration to the President's statement on the cost of living many pertinent facts should be reviewed in order to make the record clear.

Generally speaking the cost of living is the cost of production plus the cost of distribution, and common sense will tell you that any factor that affects the cost of production and the cost of distribution will in turn affect the cost of living, up or down, as the case may be.

Wage rates, freight rates, cost of coal, steel, and farm commodities—all are basic and set the level on what the housewife pays for meat, bread, milk, and other household necessities.

Regarding controls, a little history presents the best argument. Prices and ration controls broke down long before President Truman and a Democratic Congress terminated the OPA in 1946. In May of that year the Bureau of Labor Statistics stated that 85 percent of the stores had no veal, more than four-fifths were without pork loins, ham, or bacon, and that almost 7 out of 10 had no beef or lamb.

The meat-cutters' union at the same time said Government regulations of the meat industry were unenforceable and that impossible regulations were building up an army of meat bootleggers.

Within 1 month's time after the death of OPA employment in the meat-packing industry jumped from 93,000 to 163,000, and 2 months later it had increased to about normal levels of 180,000 workers.

At this time, the President proposed the seizure of packing plants. However, the proposal was turned down as useless because the packing houses were empty.

It must be remembered that the meat we receive this year, 1948, had to be planned in 1946. The Government's manipulation of the OPA completely demoralized the meat industry and we are suffering the consequences of it today through scarcities and high prices.

The cause of meat prices and scarcities is disclosed upon examination of the record of the Department of Agriculture for the past 10 years. Beginning with OPA, the number of cattle, hogs, and sheep have declined on our farms and this was the recommendation of the Department of Agriculture.

The cattle population of 1944 was 85,573,000. Two years later it was 81,207,000. The President and the Department of Agriculture recommended they be reduced 2,707,000 in 1947 and it was done. Today, according to their report, we have 78,564,000 head of all kinds of cattle in this country.

Now listen to this, you consumers who are paying good prices for meat. The Department of Agriculture recommends that the farmers reduce their breeding herds by 517,000 head for this next year. It is almost unbelievable but that is the Department's recommendation.

In 1943, the spring pig crop was 74,223,000. The fall crop was 47,584,000. Now what was the Agriculture Department's goal for 1946? Well, they recommended 51,651,000 spring pigs, a reduction of nearly 23,000,000 head.

The Department in one instance was telling the people there would be a shortage of pork and the next instance asked the farmer in 1948 to produce 2,780,000 less head of pigs than in 1947. This year the goals are raised but it takes at least a year to produce pork and from 2 to 3 years to produce beef.

Now what about sheep? The records show in 1942, 55,120,000 head of sheep and lambs in this country and then came OPA with regulations and careful planning with recommendations until today the sheep and lamb population is about 35,332,000, a reduction of nearly 20,000,000 head.

The same story from the Department's own records could be told about poultry and eggs. It must be recognized, Mr. Speaker, that the professional planners of the Wallace days still believe you can have prosperity through scarcity. We all remember the famous Luckman's order to reduce poultry to save grain. Marketing livestock at light weights, and so forth.

In these days of increased demand for meat and the population increasing almost a million a year, it is difficult to understand why the Department of Agriculture asks for fewer breeding cows. Do they actually want a shortage so that they can again force wartime controls upon the people? Every school child knows we want more production and not less.

The foreign-aid program of this administration is definitely a major factor in our high cost of living. No nation can export $8,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000 annually in merchandise and commodities and receive nothing in return without dire consequences.

To give a case in point, 2 or 3 weeks ago British buyers using aid money supplied by the American taxpayer went to Wisconsin and purchased 26,000,000 pounds of cheese, bidding up the price 4 cents per pound.

To present the export problem more clearly, we will look at one basic commodity—steel. The House Small Business Committee has just heard testimony that in 1947 the administration permitted to be exported steel conservatively estimated at more than 6,500,000 tons—a quantity in 1 year which would cover military needs projected at this year's rate for 5 years. Of this total, more than 286,000 went to Sweden, a large steel-producing and exporting country; 61,796 tons to Belgium; and 195,311 tons to Britain, with most of that amount returning from Britain and Belgium in the form of small automobiles and finished steel sheets.

Mr. Truman 7 months ago was vested by Congress with power to control exports of scarce commodities. He has never invoked this power, although he talks of imposing mandatory allocations on American users of steel. Instead of curbing any of the flow of steel abroad, he has allotted 1,120,000 tons of iron and steel for export during the third quarter—almost equal to a full year's military requirements.

The same story can be told about other commodities and housing materials. Time will not permit a detailed recital of all exports, but to give you an idea, I will recite a few.

For the year ending July 1, 1947, they exported 168,844,000 pounds of beef and veal, and 714,785,000 of pork and pork products. For the year ending July 1, 1948, they exported 89,017,000 pounds of beef and veal and 440,192,000 of pork and pork products. All of these things cut the supply and raised the price on the bread basket and it was Mr. Truman's idea.

In respect to housing, keep in mind that 1946 was an election year as well as 1948. In 1946, the Congress was controlled completely by Mr. Truman's party. They passed a housing bill with all the fanfare that could accompany a piece of legislation. They called it a veteran's housing bill to give it added flavor.

All the public-building and all the slum-clearance master minds in the Congress put everything into this measure they could think of—controls, subsidies, priorities, and so forth. No piece of legislation ever gave an administrator so much authority. Under this act, he was absolute dictator of the building industry.

Mr. Wilson Wyatt, former mayor of Louisville, Ky., was made Housing Expediter and low-cost housing was going to bloom on every vacant lot throughout the land. He set up a fantastic goal of 2,750,000 housing units for 1946 and 1947. About 1,200,000 of these were to be completed in 1946.

Congress armed Mr. Wyatt with broad powers and an abundance of money, and he sallied forth equipped with power to issue rules and regulations to make houses grow faster than they ever grew before.

Mr. Wyatt quickly learned something that he evidently had never known before. He learned that it took lumber, brick, plumbing, flooring, doors, plaster, and labor to build a house. He found bottlenecks in brick, soil pipe, electrical supplies, and, believe it or not, he found OPA obstructing his path.

Such is the manner of Government agencies. In the case of brick manufacturers, the producer could not get manpower back into the brick plants unless they raised wages and they could not raise wages unless they could get an increase in the price of brick. OPA said "No," and for a long time as many as 300 brick plants were out of production in this country. They had similar experiences all along the line.

However, their promise to build houses was a good campaign song, and they sang it throughout the land.

The outcome of the whole program was that they literally tied the building industry into a knot. Foundations were laid in 1946 for approximately 400,000 houses in comparison to approximately 1,000,000 houses that will be built in 1948 by private industry.

The act was an ignominious failure, and the President meekly permitted it to expire.

Now in the year 1948, another campaign year, they think another housing measure is political expedient. Let's take a look at the situation. Today, a purchaser is waiting for every pound, piece, and foot of building material, the moment it is ready for market. The buildng trade labor forces have been increased by some 200,000 and every man that can drive a nail, lay a brick, or twist a pipe is at work. More housing units are being built than ever before in history.

Anyone can understand what would happen if the Government would sell more bonds and add $10,000,000,000 more demand on building material and labor. It would simply drive prices higher and higher and throw the industry into confusion.

Today there are countless housing projects throughout the land waiting only for labor and materials. Two years ago, Chicago made an agreement with a life-insurance company to construct a $30,000,000 slum-clearance housing project, Chicago supplying $3,000,000 for the site. This project has not been started because labor and materials are not available.

All responsible people who are familiar with the situation will tell you that it would bring about disastrous results if the Government would now support a housing program which would be in excess of materials and labor available. We must keep in mind that the Federal Government has expended or committed or incurred a potential liability in the field of housing since 1932, a sum now in excess of $20,000,000,000. We should survey this field very cautiously before approving additional legislation.

The housing shortage is brought about chiefly by the discontinuance of housing construction during the 5 war years. We are now building more houses than at any time in our history. Material manufacturers are expanding and producing all that can be produced.

All labor is being used. All builders are at work. It is not humanly possible to build them faster. The housing problem is being solved and it is being solved in the only way possible; by letting the people who know how to build do the job without governmental interference.

We know that the housing shortage has caused hardships for a great number of our people for the past 3 years, but we are catching up and we are catching up fast.

In respect to the high cost of living candor requires the statement that our economic predicament is by and large the fault of the Democratic Party who has managed the affairs of this country for the past 15 years.

National Freedom Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a statement prepared by me on National Freedom Day and on the part which was played by a great Philadelphian, the late Maj. R. R. Wright, Sr., in the passage of the resolution establishing National Freedom Day. There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

STATEMENT BY UNITED STATES SENATOR FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL FREEDOM DAY EACH FEBRUARY 1

Under Public Law 842 of the Eightieth Congress, signed by President Truman on June 30, 1948, the President of the United States is authorized to issue a proclamation designating the 1st day of February of each year as National Freedom Day.

As the author of Senate Joint Resolution 37 of the Eightieth Congress which was the measure enacted into Public Law 842, I am, of course, proud of my identification with this very worthy legislation. But I want to call to the attention of the Senate and of the entire Congress and of the country as a whole the part which an outstanding Philadelphian, the late Maj. R. R. Wright, Sr., played in the final achievement of this goal he first proposed for designating the first day of February as National Freedom Day.

The observance commemorates the signing by President Abraham Lincoln, on February 1, 1865, of the joint resolution adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, proposing the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

To Major Wright, that event was of great personal importance. This fine gentleman, a great citizen of Philadelphia, was a slave boy of about 10 years of age when slavery was abolished in the United States.

He was old enough then to know the full meaning of slavery. He was young enough to be able to kindle within his breast a fierce determination to make of his life one of great usefulness not only to his race but to his Nation. And he succeeded in that determination.

A few years ago, Ebony magazine, in an article devoted to Major Wright, described him as "the most amazing living Negro in America today."

Unfortunately, although he conceived the idea for an annual National Freedom Day observance, although he promoted it vigorously for many years and was the individual primarily responsible for its adoption by the State of Pennsylvania and by the Congress, Major Wright did not live to see this great dream of his come true. He died shortly before Senate Joint Resolution 37 was passed by the two Houses of Congress, and enacted into law.

National Freedom Day, however, will always stand as a monument to his efforts.

Maj. Richard Robert Wright was president of the Citizens & Southern Bank and Trust Co., of Philadelphia. Of 11 Negro banks in the United States, this one is the only one north of the Mason-Dixon line. It was founded by Major Wright when he was about 66 years of age, in 1921. It is an outstanding Philadelphia institution and one of which all of us in Philadelphia are understandably proud.

The major, who earned his military rank in the Spanish-American War, was a distinguished educator who had devoted 38 years to the presidency of the Georgia State College when he decided—at an age when most men are considering retirement or are already retired—to go into the banking business.

Major Wright had always urged his students to seek business careers as the best method of proving the untruth of the theory prevailing among some whites that Negroes had no talent for business. He was trying his own advice. And he proved it was good advice, too, for Citizens & Southern Bank and Trust Co. in Philadelphia emerged as one of the strongest banks in Philadelphia when disaster hit the banking business in 1933.

Major Wright, realizing at 66 that he knew very little about the business he intended to enter, enrolled in a banking class at the University of Pennsylvania, along with one of his sons, Emanuel. Together they learned the banking business, and together they laid the groundwork for the formation of the Citizens & Southern Bank and Trust Co.

This bank was started with $125,000 in capital raised from 300 Negro stockholders. The original stock sold at $125 a share. In 1945 it was quoted at $143 on the open market.

The bank weathered two depressions because the main criterion for operation of this bank was character. Major Wright believed that character was more important than collateral. There are many legends about his theories of banking, often somewhat unorthodox, but there is general agreement in Philadelphia that this bank has been managed well. Major Wright breathed the warm air of human kindness into the banking business and it paid dividends.

One of the great moments of his life was the enactment into Pennsylvania law of a national freedom day observance in our State. The annual observances at which he presided in Philadelphia were truly inspiring events, and it was always a great pleasure for me to participate.

Mr. President, I include as part of my remarks an article on Major Wright printed in the April 1945 issue of Reader's Digest condensed from the Progressive. This article entitled "Massa, Tell 'Em We're Rising," by Webb Waldron, describes the great career of Major Wright and tells of the day when the young ex-slave, attending a school for Negro children near Atlanta, met the head of the Freedmen's Bureau, Gen. O. O. Howard. When the general asked what message the children of this school would like to send to the people who were contributing to this school Richard Wright rose in the back row and said:

"Massa, tell 'em we're rising."

Years later, when Major Wright became President of Georgia State College for Negroes, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes sent him this congratulatory message:

"Man, you're not rising, you're risen."

I ask that the entire article be printed.

The article follows:

"MASSA, TELL 'EM WE'RE RISING!

"(Condensed from The Progressive)

"(Webb Waldron)

"The extraordinary career of Richard R. Wright, born a slave and now leading Negro banker of the United States

"When Richard Robert Wright had taught school for 50 years, he decided to quit. Born a slave, he had risen to be president of a Negro college in the South, a distinguished member of his race. Now he thought he'd better give younger teachers a chance. But Wright was only retiring from teaching, not from life.

" 'For years I had been telling my graduates to get into business,' he says. 'But they would come back, and tell me there were too many handicaps for a Negro. I realized that the worst handicap was a firm belief among both whites and Negroes that the Negro hadn't any head for business. I thought it was up to me to disprove it.'

"So, at 66, Wright became a banker. That was in 1921. Today, at 90, a trim, vigorous man with fine-cut features, white hair and sharp dark eyes, Wright is the leading Negro banker of the United States, president of the Citizens & Southern Bank & Trust Company of Philadelphia. He thinks that his best years are still ahead.

"Every working day from 8:30 to 6 o'clock Wright sits in his small, crowded office, busy with telephone, correspondence, Negro and white callers discussing loans and payments, the affairs of his race.

"To get the full drama of this man's accomplishments, glance back to the day more than 80 years ago when news of Negro freedom came to a south Georgia plantation. Harriet, Dick Wright's mother, went to her mistress. 'Are we really free?' she said fearfully. Reassured, she gathered up her children and wandered, afoot, 200 miles northward. After many months, near Atlanta she found a school that had been opened to teach Negro children to read and write. Dick, then aged 11, entered at once.

"One day the head of the Freedmen's Bureau, General O. O. Howard, visited the school. 'What message shall I take from you children to the people in the North who are helping you'? he asked. A boy rose in the back row. 'Massa, tell 'em we're rising!'

"That striking answer of little Dick Wright reached the ears of John Greenleaf Whittier, fighter for human liberty, and Whittier immortalized the phrase in his poem Howard at Atlanta. Thousands of times the words of Dick Wright have been repeated in lectures, sermons and songs. They became the slogan of a rising race.

"Dick Wright pushed on through school, finally graduated from Atlanta University. Then he started a school of his own for Negro children, tuition 50 cents a month. One day a mother came with 25 cents—one 'ition,' she said, half the money for her little girl's first month's schooling. Soon she brought in the other 25, making it 'tuition.'

"When Dick Wright was appointed first president of Georgia State College for Negroes, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes sent him a message: 'Man, you're not rising, you're risen!' Wright was president of that college for 30 years, fighting for the right of Negro boys and girls to an education not only in handicrafts and farming but in science, languages and the arts.

"Then came the decision to start a bank. In his teaching days Wright had organized a national Negro teachers' association. Now he wrote several hundred Negro teachers all over the United States, asking whether they'd like to buy shares in a new bank to be owned and run by Negroes. Entirely on his name he raised $156,250. Then he visited various cities to determine where to locate the bank. Finally he fixed on Philadelphia. To a man, the leading bankers of Philadelphia advised him against it. There were enough banks in Philadelphia, they assured him, and besides he didn't know anything about banking. 'That just made me determined to go ahead,' say Wright.

"He had three grown sons, all college graduates, and he persuaded the youngest, Emanuel, to join him in the banking adventure. Father and son enrolled in a course in banking at the University of Pennsylvania. Meanwhile, Wright bought and remodeled an old building in a section of Philadelphia that was predominantly Negro.

"The Citizens & Southern opened with $125,000 capital and 300 Negro stockholders. From the start, Wright used his bank as a means of creating better relations between white and colored people. For instance, the streets in that area were unpaved. Wright got up a petition to the city fathers which was signed by hundreds of people, black and white. Ultimately the district got everything it asked for, pavements, street lights, traffic lights. 'That bank is the best thing that ever came into this part of town,' said a white shopkeeper.

"Wright promotes thrift among the people of his district, colored and white. 'The Negro is often said to be thriftless and unreliable,' he says, 'but as a banker I have never been able to see any difference between white and Negro. There are thrifty and thriftless people among them both in about the same proportions.'

"He encourages individual initiative by lending money to ambitious youngsters. One time four young white men came to ask his advice about starting a hat factory. 'I looked them over. They had saved about $400,' he says. 'I told them when they had their plans ready to come back and tell me what they needed. Ultimately I lent those boys $10,000. They made good, and paid back every cent of it.'

"Another man who wanted to start a sweater factory looked all over the city for credit before he came to Wright. 'I thought he had character,' Wright told me. 'Character is more important than collateral. So I lent him $300 to get started. Last year that man banked $219,000 with us.'

"Dozens of small Negro enterprises in Philadelphia, such as laundries, dry-cleaning establishments, groceries, bakeries, and schools, have got started or survived crises by the help of Wright's bank.

" 'Of course there are handicaps for the Negro in business,' Wright said, 'but I always say to a young man starting out, "Don't have a chip on your shoulder, don't be aggressive." Go ahead straightforwardly as if you expected to be treated like anybody else, and you usually will be. Your ability and honesty will do more to put you ahead than your color will hold you back.'

" 'In the South it's different,' he told me. 'But the South today is going ahead more rapidly than the North in tolerance and fair play for the Negro. I predicted 25 years ago that this would be true, and it is.'

"The president of a large downtown Philadelphia bank, after telling me that he'd be proud to walk up Broad Street with Wright because he admired him so much as a man, added hesitantly: 'But I don't think he's hard-boiled enough to be a good banker. Why, the other day the Major—everybody calls Wright "Major" because he was a paymaster with that rank in the Spanish-American War—the Major came in here asking my advice about making a certain loan. "Major," I said, "you'd be crazy to make such a loan! That man hasn't got anything!" '

"I repeated this remark to Wright. 'Well,' he said, 'maybe I'll make that loan anyway. I think the man has character.'

"A member of Wright's board of directors told me that sometimes when the board has turned down a loan Wright goes ahead anyway.

" 'Of course,' the Major commented, 'every bank in the world gets fooled on borrowers and loses money, but it's a curious thing that on those loans we've never lost a cent.'

"One time a group of Negro professional men formed a corporation, borrowed money from Wright's bank, hired a manager, and started a laundry. It looked like a sure thing. But the management was bad, and the business failed. Since it was a corporation, no individual was liable for the debt. Yet the incorporators raked up all available assets and repaid the bank in full. 'I failed to make sure the company had good management,' Wright says. 'But my estimate of the character of those men was right.'

"Loans to churches are often considered by banks in the nature of charity. Wright's bank has loaned money to over 100 Negro churches in and around Philadelphia, and every obligation has been met.

"Recently he called in 20 white businessmen who had banked with him for years and asked if they had any kicks or suggestions. 'Yes, I have a kick,' one of them said. 'Why did you ask only white men here today? The next time get some Negro businessmen, too. We're all dealing with you together.' Wright's ceaseless efforts to break down barriers between the races in a business way has had its effect.

"In the 1933 banking crisis, the Citizens & Southern was one of the first Philadelphia banks to reopen. 'Some of those big downtown banks whose presidents had advised me to stay out of banking,' said the Major with a humorous squint, 'didn't reopen at all.'

"Today the bank's $125 shares are worth $143 in open market. The bank has some 10,000 Negro depositors, 1,000 white depositors. Total deposits are $2,312,000. A small bank for a big town, perhaps, but a big bank in its implications for the Negro people. Today the United States has 11 Negro banks. The other ten are in the South.

"On the wall of Wright's office is a photograph of the first meeting of the National Negro Bankers Association, which Wright organized. Here is a picture of the airplane that Wright bought in 1939 and sent, with a Negro crew, on a good-will flight to Haiti and then on a trip around the Negro colleges in the South. That trip did much to promote the enlistment of Negro youth in our air forces.

"And here is a picture of this year's celebration of National Freedom Day, the day on which President Lincoln signed the Joint Resolution of Congress proposing the Thirteenth Amendment, and thus insured the legal end of slavery. The Major originated the idea of celebrating this day—February 1—and already it is observed in many States. As he and his associates conceive it, National Freedom Day is not only a celebration of Negro freedom but a day to challenge bondage everywhere, to assert the right to freedom of all men.

"So, 'Tell them we are rising' has a constantly widening meaning as the Major repeats it."

I also include Senate Joint Resolution 37 as introduced by me as part of my remarks, along with Senate Report No. 761, House Report No. 2395, and a copy of the public law. Both reports express the feeling of the respective Senate and House Judiciary Committees that the observance of National Freedom Day will promote the spreading of good will and good relations between the races:

"Senate Report 761

Colleague Lauds Hon. C. Wayland Brooks, of Illinois, for Aiding the Nation's Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. WAYLAND BROOKS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 29), 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter I have received from my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota, Hon. EDWARD J. THYE, a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 6, 1948.

The Honorable C. WAYLAND BROOKS,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BROOKS: As one of the junior members of the Eightieth Congress, after having served as governor of my State, Minnesota, I realize the tremendous responsibility placed upon leadership in any public service. I have come to appreciate deeply the able and devoted public service which you have rendered in the Eightieth Congress. As we come to the close of this Congress, I want to express my deep appreciation for the splendid manner in which you, as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture, handled the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. You were at all times patient and courteous and you discharged your duties with great understanding

Although I was not a member of your committee; I was a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and I am deeply appreciative of your leadership and help in securing passage of the resolution which made possible the financing of the study of the long-range program for American agriculture. In addition, many members of the Senate Agriculture Committee are deeply appreciative of your suggestion that we retain Dr. H. C. M. Case, director of agricultural economics, College of Agriculture, University of Illinois, as the committee's chief legislative adviser. Dr. Case's understanding of agriculture and economics, not only in the United States, but in Europe and Asia as well, brought us a wealth of information which ably assisted us in writing the long-range farm program.

I, personally, have been deeply concerned with agricultural problems for years as I served as Dairy and Food Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Agriculture in Minnesota prior to my term in office as governor. I fully appreciated not only your keen interest in agricultural problems, but Dr. Case's outstanding work.

With deep personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. THYE,
United States Senator.

Labor-Management Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, in 1946, prior to the national elections of that year the Republican Party issued a statement of principles, policies, and objectives. It was a declaration to the people of the Nation as to what its candidates for Congress stood for, and what they would be expected to enact into law if elected. A majority of the Members elected were Republicans.

It is therefore appropriate to look at the declaration in their party statement on the subject of labor-management relations. It reads as follows:

> We reaffirm our belief in the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively with employers as one of the cornerstones of competitive enterprise. The processes of such bargaining must be protected and strengthened if we are to have real jobs and prosperity for all.
> For that purpose we believe that Government decisions should not be substituted for free agreement, but governmental machinery to promote peaceful settlement of disputes should be improved.
> Demands of either side must be kept within the bounds of reason and fairness and both sides must recognize the rights of the general public.

We have kept that pledge.

The conditions that gave rise to a public demand for labor and management to settle in a more orderly way the differences between them, created the necessity for a law that would recognize not only the inalienable rights of both labor and management but also recognize the public welfare as paramount. The labor-management law passed by the Eightieth Congress has done this.

The overwhelming support given to the bill in both House and Senate by the members of both the Republican and Democratic parties can be taken as unmistakable evidence of the merit of the law and of the public demand for such a law.

Congress passed the act over President Truman's veto. The vote showed that nearly four-fifths of all Members of Congress joined in overriding the veto. In the House of Representatives the vote was 331 to 83, only 1 short of 4 to 1. The Senate vote was 68 to 25, or 6 more than the necessary two-thirds majority of the Senators voting.

It is also interesting to note that in the House of Representatives the vote to override the veto consisted of 225 Republicans and 106 Democrats. And to sustain the veto there were only 11 Republican votes and 71 Democrat votes. Thus the Republican vote was almost unanimous and the Democrat vote far more than a majority of the Democrats voting. In the Senate the division by parties was: Republicans for overriding the veto 48, Democrats 20. In favor of sustaining the veto were 3 Republicans and 22 Democrats.

The immensity of the favorable vote to enact the law tells a story that does not need any emphasizing or explanation. It was the voice of an aroused public opinion.

How has the law worked? This is a natural and appropriate question to ask. A study of the facts before and after its enactment, I think, will give the answer. It is that the law has worked well.

An examination of the entire postwar period from VJ-day, August 15, 1945, until the present affords a fair opportunity of comparison before and after the law became effective, August 22, 1947. From the regular reports of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, it is evident that the new law is unquestionably improving labor-management relations as intended by Congress and as demanded by the people.

This is strikingly true when it is noted that, since the Labor-Management Relations Act became effective, strikes in manufacturing industries, mining, and the private-building industry have decreased substantially. Work stoppages under the old law averaged 395 a month. They have been cut to an average of 201 under the new law. This represents a reduction in strikes of 49 percent.

The number of workers involved in new strikes each month from VJ-day until the new labor act was 337,000 each month. The average number of workers so involved since the act is 131,000. This is a reduction of 61 percent under the new law.

From VJ-day until the new act the average number of man-days of idleness caused by work stoppages was 7,213,000 per month. Under the new law this figure has been cut to 2,613,000 per month.

It is encouraging to also note that the record shows that notwithstanding such a considerable decrease in strikes that working conditions have continued to improve. Wages have continued to rise, more leisure time has been made available through a shorter workweek and average hourly earnings also have increased.

The vital point is that labor is making these gains under the new law through peaceful, collective bargaining, whereas before the new labor act gains were more frequently made through costly strikes. Wage increases through peaceful negotiation are vastly more important to all concerned than wage increases obtained at the expense of lost wages and lost production. Thus the new labor act is providing a better annual wage for workers and a more constant and increasing supply of things urgently needed as a solvent for high prices.

During 1946, the peak year in work stoppages, workers lost 116,000,000 man-days, while at present the annual rate is running about a fourth as much. On the basis of higher wage rates, the savings to workers would be in excess of a billion dollars a year.

Under the new labor act's sound principles our country is building a rule of reason for cooperation between employers and employees for their mutual benefit and for the good of all our people.

I shall analyze briefly the provisions of the bill.

It is important to note that the rights of workers to organize and to bargain collectively remains in the new law in the same language as in the Wagner Act. Likewise, with no change from the old law it forbids employers to interfere with the employees or to threaten or coerce them when they exercise those rights.

Workers are protected from violence and intimidation by the provisions of the bill that forbid unions to beat up workers or to threaten or coerce workers to force them into a union or force them to choose one union when they wish to choose another.

Free speech is guaranteed to both employers and unions. Each is allowed to talk to workers as long as they do not threaten workers or try to bribe them to join or not to join a union.

It protects individual rights by prohibiting employers and unions by agreement between themselves to force workers to join the union and to pay dues to it unless the majority of the workers by secret ballot have voted in favor of the agreement, and even then it forbids depriving a man of his job by denying union membership to him as long as he is willing to pay initiation fees and dues.

It also forbids employers to check off union dues unless the worker has voluntarily authorized the employer to do so.

It gives protection to welfare funds in the interest of the union members. When employers and unions establish funds for the welfare of workers and their families, it requires them to do so under arrangements that will make certain that the money will be used for these purposes and not for other purposes of the union leaders.

In further protecting the interest of union members it requires unions, in order to be recognized as labor organizations under the Wagner Act, to tell their members how much money they take in, where they get it, and what they spend it for, and to disclose what they pay their officers, how much they charge for dues, the grounds on which they suspend or expel members, and other matters that the members are entitled to know.

In an effort to promote the principle of negotiation instead of arbitrary and precipitous strikes or lock-outs, to the detriment of the workers and all other parties, including the public, it requires unions and employers, when labor contracts come to an end, to negotiate for 60 days before engaging in a strike or lock-out.

Another practice which the bill seeks to correct in the interest of innocent parties not directly connected with a particular labor dispute is by prohibiting unions, by jurisdictional strikes and boycotts, from trying to get control over employees who have not chosen the union as their bargaining agent or who have chosen another union as their bargaining agent.

To protect long-established craft unions it forbids the Labor Board, which administers the Wagner Act, to compel skilled workers to bargain through an industrial union when they wish to bargain through a craft union.

Recognizing that Communists and other subversive influences have sought at times to get control of unions and use them for their purposes, and, further recognizing that these individuals cover their activities with secrecy, and remain unknown as Communists to the loyal and patriotic workers in the union, the bill in an effort to protect union members from such influences, requires unions, in order to be recognized as labor organizations under the Wagner Act, to file affidavits of their officers saying the officers are not Communists or fellow travelers.

It forbids corporations to use stockholders' money for political purposes and forbids unions to use members' money for political purposes.

To preserve equality before the law, it makes unions subject to suits for damages the same as individuals, corporations, and other organizations, when they break their contracts or engage in unlawful activities.

To protect the public against strikes that imperil the public health or safety, the bill enables the President in such cases to delay for a time such strikes, as he did in the great coal strike early this year.

The Conciliation Service is set up as an independent agency. It is directed to try to prevent strikes—it cannot forbid strikes—and authorizes it to take a secret ballot of employees before a strike, if the union is willing.

It requires unions, as well as employers, to bargain in good faith when employees choose the union as their bargaining agent.

It requires the Labor Board to use fair procedures and to render fair decisions whether the cases involve charges against employers or charges against unions.

Recognizing the necessity to have a law that will at all times be fair in its operations as between employer and employee, the Congress in enacting the law set up a joint committee of Congress to study labor-management relations. If defects in the law appear, we will change the law. We will not stubbornly resist change. It is our desire to make the law fair, just, and workable in its application to all parties, including the public.

Throughout my entire service in the Congress, I have been sympathetic to the cause of labor. I continue to be. I believe that this law which was so overwhelmingly passed by Congress is a good law. It may need some changes in certain particulars, but in the main it has proven fair and just, and, I believe with honest administration, it will prove highly satisfactory to all parties concerned, including the public, and will bring a greater measure of peace to the industrial scene than we have known for many years.

A Hopeful Plan for World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement by Mr. George D. Brabson, a constituent of my district, entitled "A Hopeful Plan for World Peace."

From a reading of this statement, it is evident that Mr. Brabson has given the subject which he discusses considerable thought. It should be of great interest to all who are concerned with the present world situation. It is an illuminating study.

A HOPEFUL PLAN FOR WORLD PEACE

(By George D. Brabson)

No one can intelligently discuss the many and involved phases of the Marshall plan or make even a calculated guess as to its likely outcome without some knowledge of our previous ventures into the ecoomic problems of Europe. The most arresting thing about the Marshall plan, the Truman doctrine, and the other plans for economic rehabilitation in Europe and the containment of communism, is the refusal of their various proponents to deal with the whole problem. They admit that their plans are stopgap measures only, intended to meet an impending crisis, and they stop thinking beyond that point with the excuse that unless we meet that crisis head-on and at all costs, we are lost—that the time for all other measures has passed, and the one issue we must face is that of stopping communism in its tracks, now or never.

Anyone with a sense of historical perspective, or with a knowledge of the inexorable logic of time, cannot fail to remember that we Americans have proposed some 12 different plans for restoring European economy and saving the world from dictatorship, all within the past 30 years. Here they are:

Wilson's fourteen points.
Washington disarmament treaties.
Kellogg pack to outlaw war.
The Dawes plan to restore European economy.
The Young plan.
The Stimson doctrine to prevent aggression.
Neutrality Act of 1936—Roosevelt plan.
Quarantine plan of F. D. R.
The four freedoms.
The Atlantic Charter.
The Yalta declaration—and now.
The Truman doctrine.

We have found from past experience that none of these plans has worked for one reason or a dozen. Yet we have seized upon the Marshall plan as if it were the one and only hope of salvation for Europe, and indeed in the long run for ourselves. Since no one else has dared to suggest that there is any other way, or that there are certain alternatives, I am forced to undertake that task myself, and to propose what may impertinently be called the Brabson plan. If so, it is based upon four well-defined premises, all derived from the pages of European history and the lessons of elementary economics.

My first premise is that no single racial group, or nation, if you prefer, has ever been able to conquer and hold all of Europe for any substantial period of time, and there is no evidence that any one nation can do so within the foreseeable future. Practically all the major European nations have tried it under sociological and economic conditions far more favorable to one power domination than will ever exist again. All of them failed miserably in their attempts. The list includes the Russians, the Germans under their different leaders, the French, the English, the Spanish, and even combinations of these powers with others.

My critics will, of course, argue that this is a different era in history, that modern weapons have changed the picture; that a modern military machine can now be built up so strong as to be impregnable to attack from without or within; that warfare is now of the total population, total resources variety, involving all economic aspects, and hence any nation once dominated and organized into such a pattern could never hope to extricate itself. And then to silence me for once and for all, my critics will patiently remind me that this is the atomic age.

Most of these same arguments could have been and doubtless were made when Napoleon seemed to be trampling all Europe under heel; when Bismarck planted the black eagle over Paris, Copenhagen, Prague, and Vienna; when Peter the Great conquered all eastern Europe, and even when the Spanish Armada sailed for England. But there was something in each age and circumstance which prevented the final consummation of European dictatorship. Was it a lack of sufficient racial integrity to hold the conquering armies together? Was it an inherent inability of the many divergent peoples of Europe to become united under a single pattern of any nationalist design?

My second premise is that no single racial group or nation can impose its economic, wage, and property system upon the whole of Europe for any substantial period of time. That, too, has been tried time and again throughout the various countries of Europe ever since the days of Julius Caesar. But the invariable reaction has been resistance, a period of growing resentment, and the eventual discarding or evolution into something else. The outstanding mark of the genius of the major races of Europe has been their individual ability to build up each for themselves a separate economic and property system, suited to their own soil, their climate, and to the demands of their particular racial temperament.

It is no mere accident of birth, for example, that the English system of proprietorship varies in many respects from that of White Russia of pre-Soviet days. It was the nature of the soil and the kind of crops that could be grown upon it, the climate and the dispersion of the population, the ethnological background and temperament of the peoples—all combining, which were responsible for the differences in their economic systems.

These differences, all ingrained into the various racial stocks of Europe over a period of thousands of years are almost as immutable as the soil and the climate out of which they grow. To think that the economic systems of England, France, Germany, Spain, or the Scandinavian peoples can be changed over the week end by a decree from Moscow is to say the least a rather startling and improbable assumption.

My third premise is that the whole Communist system is built upon a series of untrue and unproven postulates, most of which must of necessity become apparent within a reasonable period of time, and which taken together will eventually bring about its own liquidation. These dishonest assumptions may be briefly summarized as follows:

1. The assumption that an authoritarian form of government can produce the world's goods without personal rewards or incentives, and can do the job as efficiently or as cheaply as unharassed human beings can do it for themselves. The idea has been tried out a thousand times under every possible clime and condition, and the invariable result has been failure. Soviet Russia today is the best possible proof of the falsity of that Communist assumption.

2. The second false assumption of the Soviets is that the people of western Europe and the two Americas are living under such desperate economic conditions and are in such poverty and despair, that they would gladly exchange their lot for the three square meals of communism. Now there is, of course, always a minor segment in any society—the failures, social misfits, and frustrates—who are willing to exchange their birthright for a mess of pottage. That has been true ever since the days of Cain and Abel. But it most surely does not apply to the great mass of society in western Europe and the Americas today.

3. The third false assumption of the Soviets is that the human species, i. e., the common man, will ever be persuaded that communism is the answer to all his religious needs, and therefore the churches can be closed, the priests dismissed, and all forms of religious worship abolished by a decree of the Soviet high priest—Mr. Stalin. That is such a basic fallacy that one would think that no man with common sense, not even a Russian, would believe it. And there is mounting evidence at hand that notwithstanding their alleged naïveté a great many of the common people in Russia do not believe it.

Nevertheless that sort of religious heresy is still a basic tenet in the Marxian philosophy. "Religion is the opiate of the people," declared Lenin. His reason for saying so was perfectly obvious. Lenin knew full well that the only way to get communism over to the Russian peasant was to sell it as a way of life, a philosophy of social living, in short as a religion. To do that he had to disparage and, if possible, destroy the existing religion of the peasants—belief in the teachings of Christ. That the Soviets have attempted to do ever since.

Of course, it cannot be done. One of the chief differences between Communist and Christian ideologies is that communism teaches the common man to think of himself as a cog in the machine of the state, while Christianity whispers to every man that he is a child of God. No materialist philosophy like communism can withstand that deadly parallel.

My fourth premise is that no form of government, regardless of its economic or sociological principles, can survive the test of time where its leaders have obtained power through a fabric of lies and false promises. We are just beginning to understand the power of the promises that men live by. Hitler was quick to perceive that, and his authoritarian power in Germany was built up not so much upon the strong-arm tactics of his storm troopers, as upon the glory and personal rewards held out to the younger German men and women through participation in his Hitler Jugend. The chief differences so far as I can see between the Hitler technique and that of Mr. Lenin was simply that Hitler built his movement upon the biggest lies he could invent and boasted of the fact, while Lenin left the latter up to the people to find out, if they could.

The point is that nothing enduring can be built upon such false promises as these. The Soviet system has been running now for about 30 years. Slowly the Russian peasant worker is waking up, learning the truth about himself and his Government. The last war helped that process along mightily. As soon as a sufficient number of Russians learn what has happened and what the truth is about their future prospects—then the break will come.

There are at least three ways to speed up that process:

1. By education of all peoples to think in terms of western democracy.

2. By propaganda on a world-wide scale.

3. Political and economic encouragement of oppressed peoples in all lands to set up democratic and representative governments.

But we cannot afford to provoke a war with Russia or any nation on ideological grounds. That in the best way to enable dictators to cry wolf and rekindle patriotism of their own people.

The truth is—you cannot fight ideas with bullets.

From what has been said above we can begin to build up the propositions to form the framework of our foreign policy, looking always toward world stability and peace. These are not stop-gap measures in any sense of the word. They recognize rather that peace and stability are long-range objectives, attainable only by recognizing facts as they are, and adapting our principles to objectives that are realistic and attainable.

1. First of all, we must recognize that the Russian people are here on earth to stay. We cannot exterminate them or compel them to return to the medieval hibernation they kept so long. For 200 years Great Britain as a world power maintained control and order over large segments of mankind. We have just witnessed its abdication as a world power, and we are beginning to see the disintegration of world order. Into the resulting political and economic vacuum some type of world power will naturally gravitate, since all races and peoples refuse to live without some sort of order and direction. At the present time it looks as if Russia and the United States are the only two world powers capable of such a task. Russia has and will move into certain areas, and doubtless we will want to control certain areas ourselves—for our own protection, of course.

The Russian people as such have certain legitimate objectives and aspirations. Some of them are defensive and some are purely nationalistic. We would do well to distinguish between the legitimate aspirations of the Russian people on the one hand, and the communistic intrigue and treachery of the Communist Internationale headed up by the Soviet leaders on the other hand. That Russia should be forever contained as an inland power without a single warm-water port to the west is outmoded diplomacy that we no longer can afford to maintain, even for the benefit of our ailing friend, Great Britain.

A policy of respect for the legitimate aspirations of the Russian people is justified on several grounds. In the first place, Russia is dominant and militarily impregnable in Eurasia just as we are dominant and militarily impregnable in the Americas. Either nation, in a conflict waged on its home continent, could fight the other to a stalemate. In the second place, another world war of such proportions would probably result in bankruptcy and economic prostration for us regardless of its outcome militarily. That would mean communism or state socialism in some form for us, i. e., loss of individual freedom, human rights, and individual initiative—everything we went to war for.

2. The second point is—our practice of opposing every Russian move in Europe, as imperialistic, and needling Russia's representatives on every occasion, is neither realistic nor necessary. We cannot pose as a holy virgin in our own diplomacy, past or present, nor in the conduct of our relations with other nations. Nor are we recognized, even by the western European countries, as a young Lochinvar riding out of the West. It is time we got off our high horse of self-righteousness, recognize our own vulnerability, and admit that our own foreign policies, like those of any great nation, seem imperialistic to other countries, even though we may think they are necessary to preserve our national self-interest. Our present policy of trying to keep Russia bottled up as an inland power with no warm-water ports opening to the Atlantic, is an imperialistic policy, viewed from any angle. To maintain that sort of policy simply antagonizes all classes of Russian people, even those opposed to the Soviets.

3. Third, the sending of munitions and military supplies to Greece, Turkey, and other countries for the avowed purpose of blocking Russian expansion is ineffectual either from the standpoint of positive results, or of good will. Russia is so situated strategically that she can offset such assistance with minimum effort on her part, acting, if necessary, through Communist minorities in those countries. Whether or not the people in a given country accept Communist rule or not is a political issue, and no people welcome outside interference in their political affairs. That is especially true where there is an organized inside opposition, deliberately misrepresenting our assistance in every way.

This is distinctly not to say that we should stop all our material assistance to European countries. We are in a position to and can well afford to still be generous and charitable in our economic assistance. But it should be done in that spirit and upon that basis; not as a matter of political warfare against a third power which does have its own national interests to consider, wholly aside from any question as to its social beliefs or its economic system. On the other hand, our economic resources are not boundless. There is a limit beyond which we dare not go in this flood of money, property, and natural resources of Europe, or we shall exhaust the very foundations of our own economic system. The Soviets would be delighted to see that happen.

There is a much better way of giving genuine aid and economic assistance to European nations. No one values charity as much as the fruit of one's own efforts. Instead of dumping charity into their laps we should be helping European countries to recover by more businesslike means. The way to get production and employment started in Germany, France, Italy, and so on, is for us to lend money directly to the people in those countries who have the knowledge, initiative and the capacity to build factories and start machines—not to the politicians to build up political machines. It could be done through a series of corporations, each responsible for its own commitments. Our loans could even be protected by mortgages or issues of preferred stock if that became necessary.

4. In the fourth place, we should reexamine our own nationalist objectives in a cold and critical light. Is it fair to say that we are allowing our eyes to rest too long on oil in the Near East? For years our Government discouraged American capital from investing in that area, because of the diplomatic angles. Then about 1938 our State Department suddenly reversed itself, and not only approved but encouraged United States investments in Near East oil. Now our Army and Navy are so interested in that oil and in Middle East bases that they practically dominate our foreign policy as to those areas.

I am not convinced that such a policy as to oil in the Near East is either sound or farsighted. In times of peace we can buy oil on world markets just as cheaply as we can produce it in the Near East. And in time of war the Near East supply line would be difficult to protect or maintain. From a strategic or military standpoint, therefore, Near East oil is impossibly located. Again, and from a military standpoint, we could far better afford to find new oil reserves in the Western Hemisphere, or even to subsidize a completely new synthetic fuels industry. The cost of a whole new industry would be only a fraction of the cost of a war with Russia, and it might eliminate the possibility of such a war.

Again, I'm not convinced that the obvious Army-Navy program for military bases in Africa and the Middle East is sound foreign policy for us. There is nothing defensive in any such program. On the contrary, it smacks of offensive tactics. Perhaps it can be supported from a military viewpoint, but from the standpoint of long-range, peaceful international relations there is little can be said to justify such a program—unless we are committed to a policy of world imperialism ourselves.

5. The assumption that the Communists constitute an internationalist organization having indestructible party solidarity and stability is wholly erroneous, and should not be made the basis of our political thinking. The truth is that the Communist Internationale is already badly split into numerous factions. The ideas and objectives of the Communist Party in France are, except from a purely theoretical false front of Marxisms, largely different from those of the Communist Party in Russia, and they are in violent opposition to the ideas and objectives of the Communist Party in Germany. Similar fundamental differences exist between the Communist parties in Hungary and Bulgaria. The same is true of the Communist parties in Italy and Yugoslavia. These differences are based in part upon racial animosities, nationalist persuasions, and the multitude of grievances that have antagonized these countries for centuries. They cannot be wiped out by a decree from Moscow. Poland, for one, will never become a Communist state as long as a single Russian has anything to say about it.

Russian Communists, even if they could overrun all Europe, would fail miserably in the task of organizing and operating it along Communist lines. Saddled with all Europe's political and economic problems the Soviets would soon find themselves the most hated and despised taskmasters since Attila the Hun. If there are any western European countries willing or determined to try communism, our anti-Soviet money and supplies will not deter them. You cannot buy off Communists at so much per head. I know of no quicker way for western Europe to become cured of its temporary Red leanings than for them to observe how communism works out in some western country, such as Czechoslovakia. It may take some time, but the result is an inevitable one. And in such a contest time would be on our side. Russia already has enough of Europe on her hands to wreck her economy in a few years. Stalin has already promised the impossible to the countries of eastern Europe. Russia cannot possibly deliver. No economy based on compulsory labor can feed, clothe, and implement Europe's peoples. Why not give Stalin and others a few years of rope and let them hang themselves? Meanwhile, we shall keep ourselves economically and militarily strong—and safe.

6. The most positive means we have of combating communism is with ideas. Communism is a false philosophy from top to bottom. It is based on double-talk and slick answers to troublesome and urgent social problems. We democracies do not know all the answers ourselves, but we are trying honestly to find them, and we have God and truth on our side. That is what counts most. "Truth prevails," was the symbol Thomas Masaryk constantly urged upon the Czech people.

Our weapon against communism is to turn the light of truth upon it. All of its false promises, deceptions, half truths, and Godless cynicism will stand out like criminal stripes. Our great difficulty thus far has been that we didn't know enough about communism to expose it. The Soviets deceived us, fooled us for years into thinking that the Russian people were living in a land of freedom, education, democracy, and opportunity. We now know of the millions there rotting in slave labor camps; that most of its people live without freedom and in terror for their very lives; that their schools grind out little but propaganda and misinformation, and that there is opportunity for no one but the party commissars.

Turn the light of truth then on communism in all its aspects. Spend our money on carrying this truth to every country on earth. Russia cannot remain bottled up much longer. The Russian people are eager to open up their resources for world trade. Whenever they do some of the truth will enter with every package and every returning merchant. We have no quarrel with the Russians as people—it is only their Communist philosophy that we must combat. And it is still true that the pen is mightier than the sword.

We can speed up that process by education, by propaganda on a world-wide basis, if necessary, and by encouraging oppressed peoples in all such countries to throw out dictators and police-ridden governments of all sorts. But we cannot afford to provoke or allow ourselves to go to war with such nations on ideological grounds. That would be the quickest way I know of to enable the dictator governments to cry "Wolf," and to rekindle patriotic fervor in their own people. The truth of the business is—you cannot fight communism with bullets. That lesson we might as well learn—now.

Senator C. Wayland Brooks, of Illinois, Praised for Service to American Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. WAYLAND BROOKS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 29), 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter I have received from my colleague the distinguished senior Senator from Vermont, Hon. GEORGE D. AIKEN, a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
July 6, 1948.

Hon. C. WAYLAND BROOKS,
United State Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CURLY: Now that the President has actually signed the long-range farm bill, I want to express to you my deep appreciation for the great service which you have rendered to American agriculture during the Eightieth Congress.

First, let me thank you for your recommendation of Dr. H. C. M. Case, director of agriculture economics at the University of Illinois, whom the Senate Committee on Agriculture was able to secure as our chief agricultural adviser. Dr. Case's advice was of great value to the committee and the legislation which we were able to enact with his assistance I believe will prove to be of inestimable value to American farmers.

Next, I want to congratulate you and thank you for the fine manner in which you, as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture, handled the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. The consideration which you gave to the needs of American agriculture and particularly to the rural electrification program, left little to be desired. As a matter of fact, it has been a long time since any Congress has given as much consideration to the welfare of the American farmer as the Eightieth Congress has done.

You have played a great part in this work and the understanding with which you have discharged your legislative duties as chairman of the Subcommittee on Agricultural Appropriations has contributed greatly to meeting the farmers' needs.

That is why I am taking this opportunity to express my appreciation for the service you have rendered to the American farmer.

Sincerely yours,

G. D. AIKEN,
United States Senator.

Natural-Gas Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me on the subject of natural-gas rates.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON NATURAL-GAS RATES

One of the important issues which faced the Eightieth Congress—one of many which were not resolved but merely postponed—was the subject of natural-gas rates.

In the first session of the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress, a bill known as the Rizley natural-gas bill was shoved through the House of Representatives in lightning speed. The RECORD shows that a great many of the Members had no real conception of the far-reaching significance and importance of this measure. However, all voices raised in questioning of the desirability of this legislation were promptly stilled, all amendments brushed aside, and the bill was passed and sent to the Senate.

When the bill was debated in the House on July 11, 1947, with only 1 hour allowed for a full and comprehensive discussion of a very complex and technical and vital matter such as the basic changes it proposed in the whole theory of Government regulation of the natural-gas industry, the country had recently passed through a rather serious shortage of fuels, particularly natural gas in those areas of the country where natural gas was a customary fuel.

The bill H. R. 4051 was represented as providing a solution to the shortage of natural gas the following winter, the one we have recently passed through. It was stated on the House floor with great emphasis that passage of this bill by the Congress would immediately let loose a new flood of natural gas for the pipe lines to carry to the Midwest and the far West and to the East. It was reported that gas was flaring to waste, gas which could immediately be shipped in interstate commerce if this bill were passed.

When we received the bill in the Senate and subjected it to close study in the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce we discovered that it was one of the worst pieces of legislative sleight of hand we had seen in a long time, designed to make a gift to a particular industry of millions and millions of dollars of the consumers' money. And it would not have increased the gas supply.

Thanks to the solidarity of the Democratic members of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce we not only blocked committee approval of the bill, thus keeping it from the Senate floor during the first session, but we also managed to expose to the bright light of public understanding some of the worst features of this bill as it passed the House.

There were frantic efforts made toward the end of the first session to amend out of the bill some of the most objectionable features in the hopes of getting through others, perhaps not quite as blatant but equally inflationary and unfair to the consumer. These efforts failed because of the solid opposition of the Democrats on the committee. One Republican member joined us.

When the second session of the Eightieth Congress started in January, renewed pressure was applied by the natural-gas industry and its friends in the Republican leadership to get a form of the Rizley bill through the Senate committee. New compromises were offered in succession after each was rejected. Some of these so-called compromise bills turned out to have features even worse than the original bill. All of them were anti-consumer and provided huge additional sources of profits to pipe-line companies already enjoying tremendously high rates of return on their investment.

One of these so-called compromise bills was referred to a subcommittee for hearings. The natural-gas industry, with plenty of funds at its disposal for the purpose, since millions and millions of dollars of additional profits were at stake, sent in its experts and lobbyists to tell us why this special interest legislation was necessary—and they said it with a straight face—in the public interest.

The consumers are not organized; they do not normally have the outstanding experts in this field at their service. However, the Institute of Municipal Law Officers, representing the city solicitors of the cities of America, through its president, Miss Anne X. Alpern, city solicitor of Pittsburgh, and through other representatives, including Jerome M. Joffee, of Kansas City, Mo., chairman of the committee on electrical and gas rates, provided excellent witnesses who knew the subject of natural gas thoroughly and the impact of this legislation on the rates of city consumers. Miss Alpern's hard-hitting testimony was particularly effective in unmasking the pretenses behind this legislation.

The solid opposition of the members of the Federal Power Commission to the House-passed Rizley bill, was a major factor in helping to defeat the bill in 1947. This year, however, the Commission divided over some of the aspects of the legislation and did not have a uniform position.

After the hearings were completed by the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Subcommittee, the two Republican members of the subcommittee issued a report endorsing the proposed legislation and urging its approval by the full committee. The lone Democratic member of the subcommittee, Senator STEWART, of Tennessee, issued a vigorous dissenting minority report. It is noteworthy that in the final show-down in the full committee, the Democratic viewpoint prevailed.

This was, as I noted, because all the Democrats on the full committee were united in opposition to this proposal to raise natural gas rates substantially for the mere sake of increasing already large natural-gas pipeline profits—profits in all cases at least as high as the level set by the Supreme Court as fair and reasonable. One of the Republican members of the full committee, Senator TOBEY, of New Hampshire, joined in our position throughout the 2-year dispute.

On the show-down vote, however, we picked up some additional Republican support. It is interesting to consider the publicly expressed reason of one Republican member of the full committee in deciding to vote against the measure.

He stated that although he favored much of the theory of the bill, he was convinced President Truman would veto it if it was enacted, and, he said, he did not want to give the Democrats such a good campaign issue in an election year.

And, of course, it would have been a good issue, for the people of the United States do not take kindly to bold attempts to enact legislation expressly designed to throw millions of consumer dollars into the hands of any utility, just for the fun of it.

The natural-gas proposals were described by many outstanding Washington reporters as constituting a "grab" for this utility. They would have given pipe-line companies the right immediately to raise substantially the prices they can charge for natural gas which they own in their own wells. As it passed the House, the bill would have enabled pipe-line companies to construct new lines in almost any direction free from any significant or effective Federal control. They could thus have invaded new markets without regard to any basic factors such as the availability of gas for older markets now dependent upon the fuel for essential manufacturing and heating uses; they could have charged what the traffic would bear for their gas, subject only to Interstate Commerce Commission (rather than Federal Power Commission) supervision over rates, and that supervision would have been restricted only to the actual transportation charges.

The House-passed bill would have dealt a death-blow to effective Federal supervision of the natural-gas industry as outlined in the historic Natural Gas Act of the late 1930's. It would have led to idiotic waste of a valuable natural resource.

Even the various bills considered in the Senate would have gone far toward destroying Federal Power Commission protection for consumers and admittedly would have raised consumer rates in such cities as Pittsburgh, Erie, and elsewhere in Pennsylvania; in Colorado; 151 communities in Kansas, including Kansas City, Topeka, and Wichita; scores in Oklahoma and Missouri and Tennessee, Mississippi, Nebraska, and other areas where natural gas is a customary fuel. The figures on these probable increases are astounding.

These increases would have been gifts to the natural-gas utilities. None of them is claiming property. None claims it is squeezed on revenues. They do say, however, that if some present governmental interferences—interferences to their gouging the consumer—are removed, they would be much happier.

We beat them in this Congress. But they will be back next year, I am certain, seeking once again to get their special-interest legislation through. The Democrats on the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, plus one Republican, provided the thin line of defense this term of Congress. A Senate with greater Republican strength would have passed this legislation, to the detriment of the people of America.

I started out by saying that the issue has not been resolved, that it has merely been postponed. It is an issue which will face the Eighty-first Congress.

My Journey to Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LEO ISACSON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ISACSON. Mr. Speaker, for more than 30 years, since my boyhood, I have looked forward to one day journeying to Palestine, where the people of my faith have for more than a half century been planning, building, and cultivating in anticipation of the establishment of an independent homeland in the country of their ancestors.

My decision to go at last—or rather my decision to try to go—was reached during my campaign for the congressional vacancy in the Twenty-fourth District, Bronx, last February.

In this campaign, a burning issue was the vacillation of our Government with respect to the United Nations partition decision, the imposition of the embargo against shipment of arms and the heartbreaking possibility that the Jewish homeland in Palestine, so long prayed for and so long promised, might be abandoned by our Government and the United Nations majority under pressure from the United States oil interests and other elements, including Arab nationalists and British imperialists.

As a Zionist since boyhood I felt a deep, personal anguish over the possibility of defection from the United Nations decisions.

In fact, this issue was the one which finally decided me on running for Congress, in order to make whatever fight I could in our Government to help establish and secure the long-planned Jewish state. During my campaign I pledged that I would seek to visit Palestine to observe the situation there at first hand and report back to my people.

My first few weeks in Congress found my full attention occupied with issues such as rent control, inflation, militarization, and civil liberties. However, my maiden speech in Congress was a plea for full implementation of the UN Palestine decision and an end to our arms embargo which has left the Jews of Palestine at the mercy of British armed and trained invading forces.

After some difficulties with our State Department which resented my outspoken criticisim of their betrayal of Israel, my passport was finally issued on April 23.

However, visas for Palestine were then in the hands of the British and they were unwilling to grant me one.

But the British mandate was to end on May 15. So I decided to wait until the proclamation of the new Jewish state, then already announced for that date, and obtain my visa from the new government.

This worked out to my ultimate advantage, since even if I had obtained the necessary visas earlier I would have been unwilling to leave the country for an extended period during April or May due to the urgency of matters coming up before Congress in its closing weeks prior to the national political conventions.

On May 30 I obtained my visa from Eliahu Epstein, the representative of the State of Israel in the United States, and made plans through the Amalgamated Bank's travel agency to fly to Israel via London, Rome, and Cyprus starting on Thursday, June 24, following the scheduled adjournment of Congress on June 19.

By this time my father, Hyman Isacson, had decided that he, too, as a lifelong advocate of a Jewish national homeland, would like to go along and see the new country. His passport was issued by the State Department with extraordinary speed; we got the necessary visas, took off late Thursday, June 24, on a Trans-World air liner for London.

LONDON—JUNE 25

We reached London at 8:30 p. m. Friday instead of the scheduled 3:15 p. m. landing time due to delays on both shores but were politely and efficiently cleared through customs and speeded, bag and baggage, to the Hotel Savoy. I got my first impressions of England and legendary London from a chugging taxi with an old-fashioned coach body and Victorian chauffeur to match.

Venturing into the Strand that night with street maps, we found most eating places closed but at last located a rather fancy establishment which also served drinks. There were no menus and we finally chose fried skate as against fried sole, the only two dishes available.

The place was crowded and so we were not surprised when the waiter seated a party of two men and a woman at our table. They had obviously had a few drinks. Soon we were in conversation.

They disliked America. "A lot of little people with big machines," they said. The woman added, "They don't think," tapping her head contemptuously, to emphasize her complaint. "When Roosevelt died a great man was lost."

They were contemptuous of Truman and cold about Dewey. They admitted disappointment in their own labor government although they had voted for it. In answer to my question they expressed the conviction that Britain should get out of Palestine but cautioned that there was no real appreciation of the complex problem that Britain had to face there. Here again they were critical of the United States for letting England hold the bag.

The next morning we went to the passport office where a Mr. Little, after many doubts, hesitations, and hints that someone in very high authority would have to act, finally O. K.'d our visas to Cyprus for a scheduled stop-over there on Monday, June 28.

MY MEETING WITH HAROLD LASKI

Before leaving the States I had sought an interview with Harold Laski during my London stop-over and we finally arranged to meet for tea at 4 p. m. Saturday.

Laski was addressing a meeting of the Fabian Society at Caxton Hall earlier that afternoon and I went there to pick him up.

Caxton Hall seemed very much like Webster Hall in Greenwich Village and the Fabian Society proved to be very much like a Wallace meeting. Eager delegates were convinced that Fabian "gradualism" was moving far too gradually and demanded more action.

I met Mrs. Laski, a small, friendly woman who prettily informed me that she had once given $10 to the Wallace movement.

Harold Laski seemed more mature than his pictures indicate and his scholarly dignity was impressive. We talked, largely off the record, about Israel, Britain, and the United States. He has, of course, a historian's grasp of American politics and trends. He knew of my election to Congress and informed me with a twinkle that he had warned Bronx Democratic leader Ed Flynn that I would win.

After we had spent a few moments discussing the general political picture I got down to specifics and asked Mr. Laski what he thought of our policy in Israel.

"Frankly," he replied, "I am convinced that American policy toward Israel seriously threatens to turn that newborn land into another Spain. Your Government's arms embargo has a sinister resemblance to the nonintervention policy in Spain.

"Your arms embargo," he continued, "is not only hypocritical but it is absolutely criminal. How in the name of common morality and decency can the United States refuse to send weapons of defense to Israel while the British continue to send instruments of death to the Arab aggressors? All the embargo has accomplished so far is to fill with Jews the few graves left empty by Hitler."

There was very little I could say to that, so I asked Mr. Laski what he thought of the Arab defiance of the United Nations. "After all," I told him, "there are a lot of American and British officials who are trying to create the feeling that if the Arabs are not appeased they will cut off oil shipments and make a lot of other trouble."

"That's pure rot," Mr. Laski replied. "One good squadron of bombers and a couple of dozen guns lend-leased to Israel would, by their very existence, put an immediate end to any thought of Arab defiance."

My father was curious to see a Jewish restaurant in London so we found Iskol's. We had lotkes and matsoths with our food but the portions were small and the quality poor. Again we shared our table, this time with a young Jewish couple. Their conversation was marked by the same lack of animation we found in other people in London, a resignation that reminded me of the 1930 days of depression in our own country.

The next morning, Sunday, we returned to the airport and took off again. This time the plane was smaller, the passengers fewer, seven in all, including ourselves. No pleasure tourists these. They were obviously on business, whether commercial or diplomatic, reserved and taciturn.

ROME—JUNE 27

We landed on the outskirts of Rome at 7 p. m., boarded a bus for our hotel and off we rattled, the driver honking his horn every 50 yards or so at couples walking arm in arm along the cobblestone highway. They seemed oblivious to the sputtering horn. In the last warm glow of the sun the road to Rome reminded me of one near Fallsburg in the Catskills where motorists are warned to look out for romantic vacation strollers.

The Hotel Flora where we stayed for the night was typically tourist—luxurious marble floors and pilasters, beautiful hard mahogany furniture, fine tapestries. But in the bathroom the invading ants apparently did not know the war was over, nor was there any soap for washing.

Dinner was surprisingly good, far better than any in England: Soup, steak, plenty of butter and sugar. I asked the waiter how this hotel obtained such food while millions of people in Italy were starving. He shrugged his shoulders and would simply say that food was not rationed. But we could see the bitterness in his face.

Later in the evening we walked down the Via Vittorio Venato. Shades of Fifth Avenue. Luxurious stores displaying elegant clothing, shoes, and other wares. Men and women dressed in the height of summer fashion were promenading or comfortably seated and drinking at little cafes which line the street.

We sat down at one of these and I ordered some ice cream, rather hesitantly, remembering the watery, unsweetened ices which passed for ice cream in England. The luxurious, whipped-cream-bedecked portion I received was more delicious than any spumoni or tortoni I had ever tasted.

NO ERP ICE CREAM FOR THE POOR

On the way back to the hotel I stopped to speak to some people on the street, some that were not quite as well dressed as the others. They told me that hidden from the eyes of tourists in transit, in little, narrow, dirty side streets were the poor and starving of Italy.

I wondered then, how could these people of the boulevards, fat-jowled and sleek, afford their luxuries?

How had they retained their money? How had they escaped the vigilance of the people?

Were they formerly Fascists?

Should not their wealth be conscripted if the people of America are asked to make sacrifices for European recovery?

Certainly the empty bellies of Italy must be given food. Anything less would be inhuman. But allowing these mustached, monocled, strutting men, with their peroxide companions, to escape the responsibility of sharing their plenty seems downright stupid or worse.

Our European recovery program comes from contributions by every American, even the poorest. Yet the moneyed class in Italy seems to have retained its wealth while the poor must depend on the gleanings of the ERP for survival.

On the way to the airport the next morning I saw huge chalked signs on buildings, obviously the remnants of the recent election, "Vote for the Popular Front." Small wonder. Here was the disparity between the great wealth and abject poverty which leads people to turn to socialism. It is true of Italy, as it is undoubtedly true of Greece and China. Pouring fabulous sums into countries which foster such economic extremes as persist side by side in Italy is like treating the symptoms of a disease and neglecting the cause.

CYPRUS—JUNE 28

Our plane left Italy Monday morning and we arrived at Nicosea, Cyprus, that afternoon. We were met by Abraham Silberberg and Rabbi Srazbaum—pronounced Schreibaum—representatives of the Jewish state of Israel. They told me that they had made arrangements with Sir Godfrey Collins, commissioner in charge of the internment camps, for me to inspect the two camps Karalos and Xylotymvou, in which 25,000 Jews, so-called illegal immigrants, had been herded.

THE BRITISH TRY TO BAR MY VISIT

When I met Commissioner Collins he expressed his regrets that I would not be able to see the camps inasmuch as they were having an inspection that day.

My guides informed me that never once previously in the history of the camps had there been an inspection. They were of the opinion that this inspection was a contrivance to prevent my visiting the camps.

I asked Sir Godfrey Collins how long the inspection would take and he told me it would take all day long, until sunset. I stated that I would be willing to visit the camps after sunset. He looked flustered and said that would be impossible since there was no electricity and the camps would be in complete darkness after sunset. I told him I would find my way around with a kerosene lamp.

Finally my persistence won out and a pass was granted for that evening. However, my father was denied a pass and could not accompany me.

Even after arriving at the camp I was still not permitted to enter but was forced to wait for 2 hours before I was allowed in.

Both camps are completely ringed by double barbed-wire fences, 12 feet high, running parallel with each other, 8 feet apart. Mounted on tall poles there are high-powered floodlights which sweep the camps and the surrounding country periodically in search of fugitives.

THE INSIDE STORY OF THE CYPRUS VICTIMS

When I was at length admitted inside the barbed-wire enclosure it was 10 o'clock at night.

Inside there was a delegation of six men to meet me, all bearing kerosene lamps. At their head was the mayor, a wiry, blue-eyed man of about 35 years, in shorts and wearing sandals which I learned later the internees make for themselves.

I greeted them with the traditional "Shalom," and their spokesman, after they had all returned the greeting, addressed me in halting English.

"I speak a very bad English," he said, "but I want to welcome you here on behalf of all of us. These men with me are the elected delegates of all the people in the camps."

He introduced them by name and nation of their origin. He himself was a Pole. In the group there was another Pole, two Germans, one Rumanian, and one Hungarian.

"We are all very happy you have come here," the spokesman continued. "When we learned you were coming we became very excited, because we want the people of America to know what is happening over here."

I asked him how they had learned that I was coming to visit the camp. He smiled.

"Even the British soldiers were talking about it," he said.

ENGLISH GIVES OUT; WE SPEAK IN YIDDISH

All this exchange was in English. Then I asked a question about the families of the delegates, in Yiddish.

They all burst out together, very excitedly, in Yiddish, "Oh, you can speak Yiddish! Wonderful! Now we can tell you what has happened to us here."

They all tried to talk at once, until finally the mayor intervened to put the conversation in order. Each one told me of the experiences of his people in reaching the very shores of Palestine, only to be turned back and interned on the rocky beaches of Cyprus to await "legal" entry by determination of the British.

Their stories were of the same pattern, no matter what their country of origin: First, victimization by the Hitlerites, families separated and some of them tortured and killed, concentration camps in the Axis countries (indicated in each case by the tell-tale serial number tattooed on their wrists); and then, at last, the long-awaited opportunity to seek a new life in the long-promised Jewish national homeland.

And now, their fate was internment on this bleak strand, with their promised land just beyond the horizon, scarcely a half dozen leagues away in distance, but cruelly beyond their reach while their lives waste away again, in concentration camps scarcely better than those they fled from in Europe.

I asked the mayor in Yiddish about conditions in the camps. He replied thus:

FREEDOM THEIR GREATEST NEED

"In a concentration camp there are no degrees of conditions. There are only bad conditions. There can be no good condition where there is no freedom."

I had brought with me a modest supply of small luxuries which I had been told the people in the camps would appreciate; such things as cigarettes, combs, and hard candy. They accepted these things with such heartfelt appreciation that I could not help but ask what other things they needed.

"After all," I told them, "You have many friends and well-wishers in the United States and if they knew what you needed they could send it to you."

Their reply was almost heartbreaking in its poignant simplicity. "The time is past for us to dwell on material things," they said. "Here we need only one thing—freedom."

As we talked, I told them of my difficulties in obtaining a pass to visit them and of the refusal of the British authorities to admit my father. I told them that my father had been born in Bacau, Rumania, a peasant village on the Bistristsa River, coming to America nearly 50 years ago. I told them of his desire, like theirs and mine, to stand on the soil of a free, independent Zion.

I DISCOVER AN OLD FAMILY ACQUANTANCE

One of them asked me to repeat the name of my father's village. When I did, he turned and ran towards one of the tents, shouting as he went: "Schloima, Schloima. Come here quickly. The American Congressman's father was a neighbor of yours in Rumania."

So Schloima and his family hastened over—a gaunt, weathered man in his sixties, about the same age as my father, there with his wife and his grown children. We spent a half-hour talking while he reached back among the threads of memory to recall my father, who had indeed spent his boyhood in the same village together with Schloima. What a reunion these two might have had, except for stiff-necked British regulation.

As we moved about the camps I was impressed again and again with the oneness of these people—Jews from many lands, speaking varying languages and reflecting varied customs and cultures, but welded together in the quest of a new life after the terrible experiences of the Nazi era which had left its mark on all of them, symbolized now by the concentration camp numbers seared into their flesh.

DIGNITY AND MORALE IN CAPTIVITY

They live in tents, two or three families crowded into one tent. Their food is worse than meager; water is most rigidly rationed, the people queueing up for their water supply with old oil tins and any container they are able to obtain.

I discovered that the kerosene lamps carried by the delegation escorting me through the camp were a very special luxury. This is their only means of light and is very scarce, so scarce that bedtime is usually very early in the camps.

They are given no clothing other than what they were wearing or carrying when they were interned. Hence, for people who have been in the camps for months on end, only a communal sharing of goods and handicrafts makes any sort of civilized life even posible.

And yet, despite all these difficulties, I found that they had established a mode of community life which was miraculous for its orderliness and dignity under the circumstances.

WHILE NAZIS ENJOY FREEDOM

Their hardships I had to observe for myself, for they were not anxious to speak of their material difficulties. They told me that they were not permitted to leave the camps, although there were several thousand German war prisoners on Cyprus who were allowed the complete freedom of the island. They had tried to set up a regular community life. They elected a mayor and a council and had established courts. They have their marriages and births. The thousandth child was born only the day before I arrived.

Among the internees there are barbers, carpenters, shoemakers, tailors, artists, doctors, dentists, and other professionals.

Jews who had lived in many nations under the varied laws of those nations were now making their own laws and living according to those laws. Despite all the privations they had established a working community. It was possible for them to do this because of their knowledge that they were so close to Israel and were fitting themselves for a new life in a country of their own.

MAY 15 BRINGS JOY, THEN GLOOM

On May 15, when the new state of Israel was announced their jubilation knew no bounds. For them that announcement was compensation for all their suffering and hardship. It meant an end to their exile. They started to cry as they told me of the joy of that day. Each of them tied together his few belongings and all of them hurried to the barbed wire entrance, ready to leave for the Promised Land. But day after day went by with no departures.

Then with the announcement of the truce it became apparent to them that they would be its first victims. All immigration from Cyprus was stopped, illegally, by Bernadotte and Collins, for even men and women under 18 and over 45 were not permitted to leave.

They demonstrated; they had a hunger strike. Several lost their sanity. A complete demoralization set in; that which Bevin could not accomplish in 2 years Bernadotte had done in 1 day. Proposals were made for a hunger strike until death but the council ruled otherwise for now they were no longer political orphans. They had a nation and bore a responsibility toward that nation. They told me of one tragic example of the strict interpretation of the Bernadotte edict. There were some 12 men in the hospital at Cyprus, dangerously ill. The Cyprus hospital had asked that they be shipped to a hospital at Tel Aviv. The Tel Aviv authorities had wired that they would welcome these sick but with the announcement of the truce they were not allowed to leave Cyprus. Four died.

BRITISH STILL HOLD 25,000 CAPTIVE

They gave me copies of an exchange of letters between Sir Godfrey Collins and Rabbi Srazbaum, the Jewish Agency representative in Cyprus, indicating that the British had originally agreed to the evacuation of women, children, ill persons, and those under 18 and over 45 "to whom objection could not reasonably be raised on the grounds that they are fighting personnel" (the quotation is from a letter signed by Commissioner Collins on June 4).

However, when on June 16 the Agency sought to evacuate people under this agreement, the British, without explanation, refused to permit any immigration of any kind into Palestine from Cyprus. At the time of my visit the British were still preventing evacuation of any of the people from the camps, although the Jewish representatives have ships at their disposal for this purpose.

I promised the people that I would discuss this situation with Foreign Minister Moshe Shertok when I got to Israel in the hope that the truce authorities might remedy it.

SECRET PHOTOS SHOW CYPRUS CONDITIONS

The people of the camps gave me dozens of photographs of conditions in the camps and the activities of the people—their festivals and communal affairs as well as their privations. They had taken these pictures with a home-made camera and the prints they gave me were tiny contact prints, not enlargements. However I promised them I would seek to make use of these photographs and our conversations to publicize conditions at Cyprus and the tremendous courage and resourcefulness of these oppressed people, building a new life for themselves under indescribable difficulties.

Time passed very rapidly during my visit and soon it was approaching 4 o'clock in the morning. Since my plane for Haifa was to leave at six, I had to take my leave. But before they permitted me to go they escorted me to one of the tents and there spread before me a repast of tea and bread with some homemade jelly.

Tears actually welled up in my eyes at this brave, wonderful show of traditional hospitality. Knowing by now the perilous scarcity of food in the camps and what a rarity such luxuries as jelly must be I tried to refuse. But they would have none of this; they pressed the food upon me and I could see that it was of real importance to them that their hospitality be accepted in the spirit in which it was offered.

So, together, we had our tea and bread and jelly and I can truthfully say that this was the most wonderful meal of my entire journey and the hospitality the most heartfelt I have ever encountered anywhere.

I left finally amid a great flurry of handshakes and embraces and got back to Nicosea to find my father anxiously awaiting me, with our baggage packed and an eye on his watch.

THE SHORES OF ISRAEL—JUNE 29

Our plane took off on schedule at 6 a. m., on June 29, for the short 125-mile flight to Haifa.

As our plane approached Haifa airport from the sea, one could see built into the hills the gleaming city of Haifa, its modern buildings nested into the hills in orderly tiers, the square-cut architecture of which gave the impression of functional simplicity. Between the airport and the city are stretches of green lawns and trees with which the desert land of Palestine has been reclaimed by the pioneering Jewish settlers.

Our plane landed and taxied to the administration building. When the plane door was opened, several of our passengers rushed down the steps and flung themselves on the ground, kissing the free soil of Israel.

My father and I sought cut the customs officer to see about clearing our luggage. When I identified myself, he greeted me cordially.

"We have been expecting you," he said. "We are very glad to see you here. All of us here in Israel know of the difficulties you have had in trying to make this journey. We are all very happy that you were finally able to get through."

The airport was ringed with Israeli armed cars. In the distance I could see abandoned oil tanks, buildings, and equipment of the British oil companies.

As soon as our baggage had been cleared through customs we were escorted to an official car provided by the director of immigration, and sped off along the coastal road from Haifa to Tel Aviv, where hotel accommodations had been arranged for us at the Hotel Tel Piot.

ISRAELIS HAIL BRITISH DEPARTURE

We were stopped every half mile by road blocks, first by the British and then, after the first mile or two, by Israeli guards. Armed trucks whizzed by us going the other way, carrying singing Israeli soldiers to Haifa. As they passed, they shouted, "Tomorrow the British leave."

Once our way was blocked by a group of Arabs crossing the road on horseback. They were carrying rifles.

Quite naturally I expected some fireworks but I was astonished to see our driver raise his arm in friendly greeting and the Arabs waved their rifles back at him in return.

The driver explained to us that these were friendly Palestinian Arabs, who have lived in peace and cooperation with the Jews for generations and who want continued peace and the right to live as citizens of the new state of Israel. As I was later to find out, thousands of Arabs throughout Israel are joined with the Israeli forces in defense of their country against invaders from the surrounding outside Arab world.

CHIEF RABBI A WALLACE MAN

When we arrived at the Hotel Tel Piot, we were greeted by the chief rabbi of Jerusalem, Rabbi Herzog, a scholarly, solemn-looking, bearded man of about 60. He shook hands warmly and smiled broadly as he welcomed us.

"Tell me, Congressman," his first words were, "how is my good friend Henry Wallace?"

I found the rabbi extremely well informed on political developments in the United States, particularly on the formation of the new party headed by Henry Wallace. He had met Wallace during the former Vice President's trip to Palestine last year.

From Rabbi Herzog, and later from dozens and dozens of others who asked me opening questions similar to his, I was to discover that Henry Wallace had indeed endeared himself to the peoples of Palestine during his visit there last year. He had talked soil with them, and crops, and had shown a real and expert understanding of the problems faced by the people of Palestine in making fertile the desert lands. Rabbi Herzog told me how, on one visit to a Kibbutz, or cooperative farm, Mr. Wallace had joined a group of farmers pulling a plow, setting his broad shoulders to the yoke and pulling with the sturdiest of them until the afternoon's work was done.

Rabbi Herzog asked me about conditions in the United States. As I discussed with him some recent developments in Congress and on the political fronts I soon found from his questions that he was quite well aware of political goings-on in our country. He asked me, for example, how many people in America believed that Dewey would institute a more positive policy of support for Israel if elected President than the betrayal of the present administration.

He asked me what the Jews in America were doing about the vacillating policies of both major parties toward Israel. I told him a great many of us were supporting the candidacy of Henry Wallace. He laughed knowingly and embraced me.

We had lunch together in the Hotel Tel Piot. By that time the Foreign Office was making calls advising other persons of my arrival and an appointment was made by Dr. Leo Cohen, one of the under secretaries at the Foreign Office, for me to meet with Foreign Minister Shertok the next day.

We could not go anywhere that evening because there was a black-out. Tel Aviv, like Haifa, and other cities, is completely blacked out every night. It is practically impossible to get about the city. So we stayed in the hotel and went to bed early that evening.

WARMLY GREETED BY MOSHE SHERTOK

At 11 o'clock next morning I kept my appointment with Foreign Minister Moshe Shertok.

He was expecting me and greeted me very warmly. He took me by the arm and said: "Come on, I will treat you to an Israeli lunch."

We lunched on a beautiful outdoor terrace, one side of which bordered on the Mediterranean. Shertok ordered for both of us. He ordered fish, explaining: "You know, we have very little meat in Israel. But when the war is over we expect to have everything again." It developed that there was no butter and no milk. But there was a very wide variety of fruit.

Over lunch I told him of my visit to the camps in Cyprus and showed him the letters entrusted to me by the people there. He agreed to make renewed representations to Bernadotte and Commissioner Collins to hasten the start of immigration from Cyprus to Israel.

Shertok congratulated me on my own election. He said that the news had been on the front pages of all the newspapers in Israel and he wanted to know whether it was true, as reported, that in a large part it was attributable to a resentment on the part of the people over the failure of Truman's administration to lift the embargo against Israel. I agreed that this certainly played a part in the election. However, I pointed out that the administration had also broken promises to the American people on housing, on curbing inflation, on antidiscrimination and segregation in the armed forces and that the betrayal of Israel at the insistence of the oil cartelists and monopolists was only one facet, albeit a very important facet, of the Government's policy of working hand in glove with monopoly to the detriment of all the people.

He nodded understandingly at this and then exchanged some views with me on American politics and Israel's future which we agreed were to remain off the record.

Shertok told me that all of Israel was open to me; that I could go where I wanted and see whatever I wished and that he would provide a car and a guide for me. He said: "I am very anxious that you see everything you want to see because it is important that the people in America know the truth of what is going on."

I spent the rest of that day familiarizing myself with Tel Aviv and talking to people everywhere. I found them all bitter about the Truman arms embargo and over the role played by the United States in bringing about the critical situation in Palestine.

ISRAEL'S DEFENDERS COME FROM MANY LANDS

The next day as I came out of the hotel a tall, sunburned young fellow in uniform, about 25, walked up to me and said: "Aren't you Leo Isacson?" I said "Yes" and he said "Then the boys were right! I am Elihu Ben Moshe. My father is Dr. Ben Moshe of New York City. Some of the boys said that they thought they recognized you walking in the street yesterday but they weren't sure. They were all excited and it would be a wonderful treat for all of them if we could hold a little get together of all the boys here from the States."

I said, "Sure, that would be swell," and told him that I was now staying at the Gat Rimon Hotel. I asked that he let me know the time and place of the get-together.

When I returned to my hotel there were some twenty-odd ex-GI's waiting for me and as soon as I walked in they trooped over, all excited, all anxious to talk over the latest news from home. I tried to answer all the questions, including the pennant chances of the Dodgers in the National League, as well as what good shows were on Broadway. Several of the boys I knew personally from their having worked in my campaign in the Bronx.

We made arrangements to get together that evening in one of the cafes on the boardwalk and that night a delegation of the boys called for me and took me down to the boardwalk, feeling our way because of the black-out.

When we reached the door of the cafe no light could be seen because the place was heavily curtained.

We opened the door and went in and there were about three to four hundred men in uniform. I was a little surprised and one of the boys who later acted as chairman, said, "Well we told all the Americans that you would come in and talk and the boys from England wanted to be included and so did the boys from Canada, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. We hoped you wouldn't mind." I was delighted, of course, and not a little flattered.

NO MERCENARIES, THESE

These were a most alert-looking, sincere, clean-cut group of boys, wiry, fit, and all browned from the desert sun—no mercenaries these, the pay is £2 per month, the equivalent of approximately $7 per month.

The chairman explained that these were boys that did not feel that World War II was over until Israel was finally free and became an actuality, a Jewish state.

I must have spoken for 2 hours. The room became very warm but no one fidgeted, no one walked out. As a matter of fact, when I got through they plied me with questions for two additional hours.

I discussed with them the role played by Aramco Corp. in forcing the betrayal of Israel; the sordid story of pipe-line diplomacy.

Their questions indicated not only an awareness of the facts in the discussion but as they stood up and spoke their minds it became evident that their offer of sacrifice of life itself, if necessary, amounted almost to personal atonement for the ignominious role of the British and American Governments in sacrificing Israel for the benefit of imperialists and oil profiteers.

THEY KNOW THE SCORE

They asked me some astute questions. One of them wanted to know how I felt about the United States giving credits to Israel. Then, when I replied that credits should be extended, he wanted to know whether that would not put Israel under the Marshall plan and whether that would not force Israel to become an economic colony of the United States.

I replied that since the state of Israel came to birth as a result of action by the United Nations it must, therefore, follow that the United Nations had a continuing responsibility to the infant state and that it should be through the United Nations, rather than through the unilateral bounty of any nation, whichever nation that might be, that credits and assistance and help should be forthcoming.

One of the boys replied alertly that regardless of where the money should come from it was significant to him to note that despite the fact that the United States had given money to China, Turkey, and Greece, there had not yet been an offer of moneys and credits to the new state of Israel.

Whereupon the fellow who had asked the first question jumped up and volunteered "Maybe that is because the United States knows that no amount of money could ever make Israel its economic colony."

The room echoed with applause.

Many questions showed a particular interest in the Wallace platform and campaign. Some jokingly asked whether I would like to have them return with me so that they could help me in my own campaign. One wanted to know why the Zionist organizations in America did not present Truman with an ultimatum that unless he lifted the embargo that they would actively campaign against him.

At the end the chairman said, "Well, how about a song for Congressman ISACSON," and they sang For He Is a Jolly Good Fellow. Then suddenly and much more solemnly they all burst into the strains of Hatikvoh. Then two or three of them said, "Come on outside and we will have something to eat and drink," and they took me to another cafe, where I was treated to the Israeli equivalent of a hamburger—a little envelope of dough sealed on three sides, into which the vendor scoops a mixture of a very little ground meat and a lot of peppers and tomatoes.

(P. S.—I still prefer hamburgers.)

LUNCH WITH HISTADRUTH—JULY 1

On July 1 the Histadruth, which is the labor organization of Israel, gave a luncheon in my honor and the entire executive board of the Histadruth attended.

The very first question they asked me was: "How does labor in the United States feel about Henry Wallace?" I said: "Well, you will have to tell me whether you mean the leadership or the rank and file of the trade unions." They all laughed because they could now anticipate my answer, that although the formal leadership in a great many important trade unions still oppose the candidacy of Henry Wallace, actually millions of the supporters of Mr. Wallace are to be found in the trade unions of America.

I was asked why that was so and I ventured the opinion that while some of the leadership of trade unions very often found it necessary to ask for favors from political administrations and were, therefore, just a little afraid of tying their political fortunes to a new party, the rank and file of American labor recognizes that neither the Democrats nor the Republicans are friends of organized labor; that the Republicans had been primarily responsible for the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law, helped by many Democrats, and that while President Truman had vetoed the Taft-Hartley law he had in fact demanded even more stringent antilabor measures in breaking the railroad and coal-mine strikes in 1946 and since.

THROUGH THE ENEMY ARAB LINES

Arrangements had been made for me to go to Jerusalem which meant going through the hostile Arab lines under a flag of truce.

At 6 a. m. on July 2 my father and I were escorted to a convoy arranged for by the United Nations Truce Commission. It was under the charge of Colonel Perry, formerly of the United States Army Air Corps and now a United Nations observer with the Truce Commission.

As we started to climb into the car assigned to us, a huge Negro hailed me, "Hello, Congressman ISACSON," he said. "How are you? You ought to know me. I'm George Hendricks. I used to be a cop in little old New York."

Then I remembered having read stories about George Hendricks, the New York City cop who was now assigned to the United Nations Truce Commission in Israel.

"What are you doing way out here in the desert?" I asked him.

"Well," he laughed, "things weren't hot enough for me back in Harlem."

We exchanged a few reminiscences and then our trip started.

In our car were Tom Van Dycke and his wife, Elizabeth Trask, now representing the St. Louis Post-Dispatch; Marvin Parris, photographer, whose camera work most Americans are familiar with through the film The Fighting Lady; and photographer Sam Rosenburg of the New York Star.

We made our way along the old road to Jerusalem, driving through hills dotted with abandoned Arab houses resembling pillboxes.

A WAIT IN THE SUN

Finally we reached Latrun, the scene of the bloodiest fighting in Palestine. We had reached the Arab lines and there behind the earthworks we saw the Arabs, their rifles pointed at us, waiting for word. We asked to see their commander. We were told to wait. We waited there in the hot sun for over 3 hours. During all this time we were forced to sit in our cars. To get out would have undoubtedly meant being shot.

Finally, in a column of dust, an American jeep roared down from one of the hills and out of his shiny new Willys stepped the top Arab legionnaire. He looked at my credentials and scowled, but after a few words with Colonel Perry, waved us on. Colonel Perry said goodbye and returned to Tel Aviv. We continued to Jerusalem driving slowly through the Arab-held territory, always carefully watched by Arab sentries from their positions in the hills surrounding us. After an hour we were back in Israel territory and our speed increased.

PALESTINE ARABS ARE FRIENDLY

We passed several Arab villages where friendly Palestinian Arabs were going about their daily work in their accustomed manner. We stopped and talked to some of them through our driver as interpreter. They wanted no war; they wished merely to remain in peace with their Jewish neighbors. And they went about their work bearing rifles, in case of attack by invading Arabs.

WE COME TO JERUSALEM

Finally we reached Jerusalem. It was thrilling to enter that hallowed city. It was even more thrilling to speak to the people. They told us of the siege. They had been left to a starvation diet of 800 calories. They were blasted for days by Arab big guns without being able to answer in kind for they had no guns or planes. Every day they would whisper words of encouragement: "Let's hold out; soon there will be American planes. Soon there will be American guns." But neither the planes nor guns ever arrived. The conditions were still bad. There was practically no water. Even in our hotel we were furnished with a pitcher of water which we would use for washing then the water would flow through the pipe into a pail and once again, be used to flush toilets.

PEACE ON EARTH, GOOD WILL TO MEN?

The city was badly damaged. Walls were pockmarked from shelling. Some buildings were reduced to rubble. Streets were gutted and many craters were still visible.

I went to the roof of a kibbutz outside Jerusalem, Ramath Rachel. I saw the Arabs on a hill only a few hundred yards away. I saw them looking at me. My field glasses roved and as I looked into the distance there was Bethlehem. I thought of "Peace on Earth and Good Will to All Men" and thought how ironic it was that on this very site British imperialism and American State Department connivance were sowing the seeds for world conflict and devastation.

A SNIPER MISSES ME

We slept in the Hotel Eden in Jerusalem. And next morning I visited the military outposts of the Israeli forces at the French Hospice of Notre Dame. This point was only 15 yards away from the Arab lines. The colonel, a former professor of zoology, warned me to make no noise because Arab sentries had killed two Jewish soldiers on the spot the day previous. Apparently I did not walk quietly enough for as I passed between the windows two shots went by. They missed.

"BURMA ROAD" BACK TO TEL AVIV

Finally we made our way back to our car and we were told that there would be no convoy back to Tel Aviv. We decided to make the trip anyway but to take the new road, Israel's "Burma Road," which had been built within the last few weeks while the battles were being waged in that territory. It took a complete day to make the trip back over this fantastic road.

There were spots where we had to get out of the car and push so that it could make the grade. We got back to Tel Aviv late that night.

I am no military expert but I feel certain that when the history of this war is written the building of the road from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem under the fire of Arab's guns will take its place alongside the feats of Stalingrad and Tobruk.

INDEPENDENCE DAY IN TEL AVIV

The next day was July 4. I was scheduled to broadcast that night over Station KOL, Israel. I spend some of the day preparing the text of my broadcast, which was to be translated into Hebrew.

At the Hotel Gat Rimon that afternoon I met Izler Solomon and his wife. Solomon was once the director of the Cleveland Philharmonic Orchestra. Now he is director of Israel's Philharmonic Orchestra. As we talked I found out—no longer to my surprise—that Mr. Solomon, like almost everybody I talked to in Israel, is an ardent Henry Wallace man. We found that we had many friends in common. He urged me to attend his concert that evening and told me that in honor of America's Independence Day he was playing a program of Gershwin and Aaron Copland music. I arranged to drop in for the second part of the concert after my broadcast.

The broadcast station was in a curiously dilapidated and out-of-the-way building. We had to go through a small side-street entrance in order to get in. It struck me as peculiar that so important a building as the Israeli radio station would be housed in such an out-of-the-way place. It was explained to me that this was the fourth or fifth location of the station, which had been illegal while the British were there. It had been the official Haganah underground, Kol Isroel. Even in this building there were peepholes from room to room and in general there was a secretiveness about the whole situation. The British had never been able to locate and silence the station during the whole period of its underground operation.

Here is the text of my radio address on the Fourth of July to the people of Israel:

Shalom.

I have seen the epic of Israel. In the few days I have been here I have felt the pulse beat of a nation fighting for freedom. In the glowing faces of countless young men and women I have sensed that love of country, that faith in its future, that daring and intelligence which have written across the bloodstained hills and valleys of the Holy Land the deathless story of Jewish victory, of Jewish will to live in peace and freedom.

Yesterday I was in Jerusalem. I went by the old road and returned by the new—Israel's "Burma Road"—which has already become a heroic legend. For me, visiting Jerusalem was an unforgettable experience. Not only because of the deep associations which this holiest of cities must have for every Jew, but because I saw what the British artillery of Abdullah could not kill or conquer: the spirit of Jerusalem's average citizens, their calm and resourcefulness under their terrible ordeal, their devotion to their city and their land. In that spirit and in the spirit of the soldiers with whom I spoke, I sensed Jerusalem's coming liberation.

As a Jew, I am filled with pride at what my people have achieved in the building and the defense of their ancient homeland. But as a Jew, as an American, as a human being, I am pained and outraged at the heavy sacrifices forced upon this country by those for whom oil is more sacred than human blood and empire dearer than all mankind.

Today is July the Fourth, the anniversary of the American Declaration of Independence. We Americans, too, were once a small nation forced to fight for our independence against a mighty power. Then, as today, Britain was the enemy. Then, as today, the soldiers of freedom fought with meager arms. And just as King George sent Hessian hirelings against the American patriots of 1776, so King Ernest today sends Arab mercenaries against the Jewish patriots of 1948.

But Britain's is not the only hand at work in this country. There are men in my own country, too, men of power and influence in the government and in industry who also have their own axes to grind and they are trying to grind them on the flesh of the Jewish people and the Arab peoples as well.

The present arms embargo in force against Israel has nothing in common with the ideals of the Declaration of Independence. It is a betrayal not only of the Jewish people and of the United Nations but of the best interests of the American people as well. That is why so many millions of Americans, non-Jews as well as Jews, are demanding the lifting of the arms embargo, de jure recognition of Israel, and a return to the United Nations decision of last November 29.

In my opinion, the forces working against Israel are seeking to prevent a Jewish victory and to prolong negotiations until after the American elections. At that time they are hoping to force on Israel a settlement which will restrict its territory and cripple its sovereignty.

In a few days I shall return to the United States. I pledge you that I shall devote my energies to arousing the American public to an awareness of the real facts of the situation in this country.

In my own name and in the name of the party of Henry Wallace, of which I have the honor of being a member, I pledge you that we shall not rest in the fight to bring help to your cause, which is the cause of all who want peace, justice, and freedom.

Before I conclude, I want to take this opportunity of paying tribute to a great American and a great Jew, Col. David Michael Marcus, who in the spirit of Lafayette and Kosciusko, came here to help your struggle and gave his life that Israel might live.

To all of you in Israel, I say:

Carry on. Victory will come.

After the broadcast I was hustled in a cab to the Philharmonic. The concert was in a very beautiful theater and I arrived just at the intermission time. I found that I had missed the Gershwin, but was just in time to join the intermission crowd who were taking ice cream in the lobby in the best Lewisohn Stadium manner. The Aaron Copland music was especially well received.

After the concert a group of us, including Mr. and Mrs. Solomon, went to the home of the Labor Minister. We sat on his terrace and had some cooling drinks. I had a long discussion with him on the functioning of the Histadruth and the unique position it occupies by virtue of the fact that it not only represents labor in the tradition of the American labor unions but also owns some of the factories.

The Minister explained that unlike America where the treasury of the trade unions would be banked, or otherwise invested, in Israel the objective of the Histadruth was to help build more industries, to help plant more forests, to help create a self-sufficient economy. It was for that reason, he explained, that the Histadruth purchased factories or constructed new factories in an effort to add to the productive capacities of Israel so that it might not be dependent upon foreign imports.

KIBBUTZIM: ISRAEL'S COOPERATIVE VILLAGES

The next day, July 5, I had set aside for a tour of some of the Kibbutzim in the area of Tel Aviv and Haifa. I had been told that unless one sees the Kibbutzim, one has not really seen Israel.

Our guide was Leonard Feitelberg, an Israeli journalist and veteran of the Haganah. He was originally from South Africa and he confided to me that he was now trying to choose a Hebrew name, preferably one not too long.

We left Tel Aviv by the coastal highway up the Plain of Sharon through groves of oranges. At Barbaruta we passed a village of Arab huts, charred and ruined. Here a colony of friendly Arabs, who wanted to live in peace and friendliness with their Jewish neighbors, had been burned out of their homes by the invading Arabs before the area was liberated by the Israeli forces. The people are now being given new homes by the Israeli Government.

MALARIAL SWAMP NOW YIELDS CROPS

Barbaruta itself is built on what was once a malarial marsh, so malignant that it was once the impenetrable hiding place of criminals. The police refused to follow them into the marshes. Today that portion of the country has been reclaimed by the Jews, and many crops were growing there as I passed.

Our first stop was Meier (for Rothchild) Sheifaya (Arab word meaning health, for ancient well there). Here Junior Hadassah operates a children's agricultural school. Structures are built on a hilltop, the last outcroppings of the Carmel Range overlooking the beginning of the Hills of Ephraim. Five hundred youngsters are cared for here. Sabra—derived from the word "cactus" and meaning native-born Palestinian—as well as immigrants are among the charges. Some 65 teachers prepare these children for life on the kibbutzim, where they go at the age of 17.

In the school they are taught all crafts and actually supply the school with everything from home-made bread to hand-crafted furniture.

A SINGING PEOPLE

Two lovely orphaned Sabra girls played the mandolin and guitar for us. I asked the name of the song and one of them told me it was called Mother, Mother, You Are Lovely.

NAMED FOR SUPREME COURT JUSTICE BRANDEIS

We went on to Ein Hashofet (Well of the Judge) in memory of Louis Brandeis. This was our first kibbutz. We were greeted by Joseph Wilfand, a writer and editor of the colony literary magazine. He spoke proudly about the kibbutz.

There were 1,350 acres, all owned by the Jewish National Fund; 250 acres were devoted to a pine-tree foundation of over 250,000 trees. The colony was electrified and we inspected the Diesel-driven generator and then very proudly he showed us a huge pile of rocks under which an accessory generator was hidden and protected against Arab bombing.

He told us the nearest Arabs were over 3 miles away but the harvesters were still being sniped at. He was very anxious to tell us more about the kibbutz.

He showed us a 100-ton cold-storage plant, a 170-ton grain elevator, 120 cattle which he said yielded 4,000 liters of milk annually, while the Arab average was only 1,000 liters annually. There were 3,000 chickens and the crops included wheat for bread, barley for fowl, grapes, beets, cabbage, cauliflower, potatoes. We inspected four structures and two self-propelled combines. There were also mules, horses, and donkeys in use.

Eighty families live in this kibbutz, 450 people in all, of whom 205 were adults.

There were two training schools, one for children up to 14 years and the other for the older boys and girls.

We saw the carob trees, which produced a cattle fodder looking like string beans, and the eucalyptus which the Arabs call the Jew trees because of their use by the Jews in reclaiming the soil.

After the tour, we sat down to a wonderful home-cooked meal—soup and goose from their electrified kitchen.

Soon we were off for Mishmar Haemek, another kibbutz 5 miles away.

CHILD HEROES OF MISHMAR HAEMEK

Mishmar Haemek means Watch on the Emek. It is 11 miles from Haifa and 10 miles south of Nazareth, which can be seen from Mount Tabor. A very lovely, slightly built woman who had been in the colony since she was seven, took us around.

She told us of a battle early in the Arab invasion. The main attack had begun on April 4 at 5 p. m. with heavy shelling. The siege of Mishmar Haemek lasted 9 days, during which the kibbutz was shelled continuously. When it seemed that the kibbutz must fall, 280 children under 14 years of age were evacuated to a nearby village.

That same night, just before sunrise, the children returned to Mishmar Haemek. They had made the long march during the night on foot; they would not leave their parents; they were determined to fight side by side with them and to die, if necessary.

Four thousand Arabs surrounded this kibbutz. The only armaments the defenders had were 60 rifles. But every night the soldiers of the Palmach, the original Palestine partisans, would attack the surrounding Arab forces, who had no stomach for night fighting.

On the fourth day of the siege the British offered to evacuate the colonists with their possessions but the Jews refused. They knew that if they evacuated Mishmar Haemek the road would be open to the Arabs to Ain Hashofet and to all the other Jewish settlements.

Finally, reinforcements from the Haganah arrived and put the Arabs to rout back of Lajun, 4 miles down the road. The entire Arab offensive was cracked at this point by only a few hundred heroic Jews.

HAIFA: ISRAEL'S INDUSTRIAL CENTER

That night, following our tour of the Kibutzim, we slept in Haifa, which I had seen from the air as we arrived on June 29 but had not yet visited. The next morning, July 6, we spent inspecting this important modern city in its beautiful setting in the hills.

I was particularly interested in the Shemin industry, largest olive oil and soap producers in the Middle East; and in the Vulcan foundries, which now produce arms for the Israeli forces. The Shemin works had been cut off by the Arabs for several days a few months earlier and 7 of its 500 workmen were killed.

The managing director of the Shemin works, Uriel Friedland, was a mechanical engineer with the company since 1928. The plant had been founded in 1906 by Russian Jews and had failed. It was reestablished in 1920. During World War I the Turks took the boilers out of the old factory to Damascus, where they used them for steam baths. The plant is now owned 50 percent by the Histadruth and 50 percent by private capital. Each has two men on the board of directors and three technical advisers.

After this we visited the Vulcan foundry, which is the largest foundry north of Egypt. It began 14 years ago to make bathtubs, but now does all foundry work. I asked a lot of questions about conditions. The foundry works 6 days weekly, 1½ shifts of 8½ hours; mechanical shop the same with 11-hour shifts. There is a 48-hour basic workweek. Pay is $2 a day plus $51 for cost of living, overtime, and bonus. The factory pays 23 percent of its pay roll on bonuses. The theoretical maximum bonus possible is 25 percent. It is estimated that social-service payments create an additional 38 percent of the total pay roll.

Severance pay is 1 month per year of employment for salaried people, 2 weeks per year for day-rate men. There is a probationary period of 3 months after hiring through Histadruth, then nobody can be dismissed without approval of union. Two worker spokesmen said they never had any trouble. They have 9 paid holidays, vacations of 8 days paid the first year, with top of 18 days after that. Half of the vacation expense is paid for by the factory, which also pays three-fourths of workers' bus fares. Sick pay accumulates at the rate of 1 month's credit per year of employment to a top of 6 months.

This plant was founded in 1934 by Alex Kremener, big German foundryman. It was bought in 1941 by the Palestine Corp.—English Jews—and then sold to Solel Boney, who kept all the staff, including the directors. Isaac Kamenka is the technical director we talked to.

ARMS FROM EAST IF EMBARGO IS NOT LIFTED?

While in Haifa I talked to an Israeli industrialist, who would be classified as a rightist in any differentiation between right and left political leanings. I asked him about the fate of Israel if the American arms embargo were not lifted.

He was very solemn and very frank in his reply. He said that Israel's own arms industry is embryonic and unable to compete in production or in the field of battle against British and American arms and matériel being used against Israel by the Arab forces.

"We have scrupulously avoided taking a position in world politics which would seem to identify us with either side in the split between the eastern and western nations," he said. "But our situation here is desperate. The security of our new nation is our supreme concern. If matters reach the point where the fate of our nation is at stake and the American arms embargo still exists against us, we shall turn to the east for arms. We shall preserve our country, regardless of where we may have to turn for the means to do it."

ACRE, THE SEAPORT NAPOLEON COULD NOT CONQUER, NOW IN ISRAELI HANDS

From Haifa we paid a visit to the ancient Arab seaport of Acre, now in the hands of the Israeli. On the way to Acre we passed the partition border at Ein Hamifranz, Well of the Bay, where a bridge blown up over Naaman River was being repaired. Bearded religious Sabra with rifles patrolled the trucks to prevent looting.

At Acre there had been 12,000 inhabitants and several thousand refugees. They left during the battle, by boat and road northward to Lebanon about 20 miles away, all this later captured by the Jews. There were 50 killed and wounded among the Jews in a 48-hour battle commanded by Moshe Zilitzki, who had been imprisoned in the ancient fortress of Acre for 2 years. On our way back we passed Napoleon's Hill, his base during his long, unsuccessful seige of the city in the last century. Wash fluttered from windows where about 500 Arabs still live.

JUSTICE FOR THE ARABS

Back in Haifa we saw Rehavem Zabludavsky commanding an Arab zone where 3,500 remain of a population of about 40,000, who left during the fighting of April 21. The decisive point eastward was the bridge of Wadi Rushmia. We visited Saifa Souq, a market place with tall mosque-towers, where the Jews were commandeering the goods of Arabs who fled. As much as possible was saved, sent to the army, stored, or sold. Strict accounting methods prevail since eventually Israel will have to pay the owners or balance the losses against Jewish losses in the war. The Arab population is now concentrated in Wadi Misnus. They have been authorized to open newspapers and schools. They will have an Arab police force.

TEL AVIV—AND HOMEWARD BOUND

By the time we were ready to return to Tel Aviv the coastal road had again become the scene of shooting. The truce was still on, but it was expected to end the next day. Sniping was already going on. We were intercepted by Israeli sentries and detoured inland, away from the area of the sniping, although actually closer to the Arab lines. We arrived back in Tel Aviv without incident, however.

In Tel Aviv on July 7, the Wednesday before the scheduled expiration of the truce on Friday, July 9, I had conferences with several officials of the Israeli Government. They were concerned about my safety if the truce should end while I was in Israel. They expressed the frank hope that I would leave for the United States while planes were still flying from Haifa so that I would be able to tell the American people of what I saw.

Passage was arranged for us to leave that day by air.

PARIS, JULY 8

We had a little difficulty taking off in Haifa because the runway is very short. It is just an emergency runway. We did not even have a steward on board but we finally made it and landed in Cyprus where a steward was waiting. We picked him up and after stops at Athens and Bari, Italy, we landed in Paris.

The plane was 6 hours late getting into Paris. We arrived there at 1 a. m. We got out of the plane very weary and stiff and expecting anything but a reception. Suddenly I heard a shout: "There he is."

I turned around and there was a group of about 12 Parisians, all wearing Wallace buttons. It is pretty hard to describe the feeling of warmth and appreciation I felt after having traveled hundreds and hundreds of miles, tired and weary, to alight in a strange country and find such an expression of welcome.

The greeters were members of the French Assembly representing Pierre Cot's Democratic Party.

I asked, "Where did you ever get Wallace buttons in Paris?"

It turned out that New York City Councilman Eugene Connolly had distributed them last April when he came to Paris to attend the Greek Aid Conference for which I had been denied a passport.

The welcoming group took us to an early morning supper and found us lodgings.

Paris was hospitable and delightful. But I was anxious to return home.

The next day, after a speedy flight on a TWA DC-6 I was back in the Bronx.

These are some of the conclusions I have arrived at as a result of my journey to Israel:

I am convinced the Jewish people will emerge victorious in their heroic defense of Israel. Despite the David-Goliath inequality of numbers and equipment, the quality of the fighting forces of Israel has never been surpassed. They are preparing to stand up to the very last man if necessary, for they are fighting for the soil they love. The Arab troops, on the other hand, being tools of British imperialism, have no fighting will of their own. Boys who have met them in combat have told me this is true of all of them, including the troops of the Transjordan Arab Legion, on whom the English have lavished so much money and years of thorough training.

But whether the Jewish victory, which I am convinced will come, must be gained only at the sacrifice of thousands of lives, of Israel's finest young men and women, at the cost of the destruction of homes, hospitals, schools, and other beautiful buildings that have transfigured this once desert land, depends largely upon the United States.

It is my judgment that Britain is now beginning to vacillate. Her hopes for a quick victory did not materialize. What the Arabs did not achieve by military means, Britain and the United States will now pursue by political means. The truce, with its arms embargo and restrictions on immigration, is intended to provide time and opportunity for this political offensive against the Jews.

The United States and Great Britain will seek to extend the truce in order to gain time. The Truman administration does not want to commit itself to an open anti-Jewish policy, at least not until after election day. I am convinced that President Truman's intention is to prevent anything decisive from happening in Palestine until the next session of the UN and then attempt to gain popularity with the Jews by proposing to admit the state of Israel to the UN. Then, after the elections are over, there would commence more open efforts to establish an Anglo-American condominium here. This would involve the following:

First. Restriction of Israeli territory. The Negeb would be kept as a military base of the British. Jerusalem would be assigned to Abdullah as capital of his enlarged state. Haifa would become a joint affair of Israel and Transjordan.

Second. Restraint of Israeli sovereignty in various directions, but primarily in the domain of immigration. This is being now done under the pretense of truce requirements, and it is intended to extend this foreign control for months and perhaps years.

Third. The state of Israel will be forced into dependence on Abdullah's state, that is, once more on the British Empire, through a sort of federation that would place it in the position of a Luxemburg, or through a political, economic, and military alliance with Abdullah.

All this can be attempted after the election because the United States embargo against the shipment of arms to Israel, while Britain continues to supply the Arab states, will have placed Israel in a precarious position. It will be far more difficult to prevail upon the United States to lift the embargo after election day when it is far less sensitive to public opinion than now.

It is my purpose to bring to the attention of the American public in advance of the elections the real aims of American and British policy. I believe that this policy to date represents not only a betrayal of Israel, but a betrayal of America, of the interests and ideals of the overwhelming majority of the American people. It serves only the Wall Street bankers and oil monopolists and their British counterparts.

The Government of Israel of course must be extremely cautious on the question of ending or prolonging the truce. They did not start this war and do not want to assume the responsibility for its renewal.

But it is the responsibility of American citizens to call upon the United States to lift its unilateral arms embargo at once so that at the end of the truce Israel will be able to procure arms. It is also the responsibility of American citizens to see to it that their Government grants immediate de jure recognition to the state of Israel.

To that end I shall continue to fight.

He That Filches From Me My Good Name Makes Me Poor Indeed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, in an effort to divert public attention from the humiliating failure of the special session to take a single decisive step toward meeting any critical problem now facing the United States of America, the Machiavellis who direct Republican policy and public relations have unloosed on us another two-ring circus of defamation and loose charges.

For such few facts as have been brought forth in this circus atmosphere of klieg lights, cameras, recording devices, and blazing headlines, the public may feel vaguely grateful; but that gratitude cannot make up for the queasiness with which it sees loose charges bandied about, loyal Americans cheaply branded by an acknowledged psychotic, and an opportunity for adequate answers by the accused postponed to some misty future—after the elections, no doubt.

In Othello, 400 years ago, William Shakespeare presented us with a summation of the value of character in immortal words which I should like to bring to the attention of the Republican tacticians. He wrote:

Good name in man and woman, dear my lord,
Is the immediate jewel of their souls:
Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him
And makes me poor indeed.

"WHICH NOT ENRICHES HIM"

There can be no greater tragedy than that which falls upon the pilloried victim of these sensational charges if the person named is, as usually happened, innocent of any statutory violation or even of indiscretion or misdirection; but the ardent assassin of character might well take to heart the Shakespearean admonition that "he who filches from me my good name robs me of that which not enriches him."

Except for transient notority and the acquisition of a smoldering resentment in the hearts of all fair-minded people, it is difficult to see what can be gained from these sensational and imprudent hearings. Perhaps an election can be won; but at what cost, Mr. Speaker, at what cost.

While I am quoting, let me quote the preface to chapter III of The Turning Stream, a newly published volume by Duncan Aikman, a sharp observer of the American scene. Aikman writes:

In a time when our 500-year-old revolution was younger and moving more slowly, a liberating inheritance was laid up for the USA people. * * * They added to it; at some points they improved upon it. And refashioned it for a new people's use in their own way.

So when the USA people's first intellectual climax came with the 1776 Declaration of Independence, this basic capital in their intellectual bank was virtually intact, and peculiarly theirs.

Rights of free private judgment and expression were a part of the heritage. So was the idea, however imperfectly realized, of the equality of individuals in opportunity and before the law. So was the principle of the greatest possible freedom of economic action—though today the complexities of power-age economy appear to be narrowing it.

If an American dynamic is required for ordeals by still greater and more revolutionary changes than have been faced in the past, the basic inheritance can be drawn upon to provide it.

DISSIPATING OUR INHERITANCE

There is genuine danger, Mr. Speaker, that the damage which is being done by this witch hunt will go far beyond the tragedies of individuals—that these scatter-gun blasts will shake our American liberties to their foundations, that our precious heritage of freedom will be dissipated and our national character bankrupted.

I have quoted from two authors, one of them the greatest genius of the English language, the other a recognized authority in political and economic philosophy.

I turn now to more current and typical comment, an editorial from the New York Post of August 6:

MORE EFFICIENT THAN MURDER

Congress is currently proving that there is room within present legislative practices to assassinate a man without once flinging an angry hand in his direction. There's no blood. Just the remnants of a smeared character to kick around in wash-room gossip.

It's simple: you summon a few people into a klieg-lighted chamber and let them talk unchecked, stringing together names and dim events with strident tones of accusation.

Sometimes you let the accused stand under the klieg lights to shadow-box the vague and damaging charges brought against his name. Often, you don't. It's as ugly as murder and twice as efficient.

And it could destroy more than the reputations of its hard-luck victims. It threatens every man's democratic right to be considered innocent until incontestable evidence has proved him guilty.

The present congressional investigations into the nebulous activities of an underground, above ground, or perhaps stratospheric Communist spy ring will probably produce only one conviction—a conviction on the part of the voters that Congress had better set up fair and democratic rules to govern the conduct of its investigating committees.

The courts have always been wary of imposing judicial restraints on congressional investigations. They reason that the legislative branch of the Government should exercise its own discretion in unearthing facts which might otherwise never be revealed because they violated no existing law, but rather indicated the necessity for legislative reform.

The over-all record of congressional investigations probably illustrates the soundness of the courts' contention. The Pujo committee's probe into the so-called money trust in 1912 brought to light unpalatable conditions which were corrected in the Federal Reserve Act of 1913.

More recently, Senate investigators, with the help of Ferdinand Pecora, came through with disclosures which inspired three of the New Deal's most far-reaching reforms—the securities law, the law creating the Securities and Exchange Commission and the holding company act.

But, conceivably, neither of these investigations would have been hampered by the existence of rigid congressional rules, devised to protect the name of any man against conscienceless slander.

And, certainly, the grim farce being conducted in Washington today demonstrates that the absence of any such rules makes it possible for some Congressmen to abuse their legislative privileges to a point where democracy becomes self-defeating.

Before the work of all congressional investigating committees, good or bad, is discredited by a public thoroughly disgusted with the witch-hunting antics of the House Un-American group, Congress should adopt the model fair procedures bill supported by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The bill would accord persons who had been attacked in a congressional hearing the right to appear (with four witnesses) before the committee and to conduct a 1-hour cross-examination of any accuser.

It would permit congressional witnesses the aid and advice of counsel and would further protect them from being forced to make self-incriminating statements. Each witness' account would become part of the public record.

These are simple democratic guaranties which Congress should be only too willing to include among its rules.

But if our legislators show no signs of outlawing character assassination in Congress, the people should amend their Constitution until it provides them with full protection against further congressional misuse of its investigatory power.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, in honor of an eminent journalist, William P. Kennedy, who has passed in the Nation's Capital a lifetime of service as a highly constructive and just critic of government and men, in his career as a columnist of the Washington Star and correspondent of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican and Daily News, James Patrick McGovern, of the District of Columbia bar and special Washington representative of the Arizona Daily Sun, has written some lines as a tribute to the distinction of character of that veteran newspaperman, which, like that of his long, talented, and honorable labors as a writer, now marks his serene retirement in a rustic setting. I now submit the verse for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

LOVED HOME

Blessed is he whose home can foster deep
Affection for the beauties of the earth;
Such charm transfigures life and makes dreams keep
A magic faith with fancies from our birth
And mystic childhood. Thus the day's dull noon
And even sunset's darkening to night,
By which we with infinity commune,
Have halo, afterglow, prismatic light.
What peace, what lure, what philosophic mood,
Unknown in all the bustling, strident town,
With its contention, glitter, vogue, and frown,
May dwell amid a landscape's solitude.
More lustrous than the diamond from the mine
Are the heart's beams which from a loved home shine.

West Virginia Labor's League for Political Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit an article by Calvert L. Estill, staff writer in the Charleston office of the Wheeling Intelligencer.

This statement is an analysis of a pamphlet issued by the West Virginia Labor's League for Political Education. It is noted that out of approximately 540 roll-call votes in the Seventy-eighth, Seventy-ninth, and Eightieth Congresses, the league sees fit to present only 12 votes in presenting the Ellis voting record. It is reasonable to assume that the 528 votes not listed in the pamphlet were considered as favorable.

The statement follows:

HUBERT ELLIS AND LABOR

CHARLESTON, August 4.—Both plain deceit and lack of candor have been used by certain labor officials in an effort to bolster the political campaigns of some of their hand-picked New Deal candidates for Congress, and disparage the campaigns of opposing Republicans.

For the New Dealers, the labor leaders picked measures on which the candidates had voted "favorably" in previous congressional sessions. For the Republicans, they picked measures on which the brass and braid say the GOP candidates voted "unfavorably" in past sessions. There is no indication that the rank and file have ever had a chance to express their opinion of the candidates. They are supposed to take what the bosses tell them and like it.

In a pamphlet in which the voting records of the candidates are supposed to be given so that the workingman can tell friend from foe, M. M. Neely, Democratic senatorial nominee, is judged on votes he cast in the Seventy-ninth Congress. HUBERT ELLIS, Republican nominee in the Fourth District, is judged on a different set of votes, though he, too, served in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

IGNORED THE RECORD

This pamphlet presumes to educate union members about candidates who are running this year, yet it ignores all parts of the official record which cannot be recited in support of what the brass hats have decided. They seem to believe that the wage earners in the union cannot be trusted with the whole truth about the candidates and so be in position to make up their own minds intelligently.

Voting records of their chosen favorites have been grossly padded. On one single measure, Neely is given four favorable votes, each at a different stage of the legislation, but all indicating exactly the same attitude toward that legislation. On another such business he got two favorable reports; and on two other bills he got three favorable votes each. These alleged 12 favorable votes were actually just four favorable votes so far as being indicative of his attitude toward the bills is concerned.

For the legislative session of 1946, in which ELLIS and Neely both served, in the education leaflet put out by labor's brass hats, Neely's vote is given on 21 roll calls; ELLIS is listed on only four of these, though he was present and voted on the same things Neely voted on, except in two instances in which he had a general pair.

VOTES WERE THE SAME

In six cases in which Neely's vote is recorded, ELLIS voted exactly as Neely did; yet the ELLIS votes are ignored except those on a block of amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act and on the Case bill. Why did the labor bosses conceal those other four votes which, by their own yardstick, were favorable to labor?

For the whole time Neely was in the House on the last occasion—1945 and 1946—the education pamphlet lists 27 favorable votes for him. Eight of these, however, were supplemental votes—that is, votes on the same proposition at different stages of consideration. Subtracting these 8 votes leaves 19 indicative votes.

On 19 votes by Neely, listed as favorable, ELLIS voted the same as Neely did on 12, but these 12 favorable votes by ELLIS are not set out in the leaflet. The top brass doesn't want the wage earners in the unions to know that he did cast those votes. The truth about this stanch American's voting record in Congress is not fully given; and by that lack, his record has been distorted and misrepresented.

WHAT THE BILLS WERE

Consider some of the measures on which ELLIS voted as Neely did but which the dues-paying members of the labor organizations haven't been told about by their political advisers. ELLIS voted for passage of the housing stabilization bill; so did Neely. It passed 358 to 24. Neely got a star for his vote. ELLIS' vote was ignored.

The House passed 355 to 1 an appropriation of $250,000,000 for housing for veterans. ELLIS voted for it. So did Neely. ELLIS' vote is not listed by the education league; Neely's identical vote is called favorable.

Postal employees were voted a pay raise by the House by 369 to 1. So were Federal workers generally. ELLIS voted in favor of both bills; so did Neely. Neely's vote is praised.

ELLIS' identical vote is ignored. Both Representatives voted in favor of an amendment by Representative KEEFE relating to packing-shed workers and NLRB jurisdiction. Neely gets a favorable on this; ELLIS gets a blank.

Neely gets just one unfavorable vote—that in favor of extension of the draft to February 15, 1947. ELLIS voted against the measure. The Neely vote is listed. The favorable ELLIS vote is ignored.

We Must Maintain a High Farm Income

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, the call sent out by the President for the special session of Congress has given me food for thought. The words which have been spoken during this special session, many of them for political effect, have left me wondering whether the Members of Congress and the American public realize how and why our economy under our American system is functioning better than that of any other nation.

I would like therefore to set out a few basic facts which I want you to ponder over while you are back in your own district.

First of all, the people of this Nation still have their civil freedom and their religious freedom, while most of the world is under some form of socialistic or fascistic control.

Second, we are enjoying the benefits of our natural resources to a greater extent than any other nation. We have approximately 6 percent of the population of the world. Yet, today, this 6 percent of the population of the world has 45 percent of the dollar income or, I should say, income in terms of dollars.

We hear much about inflation, yet we are the only Nation in the world whose monetary unit, based on the productivity of our Nation, is the most wanted and desired in the channels of trade. From the standpoint of basic economy and monetary values, how can we have a serious inflation when our monetary unit is the soundest on the globe? But we must see to it that it is kept sound.

It is true that prices are high as compared to prewar but have you analyzed our position in this world of turmoil on the basis of real results. By this I mean in terms of employment, consumption of goods, national income and wages and salaries.

Let us go back to 1939 and make a few comparisons with today. In 1939 we had a national income of $72,000,000,000 as compared to $202,000,000,000 in 1947, an increase of 180 percent.

In 1939, we had 8,000,000 unemployed with many of our people on relief and in the soup line. Today we have full employment and no one who is physically fit needs be on relief.

I have heard representatives of labor tell about the terrible results of the Taft-Hartley Act. Let us take a look at the facts. In 1939 total wages and salaries amounted to $45,000,000,000 as compared to $127,000,000,000, the rate of payments in the second quarter of 1948, a gain of 182 percent.

We hear the silver tongue of the political orator talk about high prices but he fails to mention that total wages and salaries today have increased 180 percent above 1939 payments. He wants the public to believe that they are being deprived of goods. Again let us look at the facts. In 1939 the American public spent $41,900,000,000 for goods. In 1947 they spent $117,400,000,000 or an increase of 180 percent. Now then if you will go back over the facts which I have given you, they will show that national income, total wages and salaries and money spent for goods are in exactly the same balance as 1939, but, at a higher price level, which we must maintain in order to support a $40,000,000,000 or even a $35,000,000,000 administrative expense.

Now let us go a step further and consider this cost of living. In the 10-year period 1930–39, the American public spent 24.3 percent of its income for food. In 1946 they spent 24.1 percent and in 1947 they spent 23.9 percent. Prices are higher but wages determine the price of goods and the record proves that wages and the price of goods have risen in direct proportion. The facts and figures are taken from the records of the Department of Commerce and cannot be successfully disputed.

Next let us analyze the end result. Through the expenditure of the same percentage of the national income for food, the American people are receiving 15 percent more food in terms of pounds than they did in the period 1935–39. Stated in another way the American laboring man is getting more pounds of food and more clothing for an hour of work than any period in the history of the United States.

As a Member of Congress, I am elected to serve all the people in the United States. I want labor to have its fair share and economic equality. I want agriculture to have parity which in essence means cost of production plus the average profit we derive from each year's production cycle. I want the businessman, the white-collar worker, the school teacher, the Government employee, and so forth, to have economic equality in direct proportion to his ability to produce.

For 24 years I was a businessman engaged in selling building materials and there is much uninformed discussion of housing. What is the real situation? In 1947 and the first half of 1948 we were employing 70 percent more workers than in 1939 in the construction industry. How does this compare with the rest of our economy. In 1939 we had 46,000,000 employed as compared to 61,000,000 in July 1948. This is a gain of 32 percent. What does this prove? It proves that our present construction is ahead of the rest of our economy. If we had voted public funds for more housing, cost of homes would go up, hence less homes and more inflation. To expand our construction industry we would have to take materials from some other industry and we would have to take away labor from some other part of our economy. On an over-all basis, in my opinion, this would lead to inflation and an unbalanced economy.

The present record of construction shows that we will build approximately 1,000,000 homes in 1948 which will be the national record.

Using a rather homely old phrase, if we will just "keep our shirts on," production under our private enterprise system will provide the housing and every other thing we need for prosperity, just as it always has, the safe, sound way. We should remember that we had 12 long years of depression and 5 years when most of our construction went for war purposes. It is impossible for even our economy, the most productive in the world, to overcome that shortage in a few years.

Finally let us take a look at the Nation as a whole. In 1939, as I have pointed out, we had a national income of $72,500,000,000, we had 8,000,000 unemployed, with American workers in the soup line, but we had more than that, we had approximately a $3,000,000,000 Federal deficit in 1939.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, we had full employment with 32 percent more workers in actual numbers than in 1939. No one willing to work was standing in a soup line. We had a balanced budget with a surplus of approximately $8,500,000,000 in spite of the carrying charge resulting from an increase in the national debt to over $250,000,000,000, much of which was due to World War II. Yes; and in spite of the fact that we donated approximately $8,500,000,000 of goods in 1947 to prevent the rest of the world from throwing up the sponge and letting communism take over.

Coming from an agricultural State, it is only natural that I am willing to defend agriculture and a price for its products first, last, and all the time. I have a definite reason for so doing. The record of our Nation during the past 25 years proves that for each $1 of gross farm income that we have had, regardless of whether farm prices were high or low, we had $7 of national income. It was the farm production and the price for farm products which made it possible for us to win World War II, and in 1946 and 1947 to have the highest standard of living of any nation on the globe in all the history of the world. And today crop reports show that the farmer once again is producing in abundance the materials which sustain the life and the energy of the human race and which through price per unit create the income to balance the budget, to pay the wages for full employment and consumption of goods.

Instead of discontent we should have a feeling of well being. Frankly, in my opinion, instead of this discontent, we should be willing to pay the keeper of the national boarding house, the American farmer, in order that the seven times turn of farm income into national income can generate the national income for continued solvency of the Federal budget, full employment, and general prosperity.

We need the vision to recognize that prosperity is with us and that our problem is to keep it here. In discussing lower prices we should bear in mind that a 25-percent reduction in farm prices will mean a reduction of 25 percent in national income, in wage payments, and in dollar volume of consumer goods.

In other words, should we have, say a $7,000,000,000 reduction in farm income, we would in turn suffer a reduction of national income of $49,000,000,000, then foreclosures, soup lines, misery, and general discontent would make America fair prey for the Communists' dream to come true.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEO ISACSON
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. ISACSON. Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago this year the United States took over the island of Puerto Rico as part of the victor's booty in a war with Spain. At that time, Puerto Rico had already reached the stage of autonomous government.

It was a thriving country.

Its rich land, cultivated by the people, bore the fruits of that labor.

It was a country free of exploitation by foreign capital.

It was a country striving to take its place beside the other nations of the world.

But these hopes and aspirations were completely smashed when the United States, advancing the interests of big business, converted this land into a colony, destroyed its agricultural plan and economy, and forced the people to give up Spanish, the only language they knew.

This action was in complete violation and contradiction of the Treaty of Paris which respected the rights of all people to self-determination.

The hold of the United States on Puerto Rico forced them to drastically change their economy, which had produced grain, cotton, rice, tobacco, and farm commodities.

Today, Puerto Rico's economy is completely dominated by the huge sugar interests in the United States.

Where once this rich land gave forth many products, today the people are forced to produce only sugar, completely destroying the richness of the earth and the hopes of the people.

Big business in America is not alone responsible for the repression of the Puerto Rican people. In Puerto Rico itself there exists also a bipartisan government which is tied hand and foot to Wall Street and works in Wall Street's behalf rather than in the interests of the people. The power to make laws has been taken from the people and handed over to the President of the United States and the Supreme Court, who have set themselves up as the supreme judge as to what is right and just.

One would think that we are living in the days of feudalism.

One would think that our great Nation, which threw off the yoke of British rule in 1776, would respect the wishes of all people for independence.

But here in the United States our Government, our press, and our rumor factories have spread libelous and malicious untruths about the Puerto Rican people.

Only a few short months ago our press carried the most vicious stories vilifying and slandering the Puerto Rican people.

They claimed that 90 percent were on relief.

They claimed that 50 percent were prostitutes.

They claimed that the Puerto Rican people in New York were ridden with tuberculosis and syphilis.

But these lies did not go unanswered.

The Puerto Rican Congress waged a campaign to expose these lies.

I am proud to say that along with VITO MARCANTONIO and Jose Ramos-Lopez, I picketed the building of the World-Telegram and demanded that these stories be retracted.

These lies were completely refuted by reports from Columbia University.

This campaign of vilification did not stop with the press but continued in the very Halls of the Congress of the United States.

Reactionary after reactionary rose on the floor of the House of Representatives and slandered the Puerto Rican people.

But Congressman MARCANTONIO and I rose to our feet and nailed every one of those lies. We were fighting for the rights of the Puerto Rican people and for the rights of all people to live in peace and security.

These slanders were particularly raised against the Puerto Ricans because all oppressed people, by their very nature, are progressive and monopoly and Wall Street know full well that before they may completely destroy the aspirations of the Puerto Rican people they have to break the progressive front established by them.

We shall not allow Wall Street to do that!

Far away, across the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, another heroic nation, the state of Israel, fighting against all odds, has established an independent state.

So, too, will the Puerto Rican people, fighting against those same forces, ultimately throw off the yoke of Wall Street imperialism and secure for themselves an independent homeland.

Of this there is no doubt.

But the task here for us in America and especially for the Progressive Party is to become the fighting allies of these exploited people and demand of our Government full recognition of the independence of Puerto Rico with economic guaranties.

We must make our demands known at the polling places in November.

Vote against war!
Vote against high prices!
Vote for decent homes!
Vote for Puerto Rico!

Truman and his Republican Congress pay only lip service to the platform of the Progressive Party.

We know that only the election of Henry Wallace and GLEN TAYLOR will mean action on that platform.

I have today introduced a bill into the Congress of the United States demanding immediate independence for Puerto Rico.

Puerto Rico has been ready for independence for 50 years.

It is up to us as Americans to fight untiringly until this is achieved.

Viva Puerto Rico Libre!

The Livestock Outlook and Its Effect on the Price of Meat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER K. GRANGER
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, a two-way trend has marked this country's livestock and meat industry since World War II. Prices of livestock and meat have climbed to all-time records and livestock numbers have declined sharply from their wartime peaks.

Two factors have dominated conditions in the industry. Record incomes have created an unprecedented demand for meat which has resulted in high prices for meat despite large per capita supplies and the liquidation of cattle and sheep from ranges and farms. Feed scarcities have meant high feed prices and have caused farmers to make moderate reductions in numbers of hogs produced since the war.

Meat is not scarce in terms of per capita quantities as a result of these developments, however. Per capita consumption is well above prewar. Large cattle slaughter in 1947 reduced cattle numbers but brought meat consumption up to 155 pounds per capita—the largest in about 40 years. The anticipated consumption this year of about 145 pounds is far above the 1935–39 average, amounting to about 126 pounds. Actually, the only scarcity of meat is in relation to the strong demand created by rising incomes.

There has been a steady decline in cattle numbers in the United States since January 1, 1945. The estimated total at that time was 85,600,000 head, which established the all-time peak. On January 1 this year, the total was 78,600,000 head, which represented a decrease of 8 percent.

The decline in hog production began in 1944 when wartime output of hogs became not only too great for the available feed-grain supplies at that time, but too great to be maintained at that level under any conditions. Hog production received another setback in 1947 when the short corn crop caused producers to cut potential production of spring pigs. On January 1, 1944, there were approximately 83,700,000 hogs on farms and the annual pig crop was then estimated at 86,700,000. By January 1, 1948, the total number of hogs on farms had declined to 55,000,000 and the annual pig crop to an estimated total of 82,400,000 head.

Sheep growers have continued to reduce their herds since the war. This tendency can be traced to high operating costs, the difficulty in obtaining labor, and to the uncertainty which has prevailed in future prices for wool, as well as to many of the other factors which have had an effect upon all livestock. Present numbers of sheep and lambs on ranches and farms are the lowest since the Civil War. They have declined from an all-time record of 49,300,000 head of stock sheep on January 1, 1942, to a total of 30,500,000 head on January 1 this year.

MEAT CONSUMPTION

Since the beginning of the decline in livestock numbers during the war, however, United States civilian per capita meat consumption was maintained around the highest wartime level until this year, and in 1947 exceeded any annual meat consumption rate since 1908. Per capita consumption in 1944 amounted to 153 pounds. It declined to 144 pounds in 1945, but amounted to 153 and 155 pounds in 1946 and 1947, respectively. This year, as reduced livestock numbers are being felt, it is probable that the decline in meat production will not permit per capita consumption beyond 145 pounds.

The following table shows livestock and meat production and consumption for 1935–39 average and for 1941 to date:

Year	Jan. 1 number on farms				Annual pig crop	Total meat		Per capita meat consumption
	All cattle and calves	Milk cows [1]	Stock sheep	Hogs		Production	Civilian consumption
	Millions	Millions	Millions	Millions	Millions	Billion pounds	Billion pounds	Pounds
1935–39 average	66.8	25.0	45.4	43.9	68.6	16.2	16.3	126
1940	68.3	24.9	46.3	61.2	79.9	19.1	18.8	142
1941	71.8	25.5	47.4	54.4	85.0	19.6	18.8	142
1942	76.0	26.3	49.3	60.6	104.9	21.9	18.4	139
1943	81.2	27.1	48.2	73.9	121.8	24.5	17.9	138

1948	78.6	25.2	30.5	55.0	82.4	21.3	----------	145

[1] Included in all cattle.
[2] Preliminary.

No material change in the meat supply situation is anticipated until near the end of 1949. For the remainder of 1948 meat supplies are expected to continue moderately smaller than a year ago, and are likely to reach the lowest level of the year in late summer and early fall. Commercial production of meat for 1948 may be approximately 10 percent lower than a year ago.

With the decrease in meat supplies, prices to consumers may rise still further since demand is stronger than a year ago because of higher wages and other income. July retail prices were generally the highest on record.

Further increases may be anticipated in prices of hogs and in good and choice fed cattle this summer, with seasonal declines of somewhat less than usual extent probable for grass cattle and lambs as soon as marketings reach a seasonal peak. Lighter marketings of fed and grass cattle are expected for the last 6 months of 1948 than for the same period a year ago. Fewer cattle are on feed and slaughter of steers and heifers is likely to be limited because of the reduction in young stock evident in 1947.

As to the future outlook, the harvest of a record corn crop this year is expected to result in increased cattle feeding and a greater demand for feeder cattle. The heavy corn crop may delay the marketing of 1948 spring pigs, which, because of the ample supply of feed will be fed to heavier weights, and in the long run will produce more meat. However, with fewer hogs on farms June 1 than a year earlier, hog slaughter for the rest of 1948 is expected to continue below the 1947 level. There is little prospect of any increase in the number of lambs which will go on feed this fall because fewer lambs are available for feeding.

IMPORT AND EXPORT

During the past year exports of meat have been limited to a fraction of 1 percent of the current output, and no meat, except horse meat, has been shipped or is scheduled to be shipped in connection with the European recovery program.

The world livestock and meat situation has improved somewhat since the war, but supplies of meat in many areas are still below prewar levels. The trend toward increased numbers of cattle, hogs, and sheep in Europe, Soviet Union, and other countries except North America continued in 1947, but the increases in Europe were below expectations because of unfavorable crops and pastures in 1947.

There were declines last year in cattle numbers in North America, South America, and western Europe, but these were more than offset by increases in the number of cattle in the Soviet Union and Oceania. On a world-wide basis, present cattle numbers are only slightly below the 5-year, 1936 to 1940, average of 726,400,000 head.

World hog numbers at the beginning of this year were estimated at approximately 247,000,000 head—an increase of about 2½ percent over the previous year—but 15 percent below the 5-year, 1936 to 1940, average. In the past year although hog numbers have declined in North America, there have been moderate increases in South America, Europe, Soviet Union, Asia, Africa, and Oceania.

Sheep numbers throughout the world at the beginning of 1948 were estimated at about 711,000,000 head—an increase of 22,000,000 head over the numbers of previous year. This represented an increase of 3 percent over 1947, but was 3 percent below the 5-year average for 1936–40.

Two additional factors have affected the output of meat in the United States to some extent. These include an embargo on the shipment of beef cattle from Canada to the United States which was originally applied by Canada in 1942 in a move to conserve its beef-cattle stocks for wartime purposes. Removal of this embargo, which is now being contemplated by Canadian officials, would add possibly 100,000 head of cattle to United States supplies in the next few months. A similar embargo on live sheep and lambs and carcasses was removed August 3, 1948.

EFFECT OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE

Another handicap to meat production in the United States has been the closing of our border to imports of Mexican cattle as a result of the outbreak in 1946 of foot-and-mouth disease in the central sections of that country. Under the quarantine, which is still in effect, live cattle or other livestock cannot be shipped into the United States. Cattlemen in Texas and other Southwest States who have depended upon imports from Mexico to stock many of their ranges are no longer able to obtain cattle and calves from that source. Previously imports from Mexico amounted to as many as 500,000 head a year.

Eradication and control of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico is being carried on under a joint plan of operation by the Governments of the United States and Mexico. The major task since the beginning of the outbreak has been to prevent its spread into disease-free areas and for this reason the Mexico-United States Commission for the Eradication of Foot-and-Mouth Disease have taken the utmost precautions to prevent spread through potential carriers of the virus.

Regulations are in effect to prevent people from becoming virus carriers by travel in and out of the infected areas. Extensive measures are taken to enforce the quarantine and disinfection with the greatest possible efficiency.

To date, the Commission has been successful in containing the disease within the original central area of infection and in reducing that area by small but significant gains along its northern boundary. One of the main factors in this effort has been the maintenance of a quarantine and disinfection belt that is made up of disinfection stations intercepting every highway, railroad, or trail leading from the central area of infection into clean northern Mexico and the United States.

These stations are staffed by United States and Mexican sanitary technicians—laymen who have been trained in disinfection measures by veterinarians—a detachment of the Mexican National Army—to provide the necessary enforcement of disinfection regulations if necessary—and as many laborers as may be necessary to operate road dips through which all vehicular traffic must pass and roadside footbaths of chemically impregnated sawdust through which all persons—pedestrians or vehicle passengers—must walk. Every effort is made against considerable obstacles to make sure that these stations are always supplied with adequate chemical materials, power sprays and water, and they operate on a 24-hour basis.

Persons or vehicles carrying materials that are capable of transporting the virus—hay or forage, for example—are turned back, and all other goods are subject to a painstaking spray disinfection. Every effort is made to see that these measures are applied with equal impartiality and thoroughness to the drivers and passengers of private automobiles, bus riders, and the countryfolk.

In the case of passengers of airplanes taking off from a point within the infected area and going nonstop to a destination within the clean territory, arrangements have been made with every airport for the disinfection of planes and passengers prior to departure. Footbaths have been installed at entryways to the planes and Commission or military personnel are on constant duty to make sure that official regulations are observed. The same measures are used with respect to coastwise shipping and trains.

While the officials of the Commission, in recognition of the importance of the person as a possible carrier of the virus, are making every effort to make sure that these measures are being carried out with the utmost efficiency, they are aware of the highly mobile nature of the Mexican peasant who frequently shuns established communications routes and strikes off across mountains in traveling from point to point. In an effort to strengthen the quarantine lines in areas in which this is particularly prevalent, five-strand fences patrolled by troops have been built. Mexican habits and customs are also taken into consideration by the Commission which does not represent the quarantine line as an absolute guaranty against possible spread of the disease, but as an important part of the best restraining strategy that can be employed in the Mexican situation.

The Taft-Hartley Act in Operation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Eightieth Congress passed a most important law—the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, commonly known as the Taft-Hartley Act. This act is important because it sets forth the basic principles to govern the relations of labor and management in the United States. It amended the National Labor Relations Act, or Wagner Act, which had been the basic law since 1935.

During the Eightieth Congress I had the honor and duty to serve on the House Committee on Labor and Education which drafted the Taft-Hartley Act. Wisconsin's Fifth Congressional District, comprising the north half of Milwaukee County includes employees whose livelihood is affected by our national labor policy and many and diverse industries with all kinds of labor-management problems. As Congressman from this district I felt a special interest in behalf of the workingman and in working on this House committee to draft a law which would be fair and just to both labor and management. We spent 6 weeks in committee hearings and quizzed 137 witnesses—representing labor, management, and the public—in preparation of the Taft-Hartley Act.

It was during these hearings that a subcommittee made up of the late Representatives THOMAS OWENS, of Illinois, JOHN KENNEDY, of Massachusetts, and myself as chairman, came to Milwaukee to investigate the veracity of the testimony of certain leaders of the Allis-Chalmers Local No. 248. As a result of these investigations, Harold Christoffel was convicted of perjury.

Naturally those of us who served on the committee did not agree on every provision of the Taft-Hartley Act which was finally passed, since the act deals with almost every phase of labor-management relations. However, we all agreed that the act was a substantial, considerable improvement on the Wagner Act, then in effect.

The Congress also believed that the act was sound. It passed the act over the President's veto by a vote of 331 to 83 in the House and 68 to 25 in the Senate, the largest vote ever made to override a Presidential veto, with both Democrats and Republicans voting in favor of it.

How has the Taft-Hartley Act worked out in practice? Examination of the past year of comparative industrial peace will show that the act is proving to be both fair and workable, contrary to the dire predictions of some labor leaders.

One provision of the Taft-Hartley Act outlaws strikes arising from jurisdictional disputes. As a result the National Labor Relations Board has initiated formal action in only one jurisdictional dispute since the effective date of the act. In all other jurisdictional disputes settlements have been effectuated without the necessity of formal action. Many unions, particularly the building trades, have now set up machinery to settle these disputes, which prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act constituted such an unjustifiable abuse of the right to strike.

Secondary boycotts are also outlawed by the act. Only nine petitions for injunctions against secondary boycotts were issued by the Board from the time of passage of the act in August 1947 to the end of 1947. Most of the other charges were settled peaceably. The mere filing of charges and the beginning of an investigation is serving to end this abuse.

The requirement that labor leaders sign a non-Communist affidavit has been complied with by almost all unions. The United Electrical Workers of America is one of the few unions which has refused to sign. Many Communists were dismissed from union leadership by the unions themselves, because they refused to sign. The act should be amended to require employers as well as union officers to sign.

The union shop is permitted under the Taft-Hartley Act where a majority of the employees vote for it by secret ballot.

The union shop provision should be simplified to make it unnecessary for the Government to conduct the election unless requested to do so. To the end of 1947, 668 union shop elections were held and 664 of these were favorable to the union shop. The act prohibits the closed shop, however. I, personally, believe the act should be amended to permit the closed shop in certain instances.

Labor organizations are now requested to file statements of their operations with the Department of Labor and also to furnish financial statements to their members. Up to February 1, 1948, 10,796 unions had complied with this provision.

The act also gives the President the power to prevent work stoppages for 80 days where a threatened strike would imperil the national health and safety. Because of this provision the public has been protected and there have been no prolonged strikes in key industries since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The act continues, the same as formerly, the ban on employer unfair labor practices. In addition it defines union unfair labor practices—such as coercing employees, featherbedding, or charging excessive dues when there is a union shop agreement. It was charged prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, that this provision for making unions susceptible to charges of unfair labor practices would encourage recriminatory actions by employers against unions. This has not been the case. From the effective date of the act until the end of January 1948, 1,316 charges were filed against employers while only 335 charges were filed against unions. Union membership is now at an all-time high in the United States—further indication of the fact that the Taft-Hartley Act has not in any way stifled the labor movement.

But what has been the effect of the act on the bargaining positions of labor and management? Has labor lost any of its strength at the bargaining table?

In the first place it must be remembered that the Taft-Hartley Act does not outlaw a legitimate strike—labor's most potent weapon at the bargaining table. The act only outlaws wildcat strikes and those arising from jurisdictional disputes. It does, however, require a 60-day cooling-off period before a strike can be called and it does make a union as well as a company liable for damages for breach of any collective bargaining agreement. Further, the act does not permit permanent injunctions to be issued against unions. Temporary injunctions under the act can be issued only in the case of national emergencies and even then only for a short time.

Hourly earnings in the United States on the date of the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act were 27 percent higher than on VJ-day. During this same interval the cost of living as reported by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics had risen 24 percent. From the time of the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act to March 15, 1948, for example, wages and prices continued to rise, until at that time, the hourly wage rate was 35 percent above VJ-day and the cost of living was 29 percent above VJ-day. Thus it will be observed that the hourly wage rate increased another 8 percent since the passage of the act while the cost of living rose only 5 percent. While these figures can never show the complete picture they give no substance to the charge that labor suffered at the bargaining table because of the Taft-Hartley Act.

But the increase in hourly rates does not accurately reflect the true increase of income which workers have received since the Taft-Hartley Act went into effect, because these gains have been secured more frequently through peaceful collective bargaining rather than through costly strikes. From VJ-day until the effective date of the act, the average number of man-days of idleness caused by work stoppages was 7,213,000 per month. Since the passage of the act until the end of April 1948 the average number of man-days of idleness was only 2,613,000 per month. This amounts to a saving to the workers involved during this time of over $1,000,000,000. Here is a tangible, positive gain which workers have received because of the abolition of labor abuses by the Taft-Hartley Act.

The act prohibits the check-off of union dues unless expressly authorized by a union member in writing. It also prohibits unions and employers from threatening workers to join or not join unions, but at the same time guarantees free speech to all to present their views. The act also prohibits a union or corporation from contributing to a political campaign involving Federal elections. I believe this provision should be amended, however, to permit unions to make such contributions.

The Taft-Hartley Act does not take away any of the basic rights of unions existing under the Wagner Act. It does not take away any rights of self-organization or collective bargaining or the right to strike. And the Kersten amendment, which I introduced during the debate on the bill, saved industry-wide bargaining for labor.

The ordinary worker is given security in the exercise of his rights—free from coercion by either labor or management and free to engage or not engage in union activities. He is protected against excessive union dues and Communist leaders. He is entitled to participate in union activity in a democratic manner and to receive financial statements from his union.

Management is protected against jurisdictional disputes, wildcat strikes, and secondary boycotts, and from featherbedding demands and contract violations by unions.

And the public is protected by lessening the possibility of strikes which affect the national health and safety.

Such is the Taft-Hartley Act. It is probably not the best possible law which could be written, because it was written by fallible human beings. It has been objected to on the ground that it injects the Government too far into labor-management relations, but this objection is no commentary on the Congress which passed the bill, but on the continuous stubborn unwillingness of many labor leaders and businessmen to settle their differences peaceably and without injury to an innocent public.

The Taft-Hartley Act sets up a permanent joint committee to continue to study the complicated and difficult subject of labor relations, which committee is charged with the duty of recommending needed changes such as experience dictates. Our national labor law can be improved and made even more of an instrument of industrial peace if we treat the problem with fairness and tolerance. Labor relations should not be made a political football. It bears upon the successful operation of American industry that supports our way of life, and, more important, it is designed to protect the individual worker from exploitation of any kind.

Hon. Clarence F. Lea, of California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT CROSSER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, although the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] will not have finished his term of office until January 1949, he in all probability will not have occasion again to be present in the House as a Member of Congress. The adjournment tonight will undoubtedly continue until the beginning of the first day of the Eighty-first Congress. I therefore desire to comment on the service of Congressman CLARENCE F. LEA as a Member of the House.

Mr. LEA has had the unusual distinction of serving for 31 years in the National House of Representatives. It is seldom that a man is fortunate enough to continue for such a length of time as a Member of Congress. During that long period our colleague has served the people of his district and the country conscientiously and with distinction.

Never an extremist, he has been able often both in the committee and in the House to help in reconciling the viewpoints of those who seemed to be irreconcilably opposed to each other. The result has been the promotion and enactment of legislation of a very helpful nature.

Mr. LEA has been courteous to his colleagues and to all those with whom he has come in contact in connection with the Government's business. He has always shown an industrious disposition, and has been able to master the many intricate problems which have been presented to him as a Member of Congress, as a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, and particularly as chairman of that committee. Regardless of the tempestuous nature of the presentation of a case before the committee, of which he was chairman, Mr. LEA was always able to remain calm and serene. He did not allow himself to be irritated and he regularly avoided irritation of others in a way that might have confused the issues which were presented to the committee for decision.

When the members of the committee happened to be divided into contentious factions, Mr. LEA was almost invariably able to do much to bring about a feeling of amity among the members and so made it possible to have enacted constructive legislation instead of witnessing the failure of the legislation. He was always careful to avoid angering those to whose policies he might be opposed, and was always able to state his own views on a subject without becoming angry.

Mr. LEA discontinued his membership in this House with what I am sure is the good will of every Member of the House, and I know that all who know him will wish him the greatest possible happiness during the remaining years of his life, which we hope sincerely will be many.

We say in the old-fashioned way, Fare thee well, but not good-by.

OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ISACSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I should like to include the following news story which appeared in the Palestine Post of Tel Aviv, July 5, relating to my visit to the new state of Israel; and the text of a letter I have addressed to my constituents on the occasion of my return to the United States.

The Palestine Post article of July 5, 1948, follows:

TRUMAN ON THE SPOT

President Truman and his rival candidates, Mr. Thomas Dewey and Mr. Henry Wallace, were called upon in cables yesterday from the Bronx Congressman, Mr. LEO ISACSON, to pledge that if they were elected they would take immediate action to lift the arms embargo and to extend de jure recognition of Israel.

In a press conference in Tel Aviv, Mr. ISACSON said that Dewey and Wallace could easily offer satisfactory answers (if elected, they would take office only in January), but President Truman would find himself somewhat involved.

Mr. ISACSON said that a change of American policy could be effectuated only before the Presidential elections, as afterwards it would be too late for public opinion to win out over the Forrestal-Henderson-Marshall clique. He said that only the United States was competent to force Britain to stop arming Abdullah and pouring funds into Arab coffers.

LABOR VACILLATION

Mr. ISACSON, who visited Great Britain on his way to Palestine, said that the labor government appeared to be vacillating in its attitude toward Israel. The change was due to the Israel soldiers' heroic fight in preventing the Arabs from driving to the coast and dividing the Jewish state into two.

The Congressman said he was confident that the Jews would win but it would obviate the useless sacrifice of thousands of lives if the United States would lift the infamous and illegal arms embargo. "Britain will not dare to arm the Arabs if she knows that American policy is contrary to that action," he said.

Next follows the text of the letter referred to above:

Shalom!

I have just returned from Israel.

I conferred with Moishe Shertok, with other members of the Government, with leaders of the Histadruth.

I went through the Arab lines and saw war-torn Jerusalem, visited the Kibbutzim, the war plants.

I spoke with hundreds of our wonderful, heroic, fighting people.

Israel will finally win. Of that I have no doubt, after what I have seen.

But every day that passes with the criminal Truman arms embargo still in effect means the shockingly needless death of thousands of Jewish men and women.

I pledged to our brethren in Israel that the people of my congressional district would flood the President with demands that he lift the embargo now.

Won't you join with me? Only our determined fight will help lift the double-crossing Truman embargo which is choking the Jewish people of Israel. Write President Truman today. Even a penny post card—in your own words, in your own handwriting—will have a decided effect in lifting the embargo.

Your Congressman,

LEO ISACSON.

High Prices: What Is the Answer?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me entitled "High Prices: What Is the Answer?"

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIGH PRICES: WHAT IS THE ANSWER?

"What is going to be done about high prices?"

This is a question submitted to me in hundreds of letters and telegrams during these past weeks.

"I simply cannot make ends meet on my pay envelopes. I am going into debt, just trying to keep body and soul together."

"My husband and I can't afford the luxuries of life, much less the necessities, in taking care of our three children because of high prices."

"Doesn't Congress understand the problems that the low-income people of America face?"

These are typical of the serious, even desperate, questions which many people of Wisconsin have sent to me.

BLESSINGS FOR WHICH TO BE GRATEFUL

On the other hand, there are those who, while recognizing this problem, express gratitude that by and large, we have many blessings for which to be thankful. They say that to try deflation (meaning cutting prices) would be far more dangerous than to continue with our current inflation. They say: "We are the only nation in the world which has balanced its budget, which is paying off its indebtedness. If we accept the hard fact that there is a 50-cent dollar today instead of a 100-cent dollar, isn't the great mass of our people as well off or better off than when we had a 100-cent dollar and our national income was only seventy, eighty, or ninety billion dollars?

"Do we want to return to that low-level economy, roll-back prices, meaning rolling back income, cutting wages, dividends, farm prices? Isn't it imperatively necessary that we maintain our current $210,000,000,000 national income or more if we are going to maintain the integrity of our national bonds, our national overhead, our insurance policies, our banking system, take care of our veterans, and meet the challenges of national defense? If not, then what can we do?"

DANGER OF TINKERING WITH DEFLATION

Before we take any steps that will precipitate a retrogression in our economy, we will have to have answers to the above questions and they will have to be correct answers. It is all well and good merely to listen to the voices who would lead to blowing America up or down—either in a run-away inflation or a run-away deflation (either course would be catastrophic). But it would not be well and good to act thereon.

THE TWO PROBLEMS THAT WE FACE

This mechanism called the American way cannot have any monkey wrenches thrown into it without disastrous results. We all recognize that the dollar is figuratively cut in two, with the result that prices are high. Nevertheless, it is still the best money in the world. When we look around and see what has happened in other lands in relation to their inflated money, their experience should cause us to pause and think the problem through and not go off the deep end in either direction—inflation or deflation. That is the purpose of these remarks—to point out that we face not one problem but two—disastrous inflation and drastic deflation, both of which must be avoided.

CONGRESS' UNDERSTANDING OF PROBLEM

Congress can, of course, indeed sympathetically understand the problems that America faces. As the President himself remarked, the Members of Congress are by and large far from wealthy men. They face the very same inflation that everyone else in the country does.

The big question is how did we get into this present situation, and where do we go from here? What is the cause and what is the cure?

THE HARDSHIP CAUSED BY INFLATION

First, let's admit that inflation is here. It is not a theory, but a hard cold fact, and there is no use blinking at it.

Perhaps the most severe damage from inflation has been experienced by those groups whose increases in earnings have not kept step with the increase in prices. Everyone knows that elderly folks, those on old-age pensions have felt inflation most. Veterans on pensions, widows on pensions, folks living on annuities, white-collar workers, such as teachers—these and other groups have fallen far behind in the race to make ends meet.

But to some extent, every group has been hit, if not hurt. In the case of some groups, their earnings have increased faster and higher than have the prices they pay.

That brings us to this point. As Marriner Eccles, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, has stated:

"Everybody likes the benefits of inflation when it benefits them, but nobody likes to pay the price."

Workers in manufacturing industries are now earning more than 246 percent more than in 1939. The story is similar in the case of nonmanufacturing industries. I am not saying that these workers have no inflation problem, but I am pointing out hard facts.

WE CAN'T HAVE OUR CAKE AND EAT IT TOO

Let's talk realistically about this problem. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I have placed a straight-shooting statement by Walter Lippmann. He brought out the thought that there is a simple test by which the public can find out just who is trying to deal sincerely and intelligently with inflation. Lippmann didn't mince any words; rather he threw directly at his readers the thought that sincerity can be tested if the public official begins with a clear explanation and a stern warning that if any program to stop inflation is to be effective, it must be painful to the farmers, painful to the wage earners, painful to businessmen and bankers.

In other words, Lippmann brought out that it will be necessary to reduce prosperity, to cut profits, reduce public works, limit sales, and the market for labor. Then he asked the pointed question, whether or not any politician who discusses this situation puts the people on notice that they cannot both (a) enjoy the benefits of inflation—that is, full employment, high wages, booming markets, high profits—and at the same time (b) be able to buy at lower prices everything they are trying to buy. Now I quote Mr. Lippmann verbatim:

"If the public man says none of this, if he believes or pretends to believe that he can reduce the prevailing prices without reducing the current incomes of farmers, workers, and businessmen, if in other words he talks as if the people could have their cake and eat it too, he is deceiving them or he is deceiving himself."

PREVENTING INFLATION AND DEFLATION

What does the problem boil down to, therefore? It is how to:

(a) Prevent the price balloon from rising still higher where goods will become out of reach of the buying public, and,

(b) prevent the price balloon from exploding and sinking to the floor, meaning a drastic deflation, dragging America into a depression.

What we seek therefore is the answer: Why did the price balloon rise this high and what can we now do about it?

AVOIDING SMEAR CHARGES

Let's not try try to find a scapegoat for this situation. Let's not try to make Congress a whipping boy as the President unfortunately tried or try to pin blame exclusively on the administration or try to smear the businessman or the laboring man or the farmer. We can solve this problem in the American way without name calling, without smearing, but by calling a spade a spade and by going to work with spades and shovels. We need fewer stump speeches and more stump pullers.

HOW DID WE GET WHERE WE ARE?

Now, what are the causes of our dilema?

1. First, prices are higher because more demands were created for goods and services during the war than there were goods and services available without an increase in prices.

In other words, America has been enjoying record-high purchasing power. Sixty-one million people are now employed. National income is above the $200,000,000,000 mark—three times higher than the prewar rate.

HUGE FOREIGN SPENDING

2. America's foreign-aid program to secure European recovery and halt communism has aggravated the problem. Since 1940, the Government has loaned or granted over $100,000,000,000 to foreign nations. We have gotten back less than seven billions in cash receipts during that period. Well, do we want to abandon our foreign-aid program? We can't have our cake and eat it too.

HEAVY FEDERAL OUTLAYS

3. Government spending has been inflationary. Today, Federal spending is 10 times the 1933 rate. Our budget overhead is over $40,000,000,000 a year. Our national debt is two hundred and fifty-two billions—more than 10 times the 1932 level.

Year after year the administration has spent money, loaned money, borrowed money, poured money into the economic current whether spending was needed or unneeded. When, for example, we sought to reduce $200,000,000 from the bloated river and harbor bill during the Eightieth Congress, did the forces of economy win? On the contrary, we were decisively routed by the spenders.

GOVERNMENT HOARDS MANPOWER

We learn that Federal pay employees have been added to the pay rolls at the rate of 800 a day recently. Obviously, the more money that Uncle Sam himself pumps out in his pay roll, the more inflationary pressure is increased. The administration itself is hoarding manpower—manpower which is desperately needed in private industry in order to increase production. The administration refuses to defer certain public works which could better be constructed during a slack period. It insists on using for nonessential ends scarce labor, particularly scarce construction materials now when they can be least spared, amidst our heavy national-defense program, which is, of course, essential.

This year it has been estimated that a total of $54,000,000,000 is being spent by Federal, State, and local governments, Uncle Sam himself spending forty billions of that sum. Compare that fifty-four billion total with the figure of the Nation's $47,000,000,000 food bill. In other words, John Q. Taxpayer is paying more for his Government than he is paying for his own food. Yet the administration has strenuously objected to any reduction in Government expenses. It has insisted on maintaining two and one-fourth million bureaucrats on the Federal pay roll, no doubt for political purposes.

MORE SPENDING PROPOSED AT SPECIAL SESSION

Moreover, the President, when he called Congress back into special session, made a long series of recommendations—virtually every one of which would have served to pump hundreds of millions of dollars of additional funds into the already inflated currency stream. With one hand, the President feeds the flames of inflation, with the other hand he possesses the means to douse the flames but keeps that hand inactive, all the while criticizing the Congress for refusing to take reckless action.

GOVERNMENT HAS DISCOURAGED FULL PRODUCTION

4. The administration program has discouraged full production. When the housewife goes to the butcher store today and pays record-high prices for meat, let her remember that the Department of Agriculture has been constantly encouraging farmers and stockmen to reduce meat animal numbers for fear that a depression was inevitable and consumption would drop. In 1944, meat animal numbers hit a peak of 172,000,000 a year; since then, they have fallen to 133,000,000 a year. In addition, the Agriculture "experts" have recommended lower, not more production of eggs, of chickens, of turkeys. You can't reduce supply in the face of increasing demand without causing higher prices.

INCREASED POPULATION

5. Meanwhile, America's population has soared in numbers, putting further pressure on demand and on prices. Today, we are 143,000,000 strong. Our birth rate instead of dropping, is holding to its high levels. This means more milk, more baby carriages, more baby clothing and other essentials for our infant group. We joyously welcome these new citizens of the Republic, of course, but higher population means still more demand that must be fulfilled.

TAX BURDEN

6. Another factor accounting for high prices are the still heavy taxes which prevail. The Republicans voted a tax-reduction law over the Presidential veto, but taxes are still way above prewar levels.

It has been estimated that 25 percent of the price the consumer pays for manufactured items is necessary in order simply to cover the taxes the manufacturer pays and the taxes that are paid by wholesaler, jobber, retailer—businessmen all the way down the line. Because our tax level is still so high the cost of taxes is passed on to the consumer.

LOW PRODUCTIVITY

7. Although industrial production has soared, the actual productivity of labor has not kept pace. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the building trades, where some laborers getting exceptionally high pay, lay fewer bricks, do less plastering and less other work than they did before the war. The fault is that of arbitrary union restrictions which limit output and require all sorts of skilled labor to do wholly unskilled tasks, thus increasing costs.

Even in some manufacturing enterprises the notion is still too prevalent that some workers need not put an honest day's work in for an honest dollar. The overwhelming mass of American labor is, of course, loyal, faithful, hard working, but in labor as in business sometimes we see at work the racketeer mind, the chiseler mind, which says in effect "the public be damned." "Let there be strikes, walk-outs, slow-downs, never mind who pays the bill."

HIGHER WAGES

8. I have already referred to higher wages in industry and in farm labor—now at all-time peaks. This is not to imply that laboring men are not entitled to a fair day's wage; on the contrary, they must get a just proportion of the fruit of their toil. Already, however, we have had three rounds of wage increases with a fourth in the offing.

Since labor costs may constitute from one-tenth to nine-tenths of the cost of a particular item, depending on the item, obviously if wages go up, prices will inevitably rise.

TRUMAN'S KILLING OF WAGE CONTROLS

9. That brings us to this question:

"Who opened the door of the barn and let the price horses out that have been running wild ever since?"

Read President Truman's radio speech of October 30, 1945. When you have read that, read also what he said when he accepted the report of his so-called fact-finding committees recommending wage increases in the steel and automobile industries in the fall of that year and early 1946. Truman himself authorized OPA to raise the price of steel and automobiles following the wage increases. That action was a denial—a complete contradiction—of his own speech of October 30, 1945, wherein he said wages could be increased, should be increased, but prices didn't have to be simultaneously increased. Then look at his record in which he suddenly abolished the Wage Stabilization Board, which took all the doors of all the barns off and let all the horses run wild in all industry—the electrical industry, the coal industry, the textile industry, and every other industry.

Truman forgot the lesson that was learned even by Leon Henderson, who learned it the hard way. Henderson, who thought that he could administer price control without wage control, finally came around and said that it couldn't be done. Truman forgot that lesson. He abolished wage controls, hoping to maintain price controls, which was an impossibility. Then, when the thing didn't work, he recognized the wreckage, he recognized the horses were out of the barn, and merely announced to the world that the horses were gone. That is all he did when he said no more price controls were necessary, because to maintain them would have been very undemocratic in our society (shortly before the election of 1946). Then he took off all price controls. He recognized that the deed had been done as a result of his own bad judgment in removing wage controls.

SUPPLY AND DEMAND OUT OF BALANCE

These then are some of the factors that have been at work. Some of these, like the increase in population, are natural matters; others are factors that have been due to poor judgment in high quarters.

We see in the present situation the operation or lack of operation of a great law. It is the law of checks and balances. In this price situation, unfortunately, we do not have much check and balance, meaning that because goods are still in relatively short supply there is not a check and balance upon human nature with the result that human nature has gone to excess and there has been widespread profiteering. Everyone is familiar with the new-car situation, where cars which have simply been bought and driven a few miles have then been taken into used-car lots and sold for $500 or $600 above standard price. Why is there such profiteering? Because there is a lack of check and balance of an adequate supply of new cars to meet demand—a lack of competition, and the result is profiteering.

America's history, like the history of every other nation, shows that where human beings get power in their hands and that power is not checked and balanced, it becomes autocratic and tyrannical. The question, therefore, is how can we provide a check and balance?

LAW ENACTED BY SPECIAL SESSION

The President, proposed limited price controls. The special session, however, rejected that idea, because there is no such thing as limited controls. Either you have controls, you have a complete stabilization program, or you do not.

There is no easy legislative panacea, no quick cure-all to banish inflation. Legislation alone cannot do this job, although it can accomplish some good.

What then did the anti-inflation bill which Congress did enact provide? It made provision for (a) Federal Reserve Board control of consumer installment credit, (b) for increasing the reserve of member banks of the Federal Reserve System on demand deposits and on time deposits, and (c) for increasing the reserve in gold of Federal Reserve banks.

I believe that these provisions will prove helpful in putting some brakes on inflation. Obviously, however, they are not going to roll back prices to previous levels.

The big question is, did the American people want the special session of Congress to actually freeze prices at their present levels, or to roll them back to previous levels? The answer is "No." America did not want such controls because America does not want a police state with regimentation by an OPA-type bureaucracy.

WHAT DO PRICE CONTROLS MEAN?

It is easy enough to call for price controls, but just what do price controls mean? Price controls mean a complete stabilization stranglehold on every aspect of the economy. This means:

(a) A price freeze on every single commodity.

(b) Strict rationing on all materials, e. g., on all consumer goods and other items in short supply.

(c) Severe allocation on all raw materials in short supply, like steel, tin, lead, chromium, etc.

(d) Restoration of very heavy taxes, completely wiping out the tax-reduction law. The purpose of these taxes would, of course, be to soak up excess money in the hands of the people and thus reduce the inflationary pressure.

(e) Strict wage controls.

(f) A complete change in our present farm price supports system, and lowering of the parity prices.

(g) A Gestapo-type investigation agency to police our economy.

Obviously, America did not want such regimentation. You can see that there is no such thing as half-way price controls as the President recommended. America's economy is so complicated, so interconnected, that you cannot simply control, let us say, the price on an automobile, without controlling the price on textiles, on steel, the costs of labor that went into that automobile, the price of paint, rubber, and a thousand and one other items that comprise the auto.

DO YOU WANT REGIMENTATION?

Let me ask those who say they want price controls the following questions:

(a) If you are a workingman, are you willing to have your present salary frozen, and perhaps even reduced, in order to have a stabilization program?

(b) If you are a businessman, are you willing to have heavier taxes, to have rationing on all your raw materials, to fill out applications for allocation of key items, to file with some local OPA-type office all your present prices and then stick to them?

(c) If you are a taxpayer, are you willing to pay the cost of around $180,000,000 for a Federal agency, a super OPA and a super gestapo to supervise a price-control program? That's what the OPA was costing in its peak year, and remember, that was while America was still at war and there was tremendous patriotic feeling and unity.

(d) If you are a housewife, do you want the old system of coupons for every single scarce item that you buy—for sugar, for shoes, and for other items?

Do you want to stand in line for hours because only a few stores are open and items cannot otherwise be secured except on the black market?

(e) If you are a farmer, do you want to have your present price supports lowered?

These are frank, realistic questions. Let me repeat that it is a fact that there is no such thing as painless price control. Everyone must make sacrifices, and they are painful sacrifices.

Well, if price control and a police state are not the answer, what is the answer?

PROPOSED PROGRAM FOR ANTI-INFLATION

1. The only conclusion left for us, is that the American people, meaning American business, labor, agriculture, and the American housewife must have a system of voluntary controls. What does that mean? It means that a businessman must exercise restraint in his prices, he must not charge "all that the traffic will bear." He must think in terms of the national welfare, and of curbing the inflationary forces.

It means that the housewife must not patronize price profiteers, price gougers, price chiselers who would bleed the American consumer. Yes, if necessary, this means that the housewife must strike, so to speak, against those who would recklessly increase inflationary pressures.

It means that the laboring man must seek maximum production and must be careful in his demands for wage increases. He must recognize that wherever wage increases go into effect, it is almost inevitable that there will be price increases somewhere along the line.

Is it naive to think that voluntary controls may be helpful? I think not. America was built by voluntary teamwork. It can be saved by such teamwork.

GOVERNMENT ACTIONS

2. Meanwhile, however, the executive branch must get busy. It must use the powers which Congress has given it and those which it already had. The Treasury Department has at last indicated that interest rates on short-term Government bonds (bought by banks now at 1¼ percent interest instead of 1⅛ percent interest) are being raised—an action which should have been taken long before this.

The Treasury should also investigate the possibility of a reduction in the purchase price of gold and silver. On the other hand, discount rates should be raised so as to discourage lending which has already swollen to record proportions.

Government should itself reduce lending and spending, demobilize useless bureaus and bureaucrats, defer unnecessary public works so as to ease the construction-materials shortage. Government can also fulfill the Taft-Hartley labor law in letter and spirit so as to end labor racketeering.

PROPOSED NEW SPECIAL SESSION

But suppose the voluntary system and Government action do not work, then what? Suppose prices continue to rise? Then I believe that Congress must come back and reevaluate this whole question.

I suggest that there be a special session of Congress following the November election if the price rise justifies the calling of such a session (or if the foreign situation requires it).

After the election, perhaps the partisan atmosphere will have been cleared. The people will have spoken; Congress will be able to get down to business without political accusations and recriminations.

ADMITTING ERRORS

It is time for each of us to admit that to some extent we all were in error regarding the inflationary problem. The administration should admit its error in killing wage controls and thus in dooming price controls. At the same time, the Republican Party should admit that it underestimated the forces of foreign spending and of defense spending at the time price control was ended.

The major question is, however, where do we go from here? How can we make certain that the American consumer has enough milk, enough butter, enough meat, to feed our 40,000,000 families, enough clothes, shelter, and all the other essentials?

How can we cure the evil of high prices without getting into a worse evil—a police state, black market, gestapo-spying, and imprisonment?

CONCLUSION

It is my prayer that we can, regardless of our political differences, close ranks, 145,000,000 of us, maintain full production, exercise moderation in our purchasing and in our selling, cease trying to find villains or whipping boys, cease trying to blame everyone but ourselves. We must all recognize that it is human nature to want to buy with a dollar worth its 1939 value, but to sell at prices of 1948 level.

The real answer to this problem as to so many other problems lies deep within your heart and mine. The answer is in us—not in the next fellow, not in letting "George do it." If we do our part, if we refuse to patronize chiselers or to be a chiseler ourselves, then we will have made that much contribution to the solving of this most important problem.

The picture is not at all black. Already, some prices have started down, on radios, electric appliances, white shirts—a vast miscellany of items. With teamwork, we can work our problem out, in the American way.

A Good Man Deserves Promotion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, Senator Isidore Dollinger, presently a member of the New York State Senate, where he served with distinction for the past 4 years after serving as a member of the assembly for 8 years, is now a candidate for Congress in the Twenty-fourth Congressional District of New York.

The people of this district should be congratulated upon discarding party labels and selecting him as their choice to represent them at the Eighty-first Congress. Because his election seems reasonably certain I should like the privilege of acquainting this august body with some facts about this distinguished candidate's experience and background.

Born on the east side of New York in humble surroundings, he became an able lawyer. Community service was looked upon by him as a duty, as well as a privilege.

He has served his constituents in the New York State Legislature for 12 years. His record there was enviable. He was and always will be a liberal, progressive, conscientious, courageous, and public-spirited legislator. He is a champion of the underprivileged. He exemplifies the true spirit of American democracy.

Legislation which has received Senator Dollinger's sponsorship and indefatigable support includes unemployment insurance; minimum wages and maximum hours for women and children; child-labor amendment; elimination of the kick-back; abolition of discrimination in employment and in education because of race, color, or creed; improvement of the civil service; strengthening the retirement and pensions systems; fair compensation to Government employees in the lower brackets; enlargement of the school and health programs; rent controls; public housing and slum clearance; unemployment relief; and other vital legislation so necessary to the rank and file of his constituency and the progress of the State.

Senator Isidore Dollinger has been an outstanding champion in the fight for civil rights and his membership in the Eighty-first Congress will enable him to further participate in that crusade to eliminate that un-American term "discrimination."

Senator Isidore Dollinger has been and is an ardent Zionist and president of one of the largest Zionist organizations in Bronx County. He has strongly urged and continues to urge that the arms embargo be lifted immediately; that we recognize the state of Israel as a de jure government and that the application for a loan requested by the state of Israel be granted at once and that we instruct our delegates at the United Nations Conference to ask for immediate diplomatic and economic sanctions against the Arabs under the terms of the truce resolution and that such economic sanctions be likewise enforced against all other countries that oppose the state of Israel. He was among the first to urge that the state of Israel be admitted to the family of nations as a member of the United Nations.

These are but a few of the achievements, accomplishments, and characteristics of the man who we all feel certain will represent the Twenty-fourth Congressional District of New York. A good man deserves promotion. I know that his district will show its appreciation for his services and reward him accordingly.

I will deem it a pleasure and privilege to introduce Senator Dollinger to the membership of the Eighty-first Congress. He will be a credit to his country, to his district, and to himself.

Germany and the European Recovery Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Eightieth Congress took a momentous step when it adopted the European recovery program in April 1948—commonly known as the Marshall plan. This program affords not just another program of relief for Europe but a positive program of permanent reconstruction so that western Europe will be self-supporting by June 1952, and thus insure world peace.

Never before has America embarked on such a gigantic peacetime program as this attempt to put Europe back on its feet. In the long range, the United States will benefit economically by the restoration of European economy, but this is not our principal reason for adopting the European recovery program. As our State Department has said:

> The principal reason for wanting an economically stable Europe is that it is a prerequisite to the maintenance of the civilization in which the American way of life is rooted.

And again:

> The next few years can determine whether the countries of Europe will, in fact, be able to hold their heritage.

In proposing the European recovery program our country stated that it would not provide any assistance to the European countries unless these countries got together and agreed to a unified, joint program. We did not want to waste our efforts and resources with piecemeal aid to individual countries. Relying on this, 16 western European countries met in Paris in June 1947 to plan a program. After 2 months of study their results were put forth to the famous Paris report. The New York Times said of this report:

> Here is a document which provides us with the first blueprint thus far available for an economically strong and united western Europe, toward which the Marshall plan looks. It is a prospectus which warrants the careful consideration of every American who regards world peace and security as transcendentally the most important investment of our time.

After the Paris report was issued, I was sent to Europe in November 1947, as a subcommittee of the House Education and Labor Committee to inquire into the place of labor in the European recovery program.

There, I observed that the Allies were still dismantling plants and factories in Germany, in accordance with our supposedly discarded and unjust Morgenthau plan for reducing Germany to a pastoral country. On my return to the United States I introduced in Congress on December 17, 1947, House Joint Resolution 279, providing for the discontinuance of further plant dismantling in the American war zone in Germany. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

I also discovered that the American occupying forces destroyed most of the school textbooks when they moved into Germany in 1945, so that in 1947 there was only one textbook per child in the American zone of Germany. At the same time the Russians were furnishing seven books per child in their zone and were rapidly trying to indoctrinate the children in communistic principles.

Another tragic situation in Germany existed among the railway shop workers. Many of them worked through the winter without gloves, or underwear, or shoes, and wearing gunny sacks for socks. These workers particularly needed better clothing, not only for their own sake but also in order to increase their productive efficiency in turning out railroad cars and locomotives, since it was this bottleneck in the transportation system in Germany which was the principal impediment to the economic recovery of Germany. Experts in Germany estimated that the work output of these workers would double if they had the proper clothing.

In order to relieve the situation among the school children and railway workers in Germany, I introduced an amendment in Congress on December 17, 1947, to add $2,000,000 to the amount to be appropriated for Government and relief in occupied areas. Of this amount, $1,000,000 was to be used for textbooks for school children in Germany and $1,000,000 for protective clothing for the railway workers. This amendment, however, was rejected by the House.

My tour through Germany served to convince me even more strongly that Germany was the key to the European recovery program and that it must be included in the program if it was to succeed. Although western Germany was not represented at the Paris conference, the participating countries also recognized the necessity of including western Germany in their plan for the economic recovery of Europe. They pointed out in their Paris report:

> Other western European countries cannot be prosperous as long as the economy of the western zone of Germany is paralyzed, and a substantial increase of output there will be required if Europe is to become independent of outside support.

The economy of western Germany was still paralyzed largely because we were still following to a great extent the Morgenthau plan for dismantling Germany, but gradually the United States was beginning to see the unwisdom of this Morgenthau plan. The House Select Committee on Foreign Aid said, in December 1947:

> Germany has always been one of the two focal points of the European economy. The industrial complex of mines and factories in the Ruhr and Rhine Valleys serve not only Germany but the rest of Europe as well, and their low level of activity since the war has been a major element in delaying European revival.

And further stated:

> A democratic Germany, based on free economic institutions, is the best guarantee of European peace.

And our own State Department also said:

> It is essential to European recovery that Ruhr coal production be increased as rapidly as possible. Production in the other peaceful industries of western Germany must also be restored so that this vital area can again become self-supporting and make its great potential contribution to the general cooperative effort required to put western Europe on its feet.

And further:

> The destruction of industry in Germany, the undernourished conditions of its greatly increased population, the lack of a sound currency, and the low level of production, still less than 50 percent of prewar, requires that special attention be paid to the problem of Germany.

Thus it was in the line of these recommendations that the Economic Cooperation Act, when passed by the Eightieth Congress to implement the European recovery program, included the zones of occupation of Germany among the participating countries.

In the discussion of the European recovery program in Congress, I was pleased to have two provisions which I had urged incorporated into the act. On December 18, 1947, prior to the argument on the ERP, I introduced a bill in Congress—H. R. 4791—to provide free postage for gift packages of food and clothing sent to certain foreign countries, including Germany. A similar reduced-postage plan was later adopted as part of the European recovery program.

On March 31, 1948, I introduced an amendment asserting that one of the objectives of the European recovery program was the elimination of obstacles to the free movement of persons within Europe. The amendment was adopted.

We have every reason to expect that, with such a noble start on the program of European recovery, that Europe will again enjoy a vital and flourishing prosperity. The western European countries and the United States are to be commended for their ability to submerge any feelings of retaliation which they might have had against a defeated Germany in the greater interests of European and world peace.

Communism a Menace to America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, today a situation confronts our country that is serious. A situation that calls for every American, high or low, who believes in America and appreciates the honor and privilege of being a citizen of this great country, to rise up and demand that those in authority shall work aggressively and with courage to clear this Nation of those who seek to undermine our institutions of Government.

Too long have we been patient. Too long we have refused to take seriously the warnings that have been given by patriotic and sincere men and women. In the halls of Congress voices have been raised in recent years against the menace that was working so insidiously within our gates. Now, we realize how true it all was and how unjust the sneers and smears cast at those who had the courage to speak out against the danger lurking in our midst. No better evidence of the truth of the old adage "Truth crushed to earth will rise again" could there be than the present revelations of intrigue and disloyalty that have existed in recent years within departments of our Government. It should bring a blush of shame to the cheek of every loyal American to realize that we have been no naive to permit all that has been revealed in recent weeks to take place in the inner circles of our Government without being checked long before this time.

Now that the real conditions are revealed there goes forth a clarion call to each of us to rise and drive from our midst those who seek to undermine, or change, or destroy our American institutions, and let them know, and all the world, that the spirit of America is not dead but liveth.

Mr. Speaker, we can now realize that communism is not only a menace to world peace, as it seeks to enslave the weaker nations of Europe, but it most assuredly constitutes a very serious menace in our own land. It creates a danger from within that cannot be ignored nor easily dismissed. In its nefarious effort to carry out its diabolical scheme to weaken our American form of government it has worked its way into some of the most important departments of our Government, where policy is made and determined. To accomplish its purpose it does not hesitate to debauch, deceive, and lie. No, Mr. Speaker, this is not a matter that can be lightly treated. It is a real danger to America and must be treated as such.

Over a period of years Congress has sought to delve into these un-American activities only to be thwarted, often by the refusal of those in power and authority to give aid and assistance. Time and again the warning has been given only to go unheeded or to be met with sneers and derision, and always discounted as "Red baiting" by those whose duty it was to protect our American institutions from infiltration of un-American and subversive ideologies.

The Republican candidates for Congress in the last congressional elections, 1946, in a statement of principles declared emphatically for "the protection of the American way of life against either Fascist or Communist trends."

The Republican Party, through the years, has aggressively and relentlessly battled communism, fascism, and other alien isms. The Republican Party has never been the haven or refuge of these un-American forces that seek to destroy our Republic. Ours is not the party in which they have been successful borers.

Ten years ago the House of Representatives created a Special Committee on Un-American Activities. In the intervening years this committee has worked aggressively and relentlessly in its effort to expose Communists and other subversives in and out of Government. From the time the committee was first formed, and since then, in many bitter battles to destroy the committee, or curtail its usefulness, the Republicans have stood loyally in support of the committee.

With the Republicans in control of the Eightieth Congress, we have continued to aid and encourage this committee. In this we have had help from loyal and patriotic Democrats both in Congress and on the committee. All subversive, un-American groups have been brought to public view without fear and without favor.

Agents of the Fascist countries, our enemies in the war, were exposed and dealt with swiftly. Since the war, when communism, the totalitarianism of the extreme left, has replaced nazism as the supreme threat to human freedom, the House of Representatives committee has redoubled its efforts to expose agents of that movement.

As an illustration of the effective work of this committee, Gerhardt Eisler, described as the No. 1 agent of the Communist International in the United States, was exposed by the committee, found in contempt of Congress, convicted in court of passport fraud, and sentenced to prison. This is only one of the many whom the committee activities have started on the way to prison. And it appears from now on there will be an ever-increasing number headed that way.

Activities of foreign-directed agents in our schools, colleges, industries, and civic life have been exposed by the congressional committee. Depredations of Communists in the Hollywood film industry were exposed and some of those Communists have been sentenced to prison for defying the constitutional authority of Congress to investigate subversive movements.

Advanced during the Republican Congress was comprehensive legislation to require registration of Communists under alien control so that they and their untrue and deceptive propaganda may be exposed in their true light. The bill to effect those purposes was overwhelmingly passed by the House of Representatives—319 to 58. This tremendous majority is an indication not only of the merit of the bill, but also an indication of the strong public demand for legislation of this character.

In addition to congressional action, there must be cooperation upon the part of the executive department of Government if a full and complete job is to be done. The Congress and its committees, both Senate and House, have been seriously handicapped in making investigations and bringing out all the ugly facts of subversive influences and activities in government. This is due to the fact that the executive departments, by Presidential order, have refused to open their files or give any assistance to the committees. This should not be. It is the duty of all officials of Government, especially the higher ones, and not excluding the President, to give all the help and assistance that is possible. It is needless to say that a Republican President will cooperate with the Republican Congress until every subversive influence, Fascist or Communist, is destroyed. To maintain our American form of Government, pure and undefiled, is the duty of every citizen, high or low.

To the fulfillment of this obligation, I pledge my fullest support.

Labor Day 1948—A Salute to American Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement of greetings prepared by me to American labor on Labor Day.

There being no objection, the statement of greetings was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR DAY 1948—A SALUTE TO AMERICAN LABOR

"There is a dignity in labor truer than any pomp arrayed"

On every Labor Day, it is customary to give labor well deserved pats on the back for its truly great role in American life. After all, what would America be without the brawn and brain, the heart and soul, the courage and strength of our toilers?

It is the workers of today who wear overalls now who wore America's service uniforms in World Wars I and II and who fought and bled on America's battlefields. They are the heroes to whom we owe so much.

But more important than pats on the back to the laboring man is the need for a high standard of living which will assure him lots of pats of butter on the dining room table, full wage envelopes, decent working conditions, and all of the other essentials which labor so richly merits.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCES WITH LABOR'S PROBLEMS

I say this, based particularly on my personal experiences as a worker, having begun work in the saw mills of northern Wisconsin many years ago at 15 cents per hour for an 11 hour day. I know labor's problems, labor's concerns—high prices, lack of housing and other serious questions. I am always glad to meet with labor, to talk with union delegates from our State, to get letters from laboring men and women.

ACTIONS FOR WISCONSIN AND ALL AMERICAN LABOR

My view, therefore, is that tributes to labor must be backed up by actions to assure justice and equity for labor—not just on Labor Day but every day of the year. Mere words don't buy meat or pay rent or buy clothes for the youngsters; it takes decent pay to do that.

You and I know that there are inevitably some differences of opinion as to just how to achieve justice and equity for labor, particularly in the form of legislation. Nevertheless, I think that we can all agree, in spite of any political differences between us, on the following essentials for those who labor by the sweat of their brow. Let's get together on these points of agreement.

CAREFUL VOTING

1. Careful exercise of the ballot is indispensable by the free American workingman. When the laborer enters the voting booths this November or at any election, he should cast his ballot according to his conscience; according to the best facts that he can mobilize regarding the merit of candidates. He should not vote for the man dedicated to serve labor's interests alone any more than the businessman should vote for the candidate who will serve management's interests alone. Rather they should vote for the man who is dedicated to the public welfare (meaning the welfare of labor, business, farming, housewives—everyone). After all, we are all members of the same union—145,000,000 of us—the American Union of 48 free States.

In the same manner, labor's thoughts should be of the public welfare when it exercises its right to vote in collective bargaining elections.

FIGHTING DICTATORSHIP

2. The enemy of labor, like the enemy of all men and women, is dictatorship in any form whether it be the dictatorship of communism or the dictatorship of fascism; whether it be dictatorship of any corrupt or crooked bosses (who are fortunately being eliminated from many labor organizations but who would steal from the honest laboring man) or the dictatorship of any tyrannical businessman. In the field of labor, as in every other field in American life, the greatest danger to freedom is in the form of monopoly which is itself, a form of dictatorship.

FIGHTING THOSE WHO PUSH OTHERS AROUND

Labor, therefore, must be constantly on the guard against monopoly—monopoly by bosses in its own unions or by any one clique without free elections; monopoly in business; monopoly in Government by one particular party without a check and balance by other parties, and monopoly of foreign affairs by any one strong nation seeking to push around other nations. Labor doesn't like those who try to push others around any more than anyone else like bullies.

NEED FOR FULL PRODUCTION

3. The greatest means for a higher standard of living for American labor is through full production. For full production lowers prices. Full production makes sure that the workingman is able to consume the very products of comfort and convenience that he himself manufactures by the sweat of his brow—autos, refrigerators, deep freezers, electric appliances, television sets, and a thousand and one other enjoyable items he and his family rightly desire.

MEETING CHALLENGE OF ACCIDENTS

4. Safety is essential in American industry and can only be achieved through full cooperation between labor and management. We still have a long way to go toward reducing the staggering toll of industrial accidents which deprive so many wage earners of their livelihood and which make them disabled wrecks on the scrap heap rather than self-supporting, healthy breadwinners, enjoying the fullness of life.

VALUE OF PROFIT SYSTEM

5. The free enterprise system still holds the greatest promise for American labor. No other ism than Americanism can guarantee that the laborer of today will be the businessman of tomorrow; that the man who takes home a pay envelope today will be a stockholder tomorrow. Labor should not be deceived by the siren songs of communism and fascism.

On points such as these five above, all freemen can unite. We remember the words of the Good Book:

"Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

All of us, after all, if we claim to be men, are laborers. All of us are workers or should be workers, even though technically we may not be in the class called workers.

CONCLUSION

I sincerely salute, therefore, the free Wisconsin and American workingman without whom this Nation could not endure as the freest, most prosperous land on earth. I salute him and promise to him my continued efforts to assure for him the freedom and abundance which were meant to be his in our American way of life and which were meant to be the heritage of all the sons and daughters of freedom.

Remarks of Hon. William E. Warne Before Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee Meeting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the remarks made by Hon. William E. Warne, Assistant Secretary, Department of the Interior, and chairman of the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee, before the Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee at Riverton, Wyo., on July 29, 1948.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY WILLIAM E. WARNE, ASSISTANT SECRETARY, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, AND CHAIRMAN OF THE FEDERAL INTER-AGENCY RIVER BASIN COMMITTEE, BEFORE MISSOURI BASIN INTER-AGENCY COMMITTEE MEETING, RIVERTON, WYO., JULY 29, 1948

It is a great pleasure for me to meet today with the Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee. I have followed closely and participated in inter-agency cooperative and coordinative work for more than 10 years. All Interior participants are happy to have the Missouri Basin Committee come to Riverton, the center of a reclamation project that significantly illustrates, in accomplishments and in the work that is in progress, all phases of the development of such irrigation projects. This year I am chairman of the parent committee, the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee which held its July meeting on Tuesday of this week, and as such I am glad to meet with you today.

In the Department of the Interior we have as many as eight separate agencies interested in and with assigned parts to play in basin development programs. We have, therefore, established coordinating facilities in Washington and here in the Missouri River Basin within the Interior Department. The program committee and staff, the water resources subcommittee and staff in Washington, and the Missouri Basin field committee and staff with headquarters in Billings undertake this work. I have with me today the key people in these committees and staffs. I shall introduce only a few of them: Mr. Walton Seymour is chairman of the program committee and chief of its staff; Mr. Glen Hoyt is chief of the staff of the water resources subcommittee; and, of course, Mr. Glen Sloan, who is a member of the Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee, is known to you all. As chairman of the Missouri Basin field committee of the Department, he is chief of its staff. There are others here who represent the constituent agencies of these committees and of the Department of the Interior.

The type of interagency action that is represented in the Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee had its start 9 years ago in the tripartite agreement between the Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation, and the Department of Agriculture's Bureau of Agricultural Economics. The biggest step in the progress of this cooperative movement came in the making of the quadripartite agreement which added the Federal Power Commission and adopted the name Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee and established a policy of holding regular monthly meetings.

Major accomplishments of the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee included the establishment, 3 years ago, of the Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee; the establishment, more recently, of a similar committee in the Pacific Northwest; almost 2½ years ago, the Columbia Basin Inter-Agency Committee, and the coordination of interagency efforts along many lines, particularly in the gathering and use of basic and technical data. I have in mind the work of the committees on sedimentation, hydrologic data, and in other such fields.

Outstanding, too, was the provision of a means for the exchange, review, and comment on, and the coordination of reports made by the constituent agencies on multiple-purpose projects. This was achieved in the memorandum of December 29, 1943, and has been effective since that date. The essence of the procedure was written into law by section 1 of the Flood Control Act of 1944, though the interagency agreement is broader than the law and still provides the basis for much of our clearance and coordination work.

We must not forget that the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee was expanded 2 years ago to include the Department of Commerce.

These interagency river basin committees have been voluntary experiments in the improvement of Government procedures both among the Federal Government and among the State and Federal agencies. As such, the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committees have been outstanding successes. The Missouri River Basin Committee especially is to be congratulated on its work, which has been wholly constructive and of exceptional importance to the great program that is under way here. We now have in the Missouri Basin project an interagency program involving Federal and State cooperation that does promise to fulfill the requirement of a unified comprehensive basin development. This would have been impossible without interagency cooperation.

The Missouri Basin project was authorized through the adoption of the Pick-Sloan Plan in the Flood Control Act, December 1944, as a unified comprehensive development of a great river basin. The engineering plan was coordinated and unified in the law itself through the approval of the reports of the Bureau of Reclamation and Corps of Engineers, and the Coordination Report. The construction programs are being successfully unified through the procedure and the Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee and those procedures that the Bureau of the Budget and the Congress sets up and maintains in acting on the budget submissions.

The board benefits that are expected to flow to all areas and people of the basin will be obtained in full measure according to the success that you of this committee and those in responsible positions elsewhere obtain in the unification of the operation of the magnificent plan. Integrated operations will be essential to the success of the Missouri Basin project. The obtaining of integrated operation will be the greatest challenge that you and I and those in the future in similar positions will have to face. It is not too soon to turn part of the attention of our interagency committees to this part of the plan and of the job that is to be done.

In closing, I want again to express my pleasure at being able to attend your meeting here at Riverton. I consider the Missouri River Basin project the greatest and most significant undertaking of the decade in the field of water and related resource development. I consider the interagency and Federal-State cooperation in the conduct of the Missouri Basin project the most significant development of the decade in resource management. The progress that has been made to date on the project and by the Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee forecasts complete success commensurate with the challenge that has been placed before us individually and collectively.

Inflation—High Cost of Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, there is no subject in which the people of America are more interested than the cost of living. And there is no problem before us today that has been the subject of more misrepresentation and demagoguery. It is a subject that needs cool, calm, and careful analysis; otherwise one can be easily misled and come to wrong conclusions.

Careful analysis will reveal that the present high cost of living is not the result of any one act but is the result of many and varied elements extending back for the last 15 years. Certainly it is plain that it is not the result of any act upon the part of the Republican Congress. It is clearly the result of the accumulation of 15 years of deficit spending by the Government, an expensive war, high taxes, increased wages, expansion of the amount of currency in use, extensive foreign aid in money and food, goods and commodities of all kinds in short supply in our own country, increasing cost of government due to an expanding bureaucracy, decreased production due to regimentation and controls. In other words, we are suffering today for the acts of the past.

It can be readily seen that the forces which the policies of the past let loose have an accumulative effect. The prices of today did not come suddenly upon us. They are the outgrowth of the last 15 years during which, particularly since 1939, there has been a steady upward surge. There has been no sudden increase within the last 2 years that has resulted in present prices as some would have our people believe. The subject has naturally attracted more attention in the last few months because it has reached peak prices in many particulars. But, in every instance, the facts obtainable from the Bureau of Labor Statistics will show there has been an upward trend extending over a period of years prior to the present. Consequently, we are reaping now what was sown by an administration committed to a policy of profligate spending, high taxes, and regimented controls, and expensive foreign aid made necessary to supplement a foreign policy based upon serious misconceptions and mistakes.

It is regrettable that in the solution of this serious problem the President has been unwilling to acknowledge the causes, and make recommendations for changes, even though it would have meant acknowledgment of mistakes. If such had been done he would have explained that we are now paying for the economic policies that the New Deal employed during the depression and the years that followed. He could also truthfully have said that there is no honorable way to escape payment for the most costly war in all history. He would have said you cannot feed the peoples of the world without paying the price for this generosity. He would have said that we must pay, and pay dearly, for having lost the peace at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam. He would have admitted that we are paying the price of waste and inefficiency in government by keeping of thousands of useless employees on Government pay rolls. He would also have admitted that his own actions back in 1945 and 1946 broke the price-control dam and released the flood of inflation of which he now complains. On the contrary, he has sought to make the people believe that the Republicans killed price control. The record, however, is to the contrary. On October 30, 1945, the President by Executive order removed wage controls and instructed the Office of Price Administration to give prompt consideration to all applications for price increases that would be necessary by reason of these wage increases.

The impact of this order upon the price and ration control program was, of course, disastrous. The program was in bad shape in June 1946 when Congress, Democratic-controlled, extended the Price Control Act for another year. This bill was designed to decontrol prices gradually and cushion the shock of the transition period. But the President vetoed the bill and his veto was sustained by the then Democratic-controlled Congress. This rash action upon the part of the President threw the Nation into a period of uncontrolled prices at a time when this was bound to have ill effects. On July 25, 1946, the Democratic Congress passed another, but less effective, Price Control Act which the President signed.

The President has tried to give the impression that the Republicans destroyed OPA by giving him an unsatisfactory bill. The fact is that the bill, which he says was a bad bill, was passed by the Democratic-controlled Seventy-ninth Congress—not the Republican Eightieth Congress.

Without wage stabilization the price control and rationing program went from bad to worse, and just before the 1946 fall elections the President addressed the Nation by radio announcing the immediate decontrol of meat and ordering the lifting of all controls at an accelerated pace. It was the President, who on November 9, 1946, ended price control on everything but sugar, rice, and rent. In his statement directing abandonment of controls, he said:

> I am convinced that the time has come when these controls can serve no useful purpose. I am, indeed, convinced that their further continuance would do the Nation's economy more harm than good.

He also said:

> The law of supply and demand, operating in the market place, will from now on, serve the people better than would continued regulation of prices by the Government.

However, it is interesting to note that after the President became a candidate for reelection, in his message to Congress on July 27, 1948, he said:

> There are still some people who repeat the old argument which was used by those who who killed price control 2 years ago. They said that if we would only take controls off production would increase, prices would go down, and there would be more for everybody at a lower cost.

In all our considerations of this subject we cannot be unmindful of the fact that during the early days of the New Deal the brain trusters tried to repeal the economic law of supply and demand and replace it with the economy of scarcity. You all remember when the little pigs were slaughtered, crops were plowed under, and drastic restrictions were placed upon acreage which could be planted in corn and wheat. The object was to force prices up. And even now the Agricultural Department has issued recommendations to farmers to curtail production of wheat, corn, cattle, and hogs. This, in the face of the present shortage that results in increased prices. It is inconceivable.

It is also important to bear in mind that the Democratic administration devalued the dollar in the early 1930's by reducing the gold content of the dollar and increasing, by billions of dollars, our available supply of currency. The fact is that there has been a tremendous increase in the amount of money in circulation. In 1933 it only amounted to $5,500,000,000, in 1939 it was $7,600,000,000, but today it has increased to what is a top figure in the history of this Nation; namely, $27,000,000,000.

This, among other causes, is the direct result of deficit spending—spending millions of dollars more than was received in revenue. The additional money being raised by flotation of Government bonds, which, in turn, became the basis of additional currency and additional bank credits. Thus, in the past, the policies of the Democratic administration has resulted in reducing production and increasing the supply of dollars. During the war more than $352,000,000,000 were poured out from 1941 to 1945 for war materials alone.

With respect to the important and far-reaching effect on our economy by a large increase in the money supply, I refer to the January 1948 survey of the American Federation of Labor. It is a logical and well-reasoned statement. It reads as follows:

The root cause of today's continuing price rise is the inflation of money. Money supply in the United States of America was enormously expanded to finance the war; but even after the war it has gone on increasing at a rate out of all proportion to production of goods. This is the main reason why prices keep rising now, 2 years after VJ-day. From 1939 to 1941 the supply of money and the supply of goods (production) were increasing at about the same rate. This balance between money and goods is essential to keep prices stable; in these prewar years prices changed relatively little. But in wartime the banks created huge new supplies of money to finance war production, and the munitions made with this money were blown up on battlefields. So today the total supply of money is three times that of 1939 (up 200 percent), while the supply of goods to be bought with the money is only 71 percent higher.

When there is an oversupply of money in relation to goods, it takes more money (that is, a higher price) to buy the same amount of goods. The economic laws of supply and demand operate for money just as they do for anything else. The way this works out in industry is easy to understand; if a man has twice as much money to spend for something he wants badly, the person who sells it can get a higher price—and does. After reconversion from war work, businessmen wanted scarce raw materials badly—cotton, metals, lumber, wheat, etc., to keep their plants in operation. Hundreds of firms were trying to buy them. Banks had plenty of money to lend at low interest rates. Business borrowed. Bank loans to business rose 70 percent in the 17 months ending November 1947; total private credit rose faster than at any time since 1920. With this easy money plus their own funds from war profits, businesses bid higher and higher prices for scarce materials; each trying to get enough for capacity operation. Prices went up and up. Soaring cotton prices raised the price of cloth and clothing; high-cost metals meant high-priced autos, washing machines, metal products; high lumber meant high-cost homes. High wheat raised the price of bread, etc. Workers and other consumers had to pay 28 percent more for living expenses; they could not make ends meet. Unions demanded enough wage increases to meet the price rise. Companies used wage demands as an excuse for larger price increases. More money in consumers' pockets made it easy for business to sell goods at higher prices to the final consumer. The world food shortage and the foreign-relief program increased the demand for scarce goods. All these factors contributed to the upward price spiral. Its root cause was inflated money supply resulting from wartime fiscal policies.

The upward pressure of the huge money supply has been so great that prices were breaking through ceilings, and black markets were appearing long before OPA expired. This was to be expected. Price control cannot dam an ever-growing flood of money inflation. This has been proved again and again, in country after country. We must attack the root cause of inflation, the excess money supply.

The President must be aware of all these facts. He must know the effect it all has on prices. He must know that this is the real cause of high prices. Furthermore, he knows that since the war ended he has asked Congress to appropriate billions of dollars for foreign aid. He must know that this foreign-aid program and the increased appropriations for national defense asked for by him were made necessary because of the situation that has arisen as the result of our faulty agreements at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam.

Furthermore, in all his attempts to shift the blame the President has never yet made any reference to the excessively high cost of Government that adds to the inflationary spiral. In all of the efforts the Republican Congress had made to reduce Government expenditures it has met with strong opposition upon the part of the administration. The same is true with respect to the effort of the Republican Congress to reduce taxes. Everyone knows that taxes paid are passed on to the consumer in the form of increased prices for the commodities produced and sold.

There is much more that could be said in explanation of increased cost of living prices, but what the people want is that the inflationary spiral shall be stopped and policies effected that will have a tendency to accelerate the reduction of prices. To this the Republican Party is committed. The Republican Congress at the recent session enacted bills that while not a cure-all by any means, it is hoped will have a good effect in stopping or retarding the upward trend.

The solution of this perplexing problem will require cooperation of everyone, Republicans and Democrats alike, the President and Congress alike, if we are to save the Nation and its people from the distressing effect of uncontrolled inflation. It would be appropriate and helpful to our people if the President would acknowledge the mistakes of the past and cooperate with the Republican Congress in an effort to provide a remedy.

There is no single cure, no single piece of legislation, no single stroke of the pen that can bring the desired solution. It is a complex situation that requires careful thought and planning. It cannot be done in the 15 days of a special session. The problem requires, and is now being given, the careful study of trained and experienced economists, and committees of Congress are likewise engaged in making surveys and studies to the end that upon the reconvening of Congress the necessary facts and recommendations will be available to the Congress for its consideration and action. The subject is too complex and too involved for hasty judgment as to the remedy. It is only by this careful and studious approach that real worth-while legislation can result. To do otherwise would be to substitute legislation based upon quick and poorly considered policies that might do more harm than good.

The Republican Congress, under the leadership and with the cooperation of a Republican President, will make an honest and intelligent effort to solve this perplexing problem in accordance with the fundamental policies of our American form of government and not by the adoption of policies based upon foreign isms.

Statement of George J. Burger Urging Freedom-of-Opportunity Plank in the 1948 Democratic Platform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY
OF WYOMING
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the statement made by Mr. George J. Burger, representing the National Federation of Small Business, Inc., before the resolutions committee of the Democratic National Committee, urging the adoption of a freedom-of-opportunity plank in the platform of the Democratic Party for 1948. In his plea Mr. Burger discusses, among other interesting subjects, the necessity for a vigorous and effective antimonopoly campaign for the protection of small-business enterprise.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am George J. Burger. I appear before you as director of the National Federation of Small Business, Inc. I am in charge of the federation's office at Washington, D. C. The National Federation of Small Business, Inc., is a national organization of small, independent, business and professional people in all lines of business and in all walks of life. It has the largest individual membership of any business organization in the United States.

The federation was founded, and is supported by its membership, on the firm belief that our free American way of life must be preserved, at all costs. The federation and its members hold that this cherished way of life is best protected and expanded by the actions of the Nation in protecting and expanding our system of freedom of opportunity in the economic field. They hold further that full freedom of opportunity is possible of attainment only in an economic system of free, competitive, independent, capitalistic enterprise. Their considered thought is that the presence of such an economic system is best and most truly indicated by the presence in our economy of a healthy, vigorous system of small, independent businesses.

Members of the federation are deeply and reverently conscious of the vital part played in our way of life by the Federal Government in all its functions—executive, legislative, and judicial. They are aware keenly of the importance of our tried and proven successful political party system as a means of determining the attitude of Government toward current problems. And they recognize the essential part played by the political party platform both in determining the positions of the various parties and in expressing clearly party attitudes to the public in general.

I am here today to urge the adoption of a strong, clear, comprehensive freedom-of-opportunity plank in your party's platform. Naturally, as I have explained earlier, such a plank will take into consideration the requirements and wishes of all independent business and professional people over the Nation.

I would not even attempt to dictate the shape of this plank in your party's platform. That is your right and duty. But I will outline for your consideration, and (I trust) favorable action, the requirements and wishes of independent enterprisers as we of the federation have determined them through periodic Nation-wide polls. In this connection, it is significant to note that the actual ballots cast in these polls have been, in every instance, delivered into the hands of Congressmen representing the voting business and professional people.

1. ANTITRUST PROGRAM

First and foremost, members of the federation desire that a consistent, vigorous, effective antimonopoly campaign be waged by Government. To this end, federation members have repeatedly urged their Congressmen to vote adequate appropriations to the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission. To this end, officers and directors of the federation have constantly contacted Congress and congressional committees, including the Congressional Joint Committee of the Economic Report, suggesting that both these agencies be freed to voluntarily inform congressional Committees on Appropriations whenever, and the extent to which, their budget requests have been cut by the Bureau of the Budget.

In this connection, federation members have consistently demanded that Congress strengthen out antitrust laws wherever needed, and have urged Congress and Government to refrain from all actions designed to weaken these laws. Recognizing the fact that present antitrust law violation penalties are really insignificant and ineffectual, they have repeatedly asked Congress to legislate stiffer penalties for violators of these laws. And, in recognition of the fact that antitrust law litigation is many times subjected to suffocating delay, it has been requested that Congress act to provide some means of speeding action on this type of litigation.

You may wonder at the stress that federation members lay on this phase of Government activity. The fact is that the tendency in our economy is toward more rapid and more certain concentration of power in the hands of a relatively few business giants, both in private hands and in the hands of cooperative-type organizations. Pacing this trend toward concentration is an increasing disregard for the rights of independent business, which is mirroring itself in increasingly serious curtailment of economic freedom of opportunity. Our members see as one of their main bulwarks the antitrust laws of the Nation, and they demand that these laws be used for that purpose.

2. SMALL-BUSINESS COMMITTEES

Second, federation members have repeatedly urged their Congressmen to maintain in Congress active, effective, and intelligently directed Committees on Small Business. It has been suggested, time and time again, that these committees be given permanent status, with all the rights and privileges of standing committees of the Congress. In this connection, it is not at all amiss to recall the yeoman service the committees rendered to small business during the trying days of the war, and to recall the fact that the late change in political control found these committees reestablished. Since that time, their actions have been of great benefit in helping to solve some of the special problems in the paper, steel, oil, and rubber fields confronting the small independent.

3. GOVERNMENT COMPETITION WITH PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Third, federation members have demanded constantly that Government cease competition with private enterprise whenever and wherever the national welfare permits. In this connection, it must be emphasized that the ordinary business activities of certain Government corporations and agencies often conflict, and in many instances unfairly, with run-of-the-mill small, independent business activities. I have but to mention reports we have received of tax-free selling by Army and Navy Department stores to other than military personnel, low-price sales by Government departments to their employees and by such agencies as REA to the general public to indicate the need here expressed.

4. SMALL, INDEPENDENT BUSINESS REPRESENTATION

Fourth, federation members have consistently urged that independent, small enterprise, no less than giant enterprise, farmer and labor groups, be adequately represented on appropriate governmental and international boards and commissions by genuine spokesmen drawn from the ranks of small, independent business. That the Congress has passed legislation providing for such representation is a fact, and for that it is to be praised. It is significant to note that federation members in Nation-wide ballot urged this action on their Congressmen. Yet, complete and adequate representation of this nature has not come about.

5. GOVERNMENT ECONOMY AND TAXES

Fifth, federation members have indicated repeatedly their consciousness of the fact that, as long as Government expenses remain high, taxes of necessity will remain high. In this knowledge, they have repeatedly expressed themselves on the necessity for the strictest and sincerest possible congressional watchfulness over budgetary matters. They have repeatedly urged that Government expenses be maintained at the barest possible minimum consistent with adequate fulfillment of only absolutely necessary governmental functions. At the same time recognizing the existence in our taxation system of a number of inequalities that place a relatively heavier burden on small independent enterprise than they do on giant private and cooperative-type enterprise, they have asked action to equalize our tax system. Chief criticism in this regard has been leveled at Federal taxation of the early stages of corporate income, at the excise-tax laws, and at the differing application of these excise-tax laws within individual industries.

In this connection, evidence gathered recently by the Small Business Committee of the House amply proved that current rates of taxation on small business have, for all practical effects, about eaten its entire earnings, have made it impossible for small independents to finance desirable plant expansions and modernizations, and are increasingly making small business a less desirable outlet for risk capital.

6. LABOR PRACTICES

Sixth, federation members have indicated repeatedly their wish that Congress act to outlaw certain practices of labor which are regarded as monopolistic in nature and oppressive to freedom of opportunity. Among the practices censured is that of industry-wide bargaining, under which system, many times, wage agreements are forced on smaller firms by virtue of the fact that their voice, in reaching these agreements, has been hardly heard. Federation members have also condemned largely the follow-the-leader type of wage negotiation, wherein agreements reached by labor unions with industry giants are practically forced on smaller firms who are thereby seriously weakened.

However, federation members are aware fully of the fact that any curtailment of giant union power without vigorous antimonopoly action against concentrations of industry with which labor must contend, would result only in weakening labor's ability to present its case. So they contend that action to destroy the monopoly power of labor must of necessity be accompanied by action designed to curb the monopoly power in industry. They contend further that such action as this would enable a reduction in the size and power of Federal Government and effectively restore vast areas of freedom of opportunity. It would also relieve the businessman of many onerous, but under present circumstances, practically necessary, intrusions of Government in his private affairs.

7. GOVERNMENT REGULATIONS OF BUSINESS

Seventh. Federation members have repeatedly demanded that Government to the furthest practical extent reduce the number and complexity of regulations it exercises over private business. It must be remembered that the small independent is not as well equipped as his larger competitors to keep abreast of current regulations, let alone cope with additional regulations. The practical necessity of doing so, however, therefore forces him into a relatively less favorable position vis-a-vis his giant competitors. In this connection, it is appropriate to recall that federation members have demanded consistently that the problems of our economy be worked out to the furthest extent possible under our free, competitive enterprise system—that wartime controls not be reimposed.

These, gentlemen, are the suggestions offered by the Nation-wide small, independent business and professional people of the National Federation of Small Business, Inc. I call your attention to the fact that no special privileges have been sought by them in any of their stated requirements or wishes, that federation members have sought in all cases only the justice and equality to which they are rightfully entitled.

I urge your favorable attention to, and action on, all of these suggestions, with special emphasis on the first two—without which the last four would be only idle gestures. In these days, when our free way of life is under ceaseless attack from extremists of both the far right and the far left, it behooves us to take all necessary actions to strengthen our freedom of opportunity, the one factor that has been the taproot of our success, and which has made us at once the hope and envy of free men everywhere.

For the members of the federation and for myself, I thank you for the opportunity to present these views.

Continuation of Legislative Record of the Second Session, Eightieth Congress

---

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief summary of the activities of the session of Congress which convened on July 26, 1948.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF ACTIVITIES OF THE SPECIAL SESSION OF CONGRESS

It is customary at the end of a session of Congress to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a summary of the activities of that session. Accordingly, I ask that the following be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

The Eightieth Congress convened on July 26 in a special session at the call of President Truman, who asked for adequate legislation to curb inflation and for a long-range housing bill that included provisions for slum clearance and the building of low-cost rental housing. The President also commended other legislation to the Congress but stated that the other matters should not share top priority with action on inflation and housing.

In response to the President's plea the Congress completed action on a construction loan to the United Nations so that it could build a headquarters in New York. This the President had asked.

The Congress passed anti-inflation legislation providing certain curbs on credit. It did not pass an adequate anti-inflation bill.

The Congress passed a housing measure which provided millions of dollars of Federal funds to aid private businesses to continue to build houses at today's inflated prices. This measure met every demand of the real-estate lobby but failed to appropriate one cent for slum clearance or to provide low-cost rental housing for low-income families whose need for housing is most critical.

The Congress adjourned on August 7. This action is properly listed among its accomplishments.

Inflation—Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement that I had expected to make during the debate on S. 2910, known as the President's anti-inflation bill, but which I was unable to make because of the limited debate.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is highly important that the Congress be concerned about the high cost of living and inflation. It is essential that we apply honest, sound remedies to the real causes of inflation, and that we do not delude and disappoint the American people with unworkable and dishonest control devices.

I am concerned and surprised that the President, while he ignores the real causes of inflation, demands that the Congress reestablish the price controls of OPA and other controls. He berates and criticizes us because we will not abdicate our function as a law-making body and submit to his control.

We cannot honestly enact his proposals into law because experience has proved them to be unsound and unworkable and because they do not attack the real causes of inflation. We cannot do so, because we do not believe it is proper to give to the President and the executive branch of the Government, in time of peace, the power to control directly or indirectly, every farmer, businessman, worker, and housewife in this country.

The President and his leadership will not say frankly that they want to exercise full power over the economy of this Nation. They strive to make it appear that he asks for just a little power, just a few measures which will enable him as if by some magic, and without inconvenience to anyone, to control prices and leave everyone happy.

Such is not the case. Whatever he may say in his newspaper statements and campaign speeches, his actual plan is found in his bill which we are now considering and which he demands that we pass—Senate bill 2910, which has been introduced by my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and which, if it should be passed, will presumably be administered by Mr. Paul Porter, former head of OPA.

I attended hearings held on this bill by the Committee on Banking and Currency, heard Mr. Porter testify as the representative of the President, and asked him questions about its provisions.

For a few minutes I want to discuss some of the provisions of the Senate bill 2910, which contains the President's anti-inflation plan. It is the plan which he has called us into session to pass. I want to point out that the powers which it would give to the President are not the few, simple things that he mentions in his statements, but broad and sweeping powers over every farm, business, and home in the country. Among other things, it would give to the President:

1. The power to fix prices on every agricultural and industrial product in the United States. Mr. Paul Porter, former head of OPA, stated that the President intended to impose price controls on only a few farm products, and industrial products such as steel, but everyone knows that when price controls are placed upon one product they must eventually be placed on everything which enters into its production, upon products which compete with it, and the wages that go into its price. Wage control would follow price control.

2. It gives the President the power to roll back and fix prices at the level of August 1, 1948, and, most important, gives him some discretion to ignore this date and fix prices at an earlier level. It gives him the power to fix the prices of farm products at parity, even though the market price is higher. I will not take time to point out the difficulties in rolling back prices. If it is possible, and if it should be done by some price administrator, every farmer, grocer, retail or wholesale merchant, and manufacturer, with an inventory and supplies on hand, would face the danger of suffering great loss and perhaps the loss of his business.

3. The bill goes even further. Section 201 2 (D) provides that the President "may establish specific inventory limits for different classes of persons and different materials." Under this provision, the President could, if he desired, fix the amount of grain or cattle a farmer could hold at any time, and the amount of any commodity that any manufacturer or wholesaler could keep in stock.

4. The bill goes further. Title II gives to the President certain powers called powers of allocation and priority. In simple language, it means that the President could designate the uses to which any farm or factory product can be put, and could require the owner, if he sells at all, to sell his product to the person and to the place where such use would be made.

Section 107 of the bill states that "Nothing in the title shall be construed to require any person to sell any commodity." Of course, this provision means nothing, for if the Federal Government is given the power to tell the farmer how much corn, wheat, or livestock, and the businessman how much nails or cloth he can hold at any certain time, it follows that he is forced to sell any amount over the quantity designated, and at a price fixed by the Government. I am sure that the farmers of the country will remember that, in the fall of 1946, the President said that he and his Cabinet had seriously considered going upon the farms and seizing the livestock of the farmer.

With the imposition of allocation and priority powers, many small businesses could be denied the right to buy necessary commodities or could be limited to very small amounts. It would thus create unemployment in these businesses and many salesmen would be forced out of business.

The word "allocation" is a powerful word. It includes the power to ration food to the housewife.

5. The bill would reestablish the thousands of regulations, the record keeping, the investigators, and the penalties of OPA. Section 110 provides a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment of not more than 1 year, for one who wilfully violates the regulations that would be set up by the thousands of employees of a new OPA.

Mr. Porter says that the President would not use all of these powers, but he did use them under the old OPA, and the proposed bill provides that its powers shall be effective until June 30, 1950.

I have wanted to emphasize these powers because I do not believe the people know the details of the President's proposal contained in this bill. I cannot believe that the farmers, storekeepers, business people, housewives, want to submit to a new OPA, when they remember the last with its shortages, black markets, and disruption of production. They must know that food and needed goods cannot be created by law or by price control.

The shortage of meat today, which may continue until next year, can be laid to the OPA controls of 1946, which broke up the normal production of livestock by the farmer. Last fall the administration urged the farmers to finish the fattening of their livestock at light weights.

I cannot believe that wage earners want to embark on a program which, if honestly pursued, will lead to wage control, and which will disrupt employment in many industries.

It is being said that nothing is to be gained now by attempts to fix the blame for the inflation which exists today. There is value in fixing the true causes, so that we may concentrate our efforts upon them rather than attempting to fool the people with spurious remedies.

On one hand we have a huge volume of cheap money and credit, which was built up chiefly by military expenditures during the war. Since the war, the present administration has added to this volume of cheap money by governmental spending; it refuses to reduce its expenditures and wants to spend more. The President has refused to use certain powers that he now holds to control credit.

With this huge volume of money and credit, the people of our country are bargaining for goods they could not get during the war. The supply of goods which the people could enjoy and use has been reduced by governmental purchasing, by military expenditures and by exports. The President has had the power to control exports every minute since the war, yet 30 to 40 percent of the grain and much of the steel which we have exported, have not gone to the needy countries of Europe but to dozens of countries throughout the world.

The President's record on inflation is inconsistent and political. In June and July 1946, he said that price controls must be retained. In October 1946, he decontrolled meat in an effort to win an election. In November and December 1946, before the Eightieth Congress came into office, he removed price controls from every major commodity except sugar. In October 1947, he denounced price controls as police state methods. A month later, he asked for the price controls that he had denounced.

In his message to us at the commencement of this session, he asked us to undertake expenditures which would feed the fires of inflation and now asks us to shackle every farmer, businessman, housewife, and wage earner with this false remedy of price control.

You may ask me, "What is the Republican proposal?" and it is a fair question. First, we recognize honestly that there is no magic way to stop an inflation that has been building up for 15 years, and second, we do not want to adopt a quack cure that will send this Nation tumbling into a depression, with bargain prices and unemployment.

At this session we have enacted two constructive measures which will begin to moderately restrict credit.

If in the next session we have a Republican Senate and House, and a Republican President who will work with us on domestic matters, we can make progress through the reduction of governmental expenditures, debt reduction, and elimination or reduction of exports not needed for the actual rehabilitation and for food requirements in war devastated countries.

Our farmers will produce this year the second largest wheat crop and the largest corn crop in history and a large cotton crop. Factories are reaching new levels of production. Steel production is at 95 percent of capacity. If we do not interfere with this progress by governmental controls, we should see lower prices for food and clothing next year, and a sound prosperity.

The governmental controls which the President wants are being used in western Europe and in the communistic countries. Conditions may come which may make them necessary here, but I will not vote now to impose them on the farmers, business people, wage earners and homes of this country.

I insert as part of this statement a portion of an editorial on the bill proposed by the President, appearing in the July 30 issue of the New York Times, one of the great impartial, independent newspapers of this country. The bill should be defeated.

The editorial referred to follows:

"The proposed legislation includes the whole hodgepodge of recommendations contained in that part of the President's message dealing with rising prices and living costs. But that is not all. A pleasant surprise has been added by way of giving this legislation the authentic OPA touch. For it includes, as it were, an invitation to revisit that Alice in Wonderland of economics in which the country lived during the reign of OPA. That is the land of Let's Pretend, whose chief industries are statistics and regulations, in which high taxes and black-market prices don't count, and where the basic philosophy is that inflation that you can't see can't hurt you.

"Those who may have wondered precisely what Mr. Porter's contribution to the anti-inflation campaign was going to be do not have to wonder any longer. The secret is out. Incredible as it may seem, the surprise is price roll-backs. Roll-backs would be applied to any cost-of-living item which has risen, or which threatens to rise, 20 percent or more since June 1946 (when price controls were scrapped). Prices picked for the roll-back would remain under ceilings until June 30, 1950.

"There is no magic, of course, by which the administration or any other human power can roll prices back, by word of command, to some appointed level. The term 'roll-back' is simply a euphemism to describe a process whereby a producer is induced to sell his product at an agreed price, with the difference between that price and the market price made up to him by Government subsidies. And the cost of the subsidies? That, of course, is footed by the taxpayer.

"Subsidies are to be distrusted under any conditions, and distrusted particularly when they come, as they come in the case of price roll-backs, in disguise. But the proposal to reintroduce them into the American economy at the present time represents a new high in economic futility. Britain has been chided by her critics for spending almost two billions a year since the war to hold food prices down. We can be charged with the even greater folly of having spent similar amounts to keep farm prices up. But, never until now has it been seriously proposed, here or anywhere else, that a nation's taxpayers shoulder the burden of subsidizing price inflation in one political area and price deflation in another at one and the same time."

H. R. 6959, the Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. WALLACE CHADWICK

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. CHADWICK. Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to make any remarks at this special and, I hope, final session of the Eightieth Congress. The fact that I had succumbed to a peculiarly aggravated form of primary trouble seemed to me one sound reason for holding my peace; and in addition, I find little to stimulate any of us, either in the pattern or the political climate of this particular parliamentary situation.

No one could fail to resent the circumstances, or the motivation, of this call. It is not by any stretch of the imagination a contribution to good government; and I am convinced that nothing which lacks the fundamental characteristics of statesmanship will in the long run prove to be good politics. So much for the call.

I have some difficulty, however, in adjusting my thinking to our response. Just insofar as the President failed us in his approach to the problem, a special burden was imposed upon the legislative branch. This burden implied also an opportunity to serve the country and in so doing to serve our party. That is the standard by which our response should be, and no doubt will be, measured.

I have discussed this matter with a number of our colleagues, and I find that my own guess about the situation is not reflected in their considered judgment. To this very generally held view, I freely defer; after all, they have to run on the record and I will not. How sincerely I wish all my colleagues well, I cannot here find aptly restrained words to express. I have had much pleasure, much satisfaction, much profit, from my association with you all. It has been a memorable experience; and I do now, and always shall, bear witness to the devotion, the patriotism, the deep undercurrent of common sense, of the Eightieth Congress. I believe history will be kinder to us than the commentators are.

But in leaving this body, and on the occasion of the consideration—formal and informal, at this end of the Capitol and the other—of proposals relating to housing, there is one thought I would like to express.

I have always entertained grave doubts about certain of these proposals, and particularly as to their expediency at this time; but notwithstanding this, I signed the discharge petition for the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill sometime last spring. I was moved to do this because of my deep conviction that these problems must be wrestled with, for better or for worse; and I thought the Eightieth Congress as good a place as any to get started.

I do not desire to use this space to discuss that particular aspect further; but I do want to express here, for the record, my regret that these proposals are so frequently described as socialistic. Maybe they are; but I am personally convinced that we are bound to come to some of them, sooner or later, either in a Republican Congress or some other kind of a Congress. The question how they are handled, constructively or unconstructively, will depend in no small part on what kind of a Congress it is. I will have more confidence in the result if Republicans are in the majority; and there is no use our making the bed harder to lie in by harsh words now.

As a matter of fact, I believe that some of these proposals lie in what is now a no man's land between socialism and free enterprise. Either the state Socialists or we who believe in our American tradition of free enterprise will ultimately occupy this area of activity; and upon that decision the future of our economy may possibly prove to depend.

I have watched too long the development of America to believe that all the frontiers of thought and action have already been established. Very slowly and very painfully, we have learned a lot of things, many of them novel. Perhaps we have some more to learn; and the fruits of such lessons are at the peril, not merely of our economic system, but even, I am convinced, at the peril of the Republic itself.

May I suggest in closing, something which seems to me to be a practical measuring rod, to determine whether any particular activity is consistent with free enterprise, or is essentially socialistic. The test if valid presumes that free enterprise has had, on the whole, a reasonable opportunity in America to develop itself. In spite of certain obstacles which will occur to you as they do to me, I believe this is true.

If so, then may we not say, that insofar as state socialism (or Federal paternalism, or New Dealism, whatever you want to call it) undertakes to invade areas of activity either preempted by free enterprise or now being brought within its scope, it is inconsistent with our American tradition and is at least to be suspected.

But if, on the other hand, a field of activity, a social and economic need, actually exists, vitally affecting the lives and interests of the people, into which private enterprise is either unable, or is estopped, or is unwilling for any reason, to enter, then such field invites the interest of the Congress, as the representative of a nation of free enterprisers, to determine what cooperative measures might be appropriate to serve the need.

When the Congress voted vast land grants to encourage the original construction of transcontinental railroads, no one cried socialism—or if they did, that cry has not reechoed down to our time. We know now that by such means, our national interests were wisely and properly served, and our free system of private enterprise was unshackled from the limitations of otherwise almost unconquerable space. There are in our history plenty of other examples of the same sort.

It seems pretty clear that in the field of housing—particularly of housing for low-income groups, and particularly at the present time—some special need does exist. If so, it will ultimately be satisfied, this Republic being what it is. Why not claim this admittedly difficult and dangerous terrain in the name of our American tradition? Why leave it to the followers of foreign ideologies? We can make it ours, by right of exploration and conquest. We should not be laggard in this particular.

Some of you remember the story of the Battle of Gettysburg; how General Meade deployed his army to what seemed the best advantage, but overlooked—because he had no chance to observe—a significant weakness of his extreme left flank. It was General Warren who made that observation; it was he who went beyond even his own authority to seize and hold Little Round Top; and with that height in Union hands, the battle was won and the course of history was changed.

Hon. Joseph C. O'Mahoney, of Wyoming, and the New York Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have read, within recent weeks, two articles in the New York Times relative to proposals made by the senior Senator from Wyoming, the Honorable JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY. One, an editorial, appeared in the issue of July 22, 1948, and criticized Senator O'MAHONEY for pointing out the inflationary aspects of the price spiral in the steel industry. The other was a letter by Mr. Edward H. Collins, who criticized the Senator by showing what he called an inconsistency between his position on steel and wool.

The New York Times and Mr. Collins should know that there is no more thorough student of these two industries than Senator O'MAHONEY. They should know that no one man in the United States has done more to show up the dangerous effects of the consistent policies pursued by the large steel and other giant corporations over the years on the economy of this country. They should know that the senior Senator from Wyoming has always been the outstanding champion of real private enterprise against the corporate giants who have been draining the economic lifeblood out of this country.

They should know—and very likely do—that the only real attempt to curb inflation in this country at the recent special session of the Congress was made by Senator O'MAHONEY. His proposal, S. 2908—and my companion House measure, H. R. 7076—would have made it mandatory for the giant corporations to undergo a 30-day cooling-off period before prices could be raised and that during this 30-day period these corporations would have to appear before the Federal Trade Commission and justify the need for the proposed raises in the prices of their products.

All of these facts are known to the New York Times and to Mr. Edward H. Collins, but, having publicized their criticisms of Senator O'MAHONEY, they have refused to carry through their false contentions to the point where the truth could become known and their arguments shown up for what they are worth. It is too bad that this great newspaper, usually so desirous of showing both sides on any important question, did not, in this instance, pursue that same policy.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, Senator O'MAHONEY is one of America's outstanding statesmen. We of the western United States recognize him for his true value to his country. It is to be hoped that the carping provincial criticism shown by the New York Times will not be repeated without at least exploring the full possibilities of any particular question so that the truth—the full truth—will be known.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am inserting at this point a copy of a letter written to the New York Times by Senator O'MAHONEY. This letter was sent to me at my request after I had looked in the Times for Senator O'MAHONEY's reply to the accusations leveled against him. As the Senator's answer was not published I am including it with my remarks:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., July 29, 1948.

The EDITOR,
New York Times, New York City:

For the second time within the space of less than a week, I find myself the subject of derisive comment in the New York Times. I was honored with an editorial on July 22 criticizing me for having said that United States Steel has surrendered to inflation.

On July 26, Mr. Edward H. Collins, taking up the same theme, professes to believe that there is some inconsistency between my criticism of steel and my support of wool, and he asserts that I have "long regarded it as an essential part of (my) duty to help perpetuate" what he calls the most notorious and unnatural monopoly in wool.

This charge gives me a happy opportunity to call attention to the serious confusion of mind by which so many industrialists and their defenders fail to see the distinction between a concentrated industrial unit like United States Steel, which produces and prices almost 40 percent of the entire American output of steel, and the individual agricultural producers, none of whom produces or prices more than a fraction of 1 percent of the Nation's output.

It is true that I supported a bill, which the present Congress passed without dissent, providing that the price of wool should be supported by the Commodity Credit Corporation at not less than the 1946 level, as Mr. Collins points out. "By an odd coincidence," Mr. Collins writes, "the 1946 average price, 42.3 cents a pound, happens to have been the highest in years, if not for all time." What Mr. Collins does not know is that 42.3 cents a pound is less than parity by 3.6 cents a pound.

Parity is the concept advocated by Republicans and Democrats alike to enable farmers to receive for their products a price sufficient to enable them to buy industrial products at the ratio which existed some 30 years ago. It is, in other words, an effort to protect farmers from rising industrial prices. So when Mr. Collins accuses me of having sought to support wool at 42.3 cents a pound, he is merely saying that I voted to protect the wool grower at a level below that to which he is entitled under the universally accepted congressional formula of parity.

Mr. Collins also accuses me of having secured a legislative provision to raise the domestic production goal of wool from 360,000,000 pounds a year to 400,000,000 pounds a year. I did. But 400,000,000 pounds of domestic wool is little more than one-third of the amount of wool the people of America consume. Most of the wool which is purchased here in America comes from foreign sources, so obviously domestic producers do not constitute a monopoly under any definition of that term.

Unlike steel, more than 70 percent of which is produced by 8 corporations, the American wool clip is produced by more than 500,000 wool growers, of whom 456,000 own less than 99 animals each.

The thinking which compares 500,000 individual agriculturalists to a giant corporation like United States Steel is one of the primary causes of the economic and political troubles of our time. The absurdity of it is indicated by the assumption of Mr. Collins that 400,000,000 pounds of wool at 42.3 cents a pound will undermine the American economy while a price increase of $9.34 a ton by United States Steel is justifiable.

The value of the entire 400,000,000-pound clip of 500,000 American wool growers, at 42.3 cents a pound, would be $169,200,000. Compare that figure, the total value of the clip, with the profits of United States Steel. Those profits in 1947 amounted to $244,000,000. In other words, the profits of United States Steel in 1947 were greater by $74,800,000 than the entire value of a 400,000,000-pound wool clip raised by 500,000 individual growers.

Yet this does not completely show the disparity between the position of the so-called "rugged individualists" who produce agricultural commodities on the farm and the collectivist economic units like United States Steel. The recent price increase announced by Steel amounted on the average to $9.34 a ton, and will add not less than $186,000,000 to the sales of a single giant corporation. In other words, the managers of United States Steel have just declared a price advance which will amount to $16,800,000 more than the entire value of the entire wool clip of the United States at less than the parity price.

I make no apology for defending the farmer against industry. He has been fighting a losing battle for decades, and with all the farm subsidies which were paid to stimulate agricultural production because the country and the world needed it, the farmers of the United States, who constitute 19 percent of the population, receive only 10 percent of the national income.

It is this disparity between agriculture and industry that creates the farm problem. It is the continued concentration of industrial control in a few units, the managers of which can determine for themselves how much the production shall be and what price the people shall pay, that creates the economic problem.

Editors who cannot see the difference between the situation of the individual farmer on his farm and ranch and the manager of big business are contributing nothing to the solution of the great difficulties of our time.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY.

P. S.—To your editorial of July 22 I wrote a response on July 23. It has not as yet appeared in the column of letters to the editor. May I not express the hope that this response to Mr. Collins may meet a better fate?

Truman Policies Caused Food Scarcities and High Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, President Truman demands that Congress pass legislation to give him and his New Deal associates the power to control the lives and economy of the American people. He demands a restoration of wartime price controls, rationing, and allocation of food and other vital necessities to stop inflation. He fails to tell the people that a revival of these controls will curtail production and restore the black market which operated on a Nation-wide scale during and after the war in meat, poultry, building material, and other scarce products.

Since President Truman seeks to place the blame on the Eightieth Congress for present inflationary prices of meat and other foods, as well as for other vital products, I propose to discuss the real causes for the inflationary spiral and the remedies which must be applied to restore our economy to a more equitable basis for American producers and consumers. In particular, I will cover the meat- and food-price situation, which is vital to the livelihood of all consumers. Meat prices and many food items are too high. Prices must come down. The only method to accomplish this objective will be to secure abundant production with equitable returns to producers and fair prices to consumers.

OVER-ALL CAUSES FOR INFLATIONARY PRICES

First. Excessive spending by the Federal Government. Since the termination of the war, the Truman administration has failed to cut Federal expenditures. For the past 2 years Federal spending of the taxpayers' money has exceeded the cost of food for all American homes. The Federal pay roll now stands at more than 2,000,000 employees. The Eightieth or Republican Congress decreased many expenditures and refused to appropriate billions of additional dollars asked for by the President. Larger cuts could have been made in appropriations, had it not been for domestic or foreign emergencies placed before Congress by the President. It is estimated that since VJ-day the United States has authorized for expenditure more than $25,000,000,000 to assist people in war-devastated countries. Government expenditures must come down, if the United States is to remain solvent. The President should take the lead to stop wasteful expenditures.

Second. President Truman refuses to use the powers which he now possesses to halt the inflationary spiral. Such powers wisely used will restore our economy without discouraging production.

Third. Government spending of around $40,000,000,000 a year creates more inflation money. There is also an abundance of money in the hands of many individuals and corporations. Unfortunately, certain people living in the low-income groups who secure their income from pensions and other fixed sources do not share in the inflated money. They are in a squeeze. They do not possess enough money with which to buy the necessities of life. Their cost of living must come down or their incomes increased. However, for those who have more money the situation is different. When people make more money, they want more and better cuts of meat and they bid for the scarce supply. They want more automobiles and other necessities and comforts of life, and prices of raw material, labor and finished products rise rapidly as scarcities appear. The Bureau of Labor Statistics records wages at $52.81 a week in June 1948 for factory workers, as compared with an average wage of $23.86 in 1939. Employment stands at 61,600,000 jobs. This employment and purchasing power is reflected in the demand for more meat, food, and all other items. Full employment, with wages to maintain a high American standard of living, is vital to a sound economy, but policies must be initiated to prevent spiraling prices which in turn create the demand for spiraling wage increases. We are now in a vicious circle which will end in a depression unless the proper remedies are applied.

IN THE CASE OF MEAT AND FOOD PRICES

Fourth. Because of the tremendous Government purchases of grain and food for foreign relief, the Truman administration has completely dominated the market and the price of grains. Grains in this country mean more meat, poultry, and dairy products for consumers. When the Government bought grain the price went up, and when the Government stopped buying, prices went down. Last December the Government paid more than $3.25 per bushel for wheat and the price of other grains followed the upward trend. The Government has been on the buying side consistently since July 1, 1946, and spent more than $5,000,000,000 for grain and food to be shipped to Europe and other countries. The Government's domination of the grain market caused high prices for livestock and poultry feed, which resulted in a liquidation of cattle, hogs, and poultry flocks with higher prices for meat, dairy, and poultry products in 1948.

Fifth. Since 1945 the Truman administration has pursued a program calling for drastic reductions in the production of livestock and poultry. This, together with high prices for grain and feed caused a large decrease in the supply of meat, dairy, and poultry products and higher prices to American consumers. When the demand is great, scarcities of vital products cause inflationary prices.

Sixth. Although for an authorized and worthy purpose, the export of around 1,200,000,000 bushels of grain in the last 2 years for relief feeding and other purposes, had a tremendous effect upon the price level of food, and particularly meat, dairy, and poultry products in this country. From January 1947 to February 4, 1948, the Truman administration promoted one of the greatest grain price booms in history. With the Government buying one bushel of wheat out of every two bushels sold, wheat prices advanced from $2.05 to over $3.25 per bushel. Scare statements were frequently issued by the Government about dire world shortages ahead, which of course had the effect of encouraging speculators and needy buyers to rush into the market.

Seventh. To best illustrate the basic causes for the present price inflation, I quote here some pertinent comment by a Governor of a Federal Reserve Board:

TRIPLE YOUR MONEY

M. S. Szymczak, a Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, gave a radio audience some economic fundamentals last week end. Some of his remarks merit quotation.

At the end of the war, he said, people had "more money in the bank, more cash in their pockets, and more Government bonds. The total of these so-called liquid assets held by individuals and corporations at the end of the war was more than three times as great as before the war."

He went on: "At manufacturing plants average hourly earnings are more than double prewar levels. * * * Basically, prices, wages, and profits are all high because of a heavy demand for goods."

And he conceded: "Extension of credit since the war has in some degree made possible more production, but borrowed funds have also been used to compete for a limited supply of goods."

Mr. Szymczak declared: "Federal loans and grants to foreign countries have been large and they have contributed to increases in prices of domestic commodities."

I also desire to quote from the January 6, 1948, study of the Foundation for Economic Education, a research organization, on the subject of causes for the present inflation. The comment reads as follows:

FOUNDATION FOR ECONOMIC EDUCATION

"The two basic factors causing inflation are the present high cost of Government, much of which is reflected in the price of goods and services through hidden taxes, and Government's drastic increase in the quantity of dollars in the market," the foundation said in a study written by F. A. Harper.

"Much of the increase in the money supply was the result of the Government living beyond its income from 1931 on through the war.

"Since inflation is basically a money question and since control over money resides with the Government, the placement of guilt for past events, as well as responsibility for the future, rests clearly on its shoulders.

"Under the spell of rising prices—the present penalties for past sins of inflation—some persons in Government have encouraged turning the search for truth into a witch hunt," the foundation said. "One is reminded of the trick of a robber who commits a crime and then joins the angry mob in search of the robber."

THE GENTLEMAN FROM MASSACHUSETTS SPEAKS ON INFLATION

My very good and able friend, Congressman JOHN MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, the spokesman for the President in the House of Representatives, is urging the high cost of food as the principal issue in the campaign. Mr. MCCORMACK insists that we must have a restoration of price control and rationing of food products. He blames the Republican Party for the repeal of the OPA in 1946, when the Democratic New Deal Party had a large majority in the Congress and he was the majority leader. It might be well to examine the record and ascertain what Mr. MCCORMACK had to say in September and October of 1946 when the people of Boston were not able to buy meat, excepting through the black market. Mr. MCCORMACK no doubt has forgotten his experience of 2 years ago, and that may be the trouble with a good deal of people who fail to remember.

I am sure that the housewives of the country and particularly in Boston, remember back in 1945 and 1946, under the OPA, when nearly 80 percent of the meat bought in large consuming areas was sold at black-market prices. Round steak and poultry went at more than $1 a pound. A black-market ring operated on a Nation-wide scale in meat, poultry, sugar, and other scarce foods. These foods were diverted from legitimate channels of trade and the people were compelled to pay exorbitant prices for them or to go without.

The situation became so critical in Boston, the home city of my good friend from Massachusetts, that he led the fight in September 1946 to secure a suspension of OPA control over meat so his constituents could secure this vital food through legitimate channels. President Truman refused to consider Congressman MCCORMACK's plea for relief.

According to the following front page news story in the Boston papers, Mr. MCCORMACK led the fight to suspend OPA price controls:

TALK WITH TRUMAN HINTS OF RELIEF

Indications that immediate help would be forthcoming came when Representative MCCORMACK, spokesman for President Truman in the National House and erstwhile defender of OPA, prefaced his Washington demand with an explanation that he had discussed this meat shortage with the President and with other Members of Congress.

MCCORMACK, in his telegram to Paul A. Porter, OPA Administrator, urged immediate suspension of meat price ceilings because "this action is absolutely necessary if our hospitals and our citizens are to receive sufficient meat."

MCCORMACK asked the OPA to lift meat price ceilings for 60 days to enable the Decontrol Board to study costs and check prices charged by distributors, wholesalers, and retailers. (Boston Herald for September 26, 1946.)

The gentleman from Massachusetts spoke for the housewife, the merchants, the sick people in the hospitals of Boston and the Nation when he made his demand for relief. But the President refused to listen to him.

I fully recognize that Mr. MCCORMACK is a good leader in the House for his party, but recalling the experience which he had in the fall of 1946 it seems strange that he should now be willing to advocate the restoration of controls over meat when he well knows that it will revive the black market on a tremendous scale and take meat away from American consumers.

The housewives of the country will remember the empty meat counters in every community during the months of September and October of 1946. No meat was available except from the black market at a fantastic price.

It has been stated many times on this floor that Republicans killed the OPA in 1946. That may be good political talk to fool the people, but the facts are that President Truman himself discontinued the OPA and price control on November 10, 1946, after the congressional election. When Mr. Truman wiped out all wage controls and lifted virtually all price ceilings, he said:

The law of supply and demand, operating in the market place, will, from now on, serve the people better than would continued regulation of prices.

Black market operators are now standing on the side lines waiting to take over. They may be good contributors to the New Deal depleted campaign chest, but whatever they donate for political purposes will be extracted from American consumers through high prices charged in their illegal traffic. If the black market is revived consumers will be paying from $2 to $3 a pound for meat and poultry. No; the solution for reducing present high food prices is not through a revival of the black market. I state again that the only remedy is to secure greater production of cattle, hogs, and poultry, and thereby satisfy the demand through legitimate wholesale and retail channels.

WHAT HAPPENED BACK IN 1944 PRIOR TO THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

Too few consumers seem to remember that shortly before the November election in 1944 of the fourth-term candidate, the famous Chester Bowles, of the OPA, virtually removed all meat and other foods from the rationing list. He also issued millions of sugar coupons to the housewives which he stated would be indefinitely good, but after the election he canceled all of them as a Christmas present to the housewives of the country. He also restored tight controls over meat and other food products. I am sure that the housewives of the United States will remember. Do you want a repetition of such a double cross?

TRUMAN USES DOUBLE TALK

President Truman and his New Deal associates are engaging in double talk on reasons for the high price of meat and food to American consumers. While the President is putting the blame on the Eightieth Congress, to cover up years of deliberate New Deal mismanagement, the Secretary of Agriculture and his Department are issuing statements every day or so, telling the country that we are going to have higher meat prices. The point is that New Deal administrators are desperately trying to create and continue a fear psychology, so that they may stay in power and again control the lives and economy of the American people. The policy of scarcities, spending, and taxing are still the objectives of the New Deal.

A typical statement made by the Secretary of Agriculture and his Department heads is shown in a published news item of July 27, 1948:

The Department of Agriculture predicted further increases because of the seasonal decrease in meat production in the coming months.

When Secretary of Agriculture Brannan appeared before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee on August 5, asking for restoration of price control and rationing of meat, he said:

It seems likely that prices of meat will increase further throughout summer unless some positive action is taken. We certainly cannot safely count on the usual price decline this fall and early winter.
